The point is to rally again to the cause of equal pay for actresses and renew the overall myth of conservatives waging a war on women.

I have no problem with advancing compliance with the multitude of federal laws -- some of which have been in effect for 50 years -- that protect rights of employees to be free from discrimination and ensures equal pay for equal work.

But Hollywood would be wise to consider whether it has found the right stalking horse to advance the cause.

Just hours after this year's best supporting actress Patricia Arquette's rousing demand for women's equality, Hillary's record of what she paid her Senate female staff members came into view.

The next day, an analysis by the Washington Free Beacon political website had her paying women in her workforce just 72 percent of what men earned.

The website story went on to cite the conclusion of American Enterprise Institute economist Mark Perry: "Either Clinton is guilty of gender discrimination and pays her female staffers significantly less than men, or she is guilty of statistical fraud for spreading misinformation about the alleged gender pay gap at the national level."

In spite of all her talk about breaking the "glass ceiling," the one above her own office apparently remained fully intact.

Clinton has long enjoyed the support of Hollywood's high-profile personalities. Whenever and wherever the heavyweights stage a fundraiser for her, millions flow into her campaign.

If, however, they are serious about furthering the mission of equal pay, they may want to rethink their choice.

Hillary may look the part, but her performance in the real world tells a different story.

Group Backing Netanyahu Will Air Ad Attacking Hillary Clinton (The New York Times)
By Maggie Haberman
February 27, 2015
The New York Times

The first television advertisement of the 2016 presidential campaign cycle to attack Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, will have its debut this weekend, paid for by a neoconservative group that strongly supports Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel.

The ad is being purchased by the Emergency Committee for Israel, a group started by William Kristol, the editor of The Weekly Standard, who has been deeply critical of President Obama and of Mrs. Clinton, the former secretary of state.

It is being supported with a small advertising buy: about $200,000, mainly on cable networks, beginning with the Sunday news shows and running through Tuesday, with some placements during the morning shows on two broadcast networks. There will also be a digital component, according to an official with the group, although it was unclear what portion of the dollar figure will be spent online.

The ad comes less than two weeks after a Republican group, American Crossroads, began running a web-only advertisement critical of Mrs. Clinton.

The new saber-rattling ad is harshest with Mr. Obama, but its main target is clearly Mrs. Clinton. The commercial ties together the Obama administration's nuclear talks with Iran and Mr. Netanyahu's scheduled speech before Congress at the invitation of House Republicans, which has been met with protest from Democrats, a number of whom plan to boycott the address. The ad then turns to Mrs. Clinton, who has not spoken publicly about Mr. Netanyahu's speech.

"Does she support the boycotters, or is she too afraid to stand up to them?" it asks.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton did not respond to an email for comment. A White House press aide did not respond to an email.

Mrs. Clinton wrote extensively about her sometimes contentious dealings with Mr. Netanyahu in "Hard Choices," a memoir that she promoted heavily last year. But she also forcefully defended Israel in its conflict with Hamas in a widely discussed interview with the columnist Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic.

While Mrs. Clinton is not expected to seek to distance herself from Mr. Obama on domestic policy to a great extent, she has pointed to areas of disagreement with the administration on global issues, and she is historically more hawkish than the president.

With foreign policy potentially playing a bigger role in this presidential campaign than it did in 2012, Republicans have long planned to try to make Mrs. Clinton's tenure as secretary of state a liability. And top Republican operatives have spent months discussing the possibility of airing ads before Mrs. Clinton officially begins a campaign, to try to define her before she openly starts to present herself to voters as a candidate.

"The Obama administration has launched an all-out assault against the Israeli prime minister," Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel, said in a statement. "Friends of the Jewish state ranging from Joe Lieberman to Elie Wiesel to Shelley Berkley have rallied to his defense. Hillary Clinton has remained silent. It's time for the former secretary of state and prospective presidential candidate to come out of hiding and tell us where she stands. Does Hillary Clinton stand with the boycotters or the supporters of Israel?"

Hillary Clinton takes fire from Democrats as Libya chaos creates terrorist safe haven (The Washington Times)
By Kelly Riddell
February 27, 2015
The Washington Times

As Libya descends into a failed state — marked most recently by the beheadings of 21 Coptic Christians by jihadis — Democrats are beginning to question Hillary Rodham Clinton's rush to war in the country, and one in particular, former Sen. Jim Webb, may make national security the focal point of a presidential campaign.

More than three years after Mrs. Clinton pushed for U.S. airstrikes to end Moammar Gadhafi's four-decade-long autocracy, the country has been divided between two rival governments, each with its own military, and various tribal militias all competing for power.

As happened with Afghanistan in the 1990s, the chaos has provided Islamist terrorists with a perfect breeding ground to organize, with intelligence officials confirming late last year that jihadis have set up multiple training camps in eastern Libya.

In 2011 the NATO-led operation into Libya was heralded by both President Obama and Mrs. Clinton, who was then secretary of state, as a model for intervention. Both hoped that Gadhafi's ouster would move the North African nation toward democracy, as President George W. Bush's cabinet hoped the overthrow of Saddam Hussein would usher in a period of democracy and peace in Iraq.

But now even those who helped trumpet the international war cry at the time are beginning to question its merits.

"We're in a period of real turbulence in Libya, with an on-the-ground, ongoing civil conflict between an internationally recognized government centered in Tobruk and an Islamist force centered in Tripoli," said Adm. James Stavridis, who was NATO's supreme allied commander during the conflict, in a Feb. 19 interview on CNN. "Dropped in the middle of this mix is a dose of [the] Islamic State. Bad combination, and clearly a period of great turbulence."

He added he still believes Libya will be better off in the long run without Gadhafi, but right now "this is a very dark period for Libya."

America's top counterintelligence official spoke similarly Thursday in an appearance on Capitol Hill, telling the Senate Armed Services Committee that the collapse of authority has vaulted Libya into the position of most worrisome state in the region.

"There are, in addition to ISIL, probably six or eight other terrorist groups that have gathered in Libya," said James R. Clapper, director of national intelligence, using an acronym for the Islamic State group, which is also known as ISIS. "So it's a magnet because, essentially, it's ungoverned."

Rep. Tulsi Gabbard, Hawaii Democrat and an Iraq War veteran, has been a vocal critic of the U.S. intervention in Libya and the lack of cogent U.S. strategy in dealing with the rise of the Islamic State.

"Our policy went wrong when we took our eye off the true enemy, which is Islamic extremists, and put it on Gaddafi," Ms. Gabbard told The Washington Times. "We should not have intervened in Libya and overthrown Gaddafi. The U.S. and the rest of the world are now paying for those mistakes. Unfortunately, too often, many of our leaders have not and do not look ahead and anticipate the consequences and effects of their actions and decisions."

She added: "The root cause of these problems [the rise of the Islamic State] is that our leaders, after 9/11, lost sight of who the real enemy is, namely Islamic extremists. This lack of focus led the U.S. to engage in efforts to overthrow dictators and engage in nation-building."

Even former counterintelligence officials who served during the intervention are worried about the breakdown happening in Libya — and say at the heart of the problem was a lack of U.S. strategy after Gadhafi was toppled.

The rise of the Islamic State over the past few months highlights "the real security vacuum that we have in many of these places, and in Libya, that is really most obvious," said Michael Leiter, who served as the director of the U.S. National Counterterrorism Center during the Libyan conflict.

Mr. Leiter stepped down from his position at the counterterror center in July 2011 — five months into the conflict.

"The breakdown of civil society and government authority in Libya since the fall of Gadhafi in 2011 has allowed, with a lack of security services, elements of ISIS associates — now three different groups in Libya — to really take charge and perpetrate these incredibly gruesome and horrific events," he said this month in an interview with PBS News.

Even the Rev. Jesse Jackson blasted the U.S. role in Libya this month in an op-ed column he penned for the Chicago Sun-Times, questioning the validity of Mrs. Clinton's argument for entering the war in the first place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The 'humanitarian intervention' in Libya has left chaos and violence in its wake," Mr. Jackson wrote in the article, which also questioned the wisdom of U.S. policies in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The left-leaning press, once supportive of Mrs. Clinton's arguments for intervention, is also beginning to doubt the administration's strategy behind the Libyan war, given the rise of the Islamic State in the region.

"The underlying message is that, regardless of the approach in the early stages of the engagement, how long and how committed does the international community stay in that process to make sure that the state does not collapse?" said NBC News correspondent Ayman Mohyeldin when questioned on MSNBC.

He answered his own question skeptically, saying Libya has become a failed state.

"What we saw in Libya is that, yes, there was a central government that was a dictatorship and certainly controlled the territory and the people underneath it. In the wake of the Arab uprising and the wake of that NATO liberation, if you will — or NATO campaign to help the rebels — there was a disengagement following that and following the Benghazi attack. They did not want to get involved. It was too dangerous perhaps. They wanted to see the central government kind of exert itself. That failed. And what we [see] in Libya now is a failed state."

During the time of the Libya intervention, Mr. Webb, then a U.S. senator from Virginia, adamantly opposed the U.S. getting into the Libya conflict. Mr. Webb, who announced an exploratory presidential committee in November, has since given speeches highlighting his national security background, formerly serving as a Marine and as Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan.

"It is not a healthy thing when the world's dominant military and economic power has a policy based on vagueness," Mr. Webb said in a speech at the National Press Club last year. "And so we ended up, and continue to be trapped, in the never-ending, ever-changing entanglements of the Middle East, beginning with the Pandora's box that was opened with the invasion of Iraq and continuing through the illogical and still-fermenting nightmare of the Arab Spring, particularly our inadvisable actions in Libya."

Mr. Webb declined The Times' request for an interview.

Although a long shot as a presidential contender due to Mrs. Clinton's brand name and establishment ties, Mr. Webb will be able to appeal to those within his party who want a different foreign policy with fewer military interventions, Democratic consultants say.

"Many Democrats have some concerns about our role in the Middle East," said Jim Manley, a Democratic strategist and former top staffer with Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and Harry Reid.

"Part of the issue is [Mrs. Clinton] voted for the authorization to go to war in Iraq, a vote that has since haunted her. If [Mr. Webb] were to go in, he has strong foreign policy and national security credentials he could use, and based on what I saw in the Senate, I assume those issues, and anything related to the armed forces, will be a big priority for him," Mr. Manley said.

Others agree.

"For those whose issue is foreign policy, but who want an option to the left of Clinton, yes, Webb could be the guy — and given his military background, it seems likely that's where he'll make his play," said Democratic strategist Christy Setzer, though she added that "as of now, there's no horse race; it's only Clinton."

Mr. Manley said the tougher battle for Mrs. Clinton may come when she has to answer to Republicans, who see her role in Libya and other actions as secretary of state as fraught with mismanagement and overreach.

Indeed, Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, who is expected to seek the Republican presidential nomination, already is making Mrs. Clinton's tenure running the State Department — and her involvement in Libya — a tenet of his campaign.

"I think there was a rush headlong toward war in Libya, and they weren't listening to anyone saying anything otherwise — including the defense department and intelligence communities, who were saying, 'hold on a minute, this may not be a good idea,'" Mr. Paul said. "Hillary's judgment has to be questioned — her eagerness for war in Libya should preclude her from being considered the next commander in chief."

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Trusted Hillary Clinton Aide Has a Full Plate // WSJ // Laura Meckler – July 10, 2015

There are legions of economists who have worked for the Clintons over the years, and more than 200 have helped develop the current campaign's economics platform.

The inner circle is much smaller, however. And at the center of it is a longtime aide to Hillary Clinton who has no particular background in economics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jake Sullivan, a 38-year-old who rose to prominence in Mrs. Clinton's State Department, now has the challenge of distilling advice from across the Democratic Party. The resulting plan will be the foundation of a Monday policy speech in which Mrs. Clinton intends to lay out her vision.

His challenge is evident in how the campaign has been buffeted by a surprising challenge from the left in the form of independent Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont. Part of the party's base wants to hear about government solutions for problems such as income inequality and wage stagnation, while its more centrist members emphasize prescriptions to stimulate economic growth.

While the subject material is new for Mr. Sullivan, colleagues say the process is familiar from his four years at Mrs. Clinton's side when she was secretary of state. Those who know Mr. Sullivan, from both sides of the aisle, commend his intelligence and his ability to pull ideas from across a wide universe while shaping a policy that suits his boss.

"He uses his access with her to be an honest broker with no preconceived agenda other than ensuring she has the best set of policy options to choose from," said Gene Sperling, a longtime economic adviser to Bill and Hillary Clinton who remains in her tight inner circle.

Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the Foundation for Defense of Democracies and a sharp critic of the Obama administration's nuclear talks with Iran, in which Mr. Sullivan played a big role, commends him for reaching out to those who dislike the direction of the negotiations.

"He engages with his critics, and that's rare," said Mr. Dubowitz, who added the administration should have done more to set a tough tone at the start of the talks, to allow for more concessions later.

Mrs. Clinton in 2012 sent Mr. Sullivan and another aide to Oman to meet secretly with Iran officials to gauge whether they were serious about potential compromises with the West. He concluded they were, setting the stage for the current talks.

On the economy, Mrs. Clinton has met with scores of experts on big issues such as income inequality and discrete topics including why states should publicize licensing rules for cosmetologists.

But the core brain trust is smaller. Besides Mr. Sullivan, who declined to comment through a campaign spokesman, prominent Clinton staffers include Ann O'Leary, who is developing proposals on education, health care and family issues, and Gary Gensler, a former Wall Street regulator who is the campaign's chief financial officer and who participates in economic-policy discussions as well. Maya Harris is charged with social policy such as immigration.

Outside the campaign's Brooklyn headquarters, two longtime Clinton aides are her most important economic advisers: Mr. Sperling and Neera Tanden, policy chief of the 2008 presidential campaign who is now president of the liberal think tank Center for American Progress.

Just a handful of other outsiders hold sway, according to people close to the process, including David Kamin, an expert on the federal budget and tax law at New York University's law school; Alan Krueger, a Princeton University economist who served as chairman of President Barack Obama's Council of Economic Advisers; Jacob Hacker, an expert on the politics of health and social policy at Yale University; Joseph Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize-winning economist at Columbia University; and Heather Boushey, chief economist at the Washington Center for Equitable Growth, a liberal think tank.

Mr. Sullivan, who also oversees foreign policy for the campaign, is hunting for someone to later handle economic policy, a campaign official said.

Few can match the level of trust he enjoys with the candidate. In her book "Hard Choices," Mrs. Clinton called him "earnest and brilliant," with credentials including a Rhodes scholarship, Yale law degree and Supreme Court clerkship. In 2008, he was a policy aide and ran debate preparation for Mrs. Clinton. He joined the Obama campaign for the general election.

Mr. Sullivan had planned to return to his Minnesota home to practice law and prepare for a likely run for Congress, but he was persuaded to join Mrs. Clinton at State, first as deputy chief of staff and then the youngest-ever director of policy planning. If Mrs. Clinton is elected president, Mr. Sullivan is seen as a potential national security adviser.

George W. Bush Hopes Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton 'Elevate the Discourse' // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 10, 2015

In his appearance in Texas with Bill Clinton on Thursday, George W. Bush called for an elevated political discourse in the 2016 presidential campaign, defended his difficult wartime decisions, and said he did not plan to campaign for his brother Jeb Bush.

Mr. Bush, speaking at an event with Mr. Clinton in Dallas, complained that the Internet "is a brutal place these days for political figures" and said it made the campaign discourse particularly nasty. But he attributed that to surrogates and not to the candidates themselves.

"I know Jeb and I'm confident Secretary Hillary will elevate the discourse," Mr. Bush said of his brother, a Republican, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, a Democrat. "I can't attest to their surrogates. I can attest to this surrogate: I'm not gonna be a surrogate."

Before announcing his presidential bid, Jeb Bush declared, "I love my father and my brother, but I am my own man," and much has been made about how much (or how little) he would rely on his brother as a campaigner, particularly given how George W. Bush is still very popular in pockets of the Republican Party, but remains a divisive figure to others.

The two former presidents, speaking to graduates of a jointly sponsored scholarship program at George W. Bush's presidential library, were both asked about their decision-making process. Mr. Clinton talked about the importance of postponing some critical decisions. "I'd say: 'Can I kill them tomorrow? Because I can't bring them back to life tomorrow.'"

Without directly commenting on the war in Iraq, Mr. Bush said the turbulent circumstances during his presidency (unlike the comparatively peaceful years in Mr. Clinton's two terms) "made it really imperative that you decide and decide decisively."

He said he "had to make decisions that protected the homeland — that was my goal and some of the decisions I had to make needed to be made pretty quickly because the enemy, that sadly still exists, doesn't really care whether a president agonizes over a decision or not."

Clinton plans Tuesday meetings with all Hill Democrats // Politico // Lauren French – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton will meet with the entire House Democratic caucus on Tuesday.

The former secretary of state was slated to meet with minority lawmakers from the Congressional Black Caucus, Congressional Hispanic Caucus and the Asian Pacific caucus but added another stop at the party's weekly caucus meeting to her Washington swing.

Developing a strong relationship with House members will be key for Clinton's campaign. Lawmakers have often felt ignored by the White House during President Barack Obama's tenure and Clinton is already making an effort to help Democratic lawmakers feel like they have a stake in her presidential bid.

She is also slated to meet with Senate Democrats, many of whom she knows from her tenure as a senator from New York before her 2008 presidential bid against Obama.
Former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley tours a section of Baltimore on Thursday, May 21, 2015. O'Malley is considering a run for President of the United States.

The Capitol Hill meetings are the most direct engagement from the Clinton campaign since she announced earlier this year. Her senior aides held a series of meet and greets but Clinton has yet to engage with the entire congressional Democratic caucus personally.

The meetings are being billed as policy discussions.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton makes Bob McDonnel look like a chump // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – July 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Post reports, “A federal appeals panel court on Thursday unanimously affirmed the public corruption convictions against former Virginia governor Robert F. McDonnell, writing in an 89-page opinion that the onetime Republican rising star ‘received a fair trial and was duly convicted by a jury of his fellow Virginians.'” Of most relevance and interest to other pols, McDonnell’s attorneys argued he had not performed any “official acts” in exchange for bribes. The court nixed that complaint:

The appeals court panel disagreed, asserting that the government had “exceeded its burden” of proof on the topic of official acts. The opinion cited three particular ways in which McDonnell tried to use his office to help Williams: trying to get researchers to study Williams’s product, Anatabloc; trying to the state tobacco commission to fund studies of an ingredient in his product; and trying to get Anatabloc included in the health insurance plan for state employees.

So a mere favor for a donor, even to move along the bureaucracy, can be an official act. In that case, Hillary Clinton’s e-mails — both the destroyed ones and the ones turned over — raise the question: Why is McDonnell going to jail and Clinton going on the presidential trail?

One answer is that with McDonnell, the prominence of a single donor and the proximity of communications to the minor official acts made the case easier to prove. Clinton benefits from taking so much money for so many over such a long time. This, mind you, does not mean she did not do official acts for donors or that there was an implicit back-scratching arrangement; it means only that it is hard to prove. And second, Hillary Clinton is Hillary Clinton. She can lie about a subpoena, destroy potentially incriminating evidence, violate the terms of her disclosure agreement and take money for her family’s foundation from an “Iranian businessman accused by the U.S. government of violating sanctions” as well as woman-abusing Arab regimes and Donald Trump. Democrats yawn. The media cover it for a day or two and then move on.

I’m not suggesting Hillary Clinton has committed a crime and should take the cell next to McDonnell. For one thing, no one has bothered to investigate her as McDonnell was when gift revelations came to light. (Imagine if a Republican had been in the White House and no Justice Department investigation of McDonnell took place.) I am saying without knowing anything more that it is hard to argue based on what we have already seen that Clinton meets the character test for the presidency. But that is for the voters to decide.

Other pols should be wary, however. They are far more likely to be held to the McDonnell standard than the Clinton standard.

Hillary Clinton probably can’t get gun control passed. But she should talk about it, anyway. // WaPo // Paul Waldman – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton is talking about guns, and everyone seems surprised. After all, doesn’t she know the issue is a sure loser for Democrats?

The truth is quite a bit more complicated than that — in fact, pushing for measures like expanded background checks is likely to help Clinton in the 2016 election. But if she’s going to promise to make headway on this issue, she needs to offer some plausible account of how as president she could make real progress where Barack Obama couldn’t.

Let’s address the matter of the gun issue’s political potency first. As is the case on so many issues, the Republican position is more popular when the questions are vague, while the Democratic position is more popular when the questions are specific. If you look at polling on guns, what you see is that the country is split pretty evenly on the broad question of whether gun laws should be more strict or less strict. But particular measures to regulate guns get much more support, especially universal background checks, which as many as nine out of ten Americans endorse.

At some point in this discussion, someone will always say: “But what about the NRA? They’re so powerful!” The NRA’s power is real in some ways and illusory in others, and it’s important to understand which is which. When it comes to lobbying, the NRA is indeed hugely powerful. It has the ability to stop any legislation on guns, often before it even gets written. But elections are an entirely different story. Almost all the congressional candidates who win the NRA’s supposedly coveted endorsement are Republican incumbents from conservative districts who win their elections by huge margins. When Republicans have a good election, as they did in 2014 and 2010, the NRA rushes to reporters to claim credit, saying the election proves that voters will punish any candidate who isn’t pro-gun. But when Democrats have a good election, as they did in 2012 and 2008, the NRA is strangely silent.

Gun ownership has been steadily declining since the 1970’s, and guns are more concentrated among voters that Democrats already won’t win and don’t need. For instance, according to the Pew Research Center, whites are twice as likely as Hispanics to own guns. If winning over Hispanic voters is the sine qua non of a Republican victory, advocacy for loosening gun laws isn’t exactly going to be part of a winning formula for the GOP. The person most likely to be a gun owner is a married white man from the South — in other words, probably a Republican.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When people argue that Hillary Clinton shouldn't touch the gun issue, watch out for comparisons to how Bill Clinton did in the Electoral College, because America's political geography is very different than it was two decades ago. For instance, I guarantee you that Senator Joe Manchin will at some point loudly advise that Clinton needs to tread carefully on guns if she's to win his home state of West Virginia like her husband did twice. But the truth is that Clinton is probably not going to win West Virginia no matter what she does, and she doesn't need to. Barack Obama's two comfortable Electoral College victories were built on combining Democratic strongholds in the Northeast and West with the more liberal states in the Midwest and the fast-changing Southwest, where Hispanic votes are key. Clinton will almost certainly seek to assemble the same map — and it's one where advocacy for the more popular gun restrictions will help her, not hurt her.

Still: if Clinton says it's vital to enact universal background checks and other "common-sense" gun laws, she has to explain how she's going to do it. Let's not forget that in the wake of the horrific Newtown massacre, a bipartisan measure to expand background checks failed to overcome a Republican filibuster in the Senate, falling six votes short of the 60 it needed. If a bill that had the support of 90 percent of the public couldn't make it past congressional Republicans just after 20 elementary school students had been murdered, how is Clinton going to convince them to vote for whatever she proposes?

But talking about gun measures in the presidential campaign could still have a practical impact, by elevating the issue and thereby making it more likely that more gun laws might be passed on the state level. And that's where all the action has been of late: since the Newtown shooting, there have been dozens of laws passed at the state level on the subject of guns, and they tell a story of red and blue America moving farther apart.

In Red America, one state after another has passed laws to expand who can get a gun and where you can take it. Last year Georgia passed a law allowing people to take guns into churches, government buildings, and bars. "Stand your ground" laws have proliferated in Republican-run states (despite the fact that research indicates that they increase the number of homicides).

Meanwhile in Blue America, dozens of laws have been passed to rein in guns. Legislatures in states like California, Maryland, and Connecticut expanded background checks, restricted access for those with mental illness or domestic abuse convictions, and made it harder to get assault weapons. In 2014, voters in Washington state passed a ballot initiative mandating universal background checks by a wide margin.

So when we talk about the gun issue, we have to keep three things in mind. First, the kind of restrictions Clinton is proposing are hugely popular. Second, there really are two Americas when it comes to guns. And third, one of those Americas has the ability and the desire to stop any gun legislation in Congress. If Hillary Clinton has a plan to deal with that last reality, it would be interesting to hear.

Jacob Lew: Americans Will Work Hard if Jobs Pay Decent Wages // WSJ // Nick Timiraos – July 10, 2015

Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew waded into a political spat over the economy sparked Wednesday when Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush said Americans needed to work longer hours to boost economic growth.

Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, said the comment referred to the elevated level of workers—some 6.5 million Americans—who have part-time jobs but desire full-time work. Democrats jumped on the comment earlier this week to portray Mr. Bush's comment in an unflattering light.

"It is a challenge for a lot of families to make ends meet. I don't think the problem is that Americans aren't willing to work hard," said Mr. Lew in response to a question Friday at an event in New York sponsored by Politico. "Americans are willing to work hard if there's work available to them and if they are paid a decent wage for that."

Mr. Lew said the government's job should be to provide anyone who is able and interested in working with the ability to get a job that can support a middle-class standard of living. He pointed to the White House's push to boost the federal minimum wage.

"If you work full time, you should not be below the poverty line in this country," he said.

Hillary Clinton bucks trend, confronts NRA // MSNBC // Steve Benen – July 10, 2015

In the three weeks since the mass shooting in Charleston, two notable statewide gun measures have been signed into law. In Wisconsin, Gov. Scott Walker (R) scrapped his state's 48-hour waiting period, and this week in Maine, Gov. Paul LePage (R) got rid of his state's concealed gun permit requirement.
The developments are a striking reminder about the politics of the gun issue. No matter how high-profile the shootings, and no matter how severe the public revulsion, proposals to scale back restrictions keep advancing.
At the national level, meanwhile, the massive Republican presidential field is largely unified on all gun-related questions, and recent history suggests the Democratic candidates will generally avoid the issue. But the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Washington Post had an interesting piece overnight highlighting the degree to which Hillary Clinton is pursuing her own course.

[I]n a sign that the political environment on guns has shifted in the wake of recent mass shootings – and of Clinton's determination to stake out liberal ground in her primary race against insurgent Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) – Clinton is not only initiating a debate about gun control but also vowing to fight the National Rifle Association.

"I'm going to speak out against the uncontrollable use of guns in our country because I believe we can do better," Clinton said Tuesday in Iowa City.

A few days earlier, she said in Hanover, N.H.: "We have to take on the gun lobby.... This is a controversial issue. I am well aware of that. But I think it is the height of irresponsibility not to talk about it."

The Post piece makes the case, persuasively, that this isn't the norm for recent Democratic candidates. None of the party's recent nominees in "several decades," including President Obama, emphasized the issue at all while on the campaign trail.

Clinton, however, is trying something different. It's worth appreciating why.

Some of this may be the result of a unique primary rival – Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is running to Clinton's left on some issues, but guns are a notable exception. The Independent senator describes himself as aiming for "the middle" on the issue and he has a voting record that arguably puts him well to the right of many Democratic activists.

It's possible, in other words, that Clinton is stressing the issue at this point to help exploit a gap between Sanders and the Democrats' progressive base.

But chances are, there's even more to it than this. Practically all of the leading Democratic presidential candidates have shied away from the issue, for over a generation, fearing a fierce backlash from far-right groups like the NRA.

Clinton no doubt realizes, however, that as the NRA becomes more extreme, there's no placating the group – it goes after Democrats whether they try to make the group happy or not. Just ask former Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), who eagerly tried to keep the NRA happy, but who found that the NRA targeted him with a vengeance anyway.

To this extent, the NRA has given up its credibility. The group's message used to effectively be, "Play ball with us and we'll leave you alone." That's transformed into, "We're coming after you, whether you try to work with us or not."

Given those incentives, Clinton might as well speak her mind, confident that the attacks are inevitable either way.

Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sander's awkward lunch // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti and Jonathan Topaz – July 10, 2015

When Hillary Clinton travels to Capitol Hill on Tuesday as part of her lawmaker charm offensive, she could be in for a slightly awkward encounter.

Bernie Sanders — the Independent who caucuses with Senate Democrats — will be sitting there at the weekly lunchtime meeting, as he always does, while the front-runner talks to her former colleagues.

It's hardly unusual for rival presidential candidates to gather together on the Hill — four Republican senators are currently running against each other, and other candidates occasionally visit — but in Clinton and Sanders' situation, the tension is a tad thicker.

That's because Clinton has the support of 30 Democratic senators already — including Sanders' Vermont colleague, Patrick Leahy — in her latest White House bid, while her opponent has the backing of none. Clinton has yet to even acknowledge her main rival by name on the campaign trail — despite recent polling that shows Sanders nipping at her heels in Iowa and New Hampshire, and despite being asked about him directly twice in a CNN interview this week.

"As far as Senate caucus politics go, this is probably as awkward as it's going to get. There's nothing he can do about it. It is what it is," said Jim Manley, a former veteran aide to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid and Ted Kennedy.

Beyond Sanders, however, the room Clinton addresses will also likely contain a handful of influential unaffiliated liberal senators — including progressive icon Elizabeth Warren and Ohio Sen. Sherrod Brown. Sanders recently said that he'd "love to have" Warren campaign with him, while the Massachusetts senator has said multiple times that it's premature to say whether she will.

But the meeting will also provide another reminder that, despite Sanders' huge crowds and scores of small-dollar donations, his candidacy remains mostly an afterthought at his place of business. Twenty-one members of the Congressional Progressive Caucus — Congress' leading caucus on liberal issues, in which Sanders is the lone senator — have endorsed Clinton, while none has endorsed Sanders. And Clinton's Tuesday swing across the Hill will include a meeting with that very group.

Sanders has had a similarly awkward reception with the party establishment back home in Vermont. In addition to Leahy, Gov. Peter Shumlin and Miro Weinberger, the mayor of Burlington — the city where Sanders served four terms as mayor and held his campaign kickoff — have also endorsed Clinton.

Clinton and Sanders have rarely crossed paths since they each announced their candidacies in April, save a chance run-in at New York's Penn Station last month. But Tuesday's encounter in Washington will likely be the second of at least three next week: they'll both appear in Kansas City at the National Council of La Raza conference on Monday, and they're both scheduled to speak at the Democrats' first cattle call of the cycle on Friday, the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame ceremony.

Clinton and Sanders overlapped for two years in the Senate before she left the Hill for Foggy Bottom, and they have a cordial relationship. But as the pair has emerged as the two leading candidates in the Democratic field, the apparent distance between them has grown: Sanders does not shy away from implicitly criticizing the front-runner on the stump, though he rarely goes after her by name.

Clinton, meanwhile, has started pressing harder on issues where Sanders is perceived as weak by the liberal base, such as gun control.

Nonetheless, tensions between the two aren't anything like the strained relations between Republican candidates, such as Sens. Lindsey Graham and Rand Paul, who frequently clash. Sanders sat in on a meeting of the Senate Democrats with Clinton's campaign chairman John Podesta and political director Amanda Renteria in late April, and his spokesman told POLITICO that the candidate "of course" planned to attend the event with Clinton herself. Clinton's campaign declined to comment for this story.

(Two other Democrats running for president — Lincoln Chafee and Jim Webb — are former senators, but they are not expected to attend the Senate caucus meeting.)

The former New York senator's Capitol Hill trip will also include meetings with the House Democrats and members of the Congressional Black Caucus, Congressional Hispanic Caucus, and Congressional Asian Pacific American Caucus.

And while the meeting will come days after Sanders attends a weekend retreat with Senate Democrats in Martha's Vineyard, the timing is unlikely to soften the impact of Clinton's appearance.

"She's going to be walking down that hallway with her vast entourage, people are going to be screaming out questions, and she's going to walk into that room to a rock star reception," Manley said.

Jeb Bush: Hillary Clinton 'can't be trusted' // Politico // Nick Gass – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton's greatest vulnerability? According to Jeb Bush, it's Hillary Clinton.

Asked the question in a preview of an interview with Fox News' Bret Baier, Bush responded: "It's her — just this protective shield she wants to create around her candidacy. I just don't think it's going to work."

Clinton "can't be trusted," Bush continued. "There is never a straight answer. Whether it's the server, the emails, Benghazi, [she] just constantly validates this notion that there are two sets of rules."

The former Florida governor rejected the notion that a potential general election match-up of a Bush against a Clinton would deter voter turnout.

"I'm going to win the nomination, and I'm going to run a campaign that will inspire people that their lives can get better," he said. "And that'll drive turnout, particularly among people who are conservative and they just don't know it yet."

Clinton's ability to be trusted has been the subject of scrutiny in the polls. Quinnipiac University surveys conducted last month in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania found wide skepticism of her trustworthiness.

But in an interview with CNN earlier this week, Clinton dismissed the idea that Americans have trust issues with her.

"People should and do trust me," she said, blaming a "barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right" for any perceptions to the contrary.

Hillary Clinton's union problem // Reuters // Luciana Lopez – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton's meeting with AFL-CIO leaders later this month will underscore just how much ground she has to make up with unions that are flatly angry at the presidential candidate over her recent policy stances (or lack thereof).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton can “absolutely not” take unions’ backing for granted, said RoseAnn DeMoro, the executive director of National Nurses United, the largest U.S. organization of registered nurses.

“I think that there was an assumption that whoever was anointed by the Democratic Party would be the candidate of organized labor. And I think that’s proven to be false,” she said.

In fact, DeMoro noted, “our values as a labor movement line up pretty clearly with the program of (Bernie) Sanders, the nurses’ values.”

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has drawn crowds of thousands to recent events, surprising many political observers and suggesting a stronger than expected challenge to Clinton.

Sanders, along with former Maryland Governor Martin O’Malley, will also speak to the AFL-CIO executive council at the July 29-30 meeting as part of the union’s endorsement process. All three candidates are Democrats; an endorsement is not necessarily expected this early in the road to the November 2016 election.

DeMoro also criticized Clinton and the Democratic Party on the Pacific Rim trade deal that the Obama administration is working on. Clinton has called for worker protections in any deal but has said little otherwise.

Thomas Buffenbarger, president of The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, also called for greater regulation of the financial industry.

“The re-imposition of Glass-Steagall legislation would kind of break up the big banks and put some sanity into the thing,” he said.

The Glass-Steagall Act of the last century separated investment banks and commercial banks in an effort to reduce risk in the banking system.

Buffenbarger also noted that his union is worried about the U.S. Export-Import Bank, which was forced to halt business after its charter expired on June 30.

The bank helps finance purchases by foreign companies of U.S. exports.

The three Democrats all returned questionnaires to the AFL-CIO as part of the endorsement process.

But they’re not the only ones, said Buffenbarger: “The surprise was Mike Huckabee,” who Buffenbarger said also returned a questionnaire.

Modern campaigning: The Hillary Quilt Project // CNN // Betsy Klein – July 10, 2015

The group assembles every Tuesday, toting fabric, needles, the occasional rhubarb pie and their "Iowans Ready for Hillary" pins.

For two hours, they talk 2016 while stitching a very political quilt.

"This is a supporter quilt. It's kind of a way to say to Hillary, 'We've got your back,'" Iowan Clara Oleson said.

For Clinton supporters, this quilt has special significance: It's a sign of organization and momentum for a campaign that needs to ignite enthusiasm for Clinton during her second race in the Hawkeye State. In 2008, Clinton's bid for the presidency faltered here and never recovered.

Many Iowans said in interviews they had felt ignored by Clinton's campaign the last time around. Connecting supporters over shared interests such as quilting offers one way to excite and engage them.

Clinton's campaign in Iowa, the first-in-the-nation caucus state, has 27 organizers who have held over 2,500 meetings with Iowans. In addition to the Hillary Quilt Project, they've launched a morning swim group in Cedar Rapids, a Kayaking group in Benton County, and a group that is working on a community garden in Eastern Iowa.

It's a strategy, much like church small groups, that draws in supporters to connect beyond the more broadly labeled coalition-building of campaigns past (for example, "Teachers for Hillary").

"It used to be just strictly coalition-building. You'd get this wide swath of teachers for whoever your candidate was, or farmers, or business owners," said Iowa Republican strategist Tim Albrecht. "But now, you're really seeing this organizing at the micro level. If you can attract people around something they are already doing ... that's priceless."

With these grassroots common interest groups, the Clinton campaign is harnessing micro-organization at a level unmatched by her competitors in Iowa and around the country.

There's a long history of quilting in American politics: Women gathered to stitch during the Civil War, supporters of the late 19th century temperance movement created quilts as fundraisers, and more recently, the AIDS Memorial Quilt has been growing since 1987 with more than 48,000 individual memorial panels.

In a state where the presidential campaign process is revered, quilts are also engrained in Iowa culture, Oleson explained. Quilts are made for momentous occasions: new babies, graduations, anniversaries, and now, a new presidential campaign.
When the Clinton campaign unveiled its H logo this spring, Oleson saw an opportunity.

"Boy, this would make a great quilt," Oleson wrote of the logo on Facebook.
Clinton campaign organizer Sarah Andrews also saw an opportunity -- and hours later, was in Oleson's living room.

The "Hillary Quilt Project" was born.

"If there's a common touch in democracy," Oleson said, "My God, it's a quilt."

Oleson, 73, is a retired lawyer and a prolific quilter -- just don't ask her how long she's been working on any particular quilt. On one week this summer, she led the men and women in the group as they went around the quilt circle, introducing themselves and choosing the color in the rainbow "H" logo of the quilt that they found most meaningful.

Ellen Heywood chose purple, the color of women's suffrage. Janean Arnold chose green for her concerns about climate change. Colleen Picek chose yellow, supporting the troops and hoping for an end to war.

Cameron Macaw-Hennick chose all of the colors together.

"All of the colors in the center are important to me because of the rainbow. Something that really stands out to me about Hillary, from the very get-go, is her unequivocal support of the LGBT community, which she didn't have several years ago. But just like everyday citizens, she grows and changes," he said as he stitched.

Macaw-Hennick is a campaign volunteer from Cedar Rapids who also happens to be a skilled quilter. He and his husband are ardent Hillary Clinton supporters.

"The day she announced, I was jumping up and down. My husband is super excited, as well... I said I have to be involved in this campaign."

Later, the group continued to stitch while supporter Julie Kline read aloud from the Gaza chapter of Clinton's 2014 memoir, "Hard Choices."

Participants in the Hillary Quilt Project range from veteran quilters to a few who had never even picked up a needle.

The quilt, Oleson said, exists in two worlds: physically in West Branch, and in "virtual reality," with its own Facebook page. Recently it was even featured on Clinton's official campaign Twitter account, which has nearly four million followers.

"It's good for quilting and it's good for Hillary," she said of the project.

"The dance of democracy in Iowa is a privilege and an honor," Oleson, who supported President Barack Obama in 2008, said.

"I've done it for 50 years and this is one of the most fun dances I've done. People working together, doing something they'd never do, and this campaign is open to that kind of an idea."

Once the quilt is done, the quilters and other Clinton supporters will sign their names on it. Oleson hopes the quilt will be signed and seen by many people, including Clinton herself.

"I want to see her standing in front of the quilt and giving a speech," she said. "You also make a quilt for the future, and sometimes you think about where is the quilt going to end up. It's not going to end up in somebody's closet -- it's going to hang on somebody's wall or in a presidential library."

CNN caught up with Oleson at Clinton's Monday town hall event in nearby Iowa City. Olseon had the opportunity to speak with Clinton following her speech.

"She knows about the quilt," Oleson said proudly. "And she says it's beautiful."

Gowdy: 'Pulling teeth' to get info for Benghazi investigation // CNN // Daniella Diaz – July 10, 2015

House Select Committee on Benghazi Chairman Trey Gowdy said Friday that the Obama administration could speed up the Benghazi investigation if they turned over the requested relevant documents, but they haven't cooperated.

Gowdy told CNN's Brianna Keilar that his panel has been specific with the administration about the documents needed to be turned over for the investigation.

"They begged us to narrow it so we narrowed it," he said. "It's still like pulling teeth to get the information."

Gowdy told CNN that so far, the documents that have been turned over haven't been helpful toward their investigation into the 2012 Benghazi attack.

"You know what we got last week? We got 3,600 pages, half of which were press clippings, including articles about Richard Gere," he said. "So if that is their idea of complying with a congressional investigation, then we are going to be at this for a long time."

He also told CNN that Hillary Clinton was wrong when she said that she'd never had a subpoena in her interview with CNN.

"That is demonstrably false," Gowdy told CNN. "You have an obligation to preserve the public record."

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill told CNN that the former Secretary of State understood the question to be if she was under subpoena when the emails were deleted, this past December.

Gowdy said there were other subpoenas prior the one he issued to Clinton in March 2015 and that she has a "statutory obligation" to preserve public records.

"There are at least three separate legal obligations that should have informed and instructed her not to delete emails or wipe her server clean," he told CNN.

Hillary Clinton directs support for One Direction // CNN // Deena Zaru – July 10, 2015

British boy band sensation One Direction teamed up with charity Action2015 and asked their millions of fans or "Directioners" to share videos and pictures that reflect issues that are important to them, ahead of the United Nation's climate change summit in Paris this September.

Among the many fans who answered the foursome's call is Democratic presidential candidate and possible Directioner Hillary Clinton.

Clinton tweeted her support for the boy band's cause Friday, saying "the boys are right."

In a video released Wednesday, Harry Styles, Niall Horan, Louis Tomlinson and Liam Payne called for action on "extreme poverty, inequality and climate change" — all of which are key focuses of the Clinton campaign.

This is not the first time that Clinton was linked to the young foursome.

In March, former One Direction member Zayn Malik's departure from the band devastated fans and erupted shock waves on social media. There was speculation over a possible fifth member of One Direction.

While hosting the MTV Movie Awards the same day that Clinton announced her presidential bid, comedian and actress Amy Schumer joked about the "big news" and announced that "after months of speculation, Hillary Clinton finally announced she's taking Zayn's spot in One Direction."

House Of Cards Creator: Hillary Clinton Is The Real Claire Underwood // BuzzFeed // Jim Waterson and Lynzy Billing – July 10, 2015

Lord Dobbs, the creator of House of Cards, is considering which real-life individual is closest to Claire Underwood, the ice-cold political wife played by Robin Wright in the Netflix series.

"Hillary [Clinton]," Dobbs says after a moment's thought. "She is a political figure in her own right – behind the scenes, but now increasingly in front of the scenes. That is much more of a Claire character than, for instance, Cherie [Blair], who as far as I'm aware didn't become actively aware in politics as such."

It's not necessarily the endorsement the US presidential candidate would be after but Dobbs is obsessed with the character of the former first lady and how it'll affect her run for the top job.

"I'm fascinated by Hillary of course, because she comes with so much baggage," he tells BuzzFeed News, sitting on a bench outside parliament, dressed in a crisp white shirt and cufflinks. "That baggage is her strength but also her vulnerability. We just have to wait and see where the balance lies on that. Though it is bizarre that the system that was bred out of [rejection of a King] has produced the Bushes, the Kennedys, the Clintons, the Roosevelts…."

What about the real-life President Underwood? "More Tony Blair than Margaret Thatcher. Thatcher left behind something called Thatcherism, we all know what we stood for and I'm buggered if I know what Tony Blair stood for other than being in office."

And troubled political aide Doug Stamper? "In terms of focus and loyalty, apart from myself of course, it'd be Alastair [Campbell] in the UK."

Dobbs knows what he's talking about when it comes to political narratives. He first created House of Cards as a novel in the late 1980s. A former assistant to Thatcher, he was the first person to tell her that she had won the 1979 general election but was later sacked by his political idol, "She attacked me horribly and grossly unfairly". He turned to writing and watched as his creation became a BBC TV series, followed by a highly successful American reboot for Netflix in 2013. He's stayed actively involved all the way, offering advice to the production team and is currently promoting the DVD release of series three.

He's also a rare beast: a writer and an active parliamentarian – a believer in small government, he enjoys a "hugely disruptive and distracting" three days a week as a Conservative member of the House of Lords where he helped to lay the ground for the forthcoming referendum on Britain's membership of the European Union. However, Dobbs keeps his personal politics out of his writing because it bores the audience: "Once people start writing through political prejudice then it's not likely to be very successful.

In House of Cards, for instance, I defy you to remember a single bit of the actual politics that was written about. It's about the people in politics."

The first three series dealt with Underwood's rise from Congress to the top job, but despite the show currently at the end of Francis' first term as president, Dobbs dismisses suggestions the show necessarily has to come to an end any time soon. That's for the simple reason that there's always something else for the characters to do: "Some programmes have the ability to go on and on forever – those are the ones that are based around relationships. How long can a show go on that is focused on a relationship between two people – Francis and Claire – I don't know. But it's not just about power, it's also about their relationship which gives [the show] legs. It has is a global audience, there are more watchers in China than in America."

He talks with pride about the quality of the set and the people involved: "People have come from the White House to inspect the set and their jaws have dropped. Even the doors of the Oval Office close with the same quiet thud as they do. It's actually a third larger than the real Oval Office but everything is sourced to be just right in meticulous detail; even light switches and door knobs."

He's planning to keep working on the show as well as a new project with Adam Price, the creator of Borgen and a proposed work about Winston Churchill. He says he wouldn't ever write a character based on Ed Miliband ("certainly not as a lead figure") but he's optimistic about a political culture that is more engaged and less dependent on traditional sources of information: "People are beginning to bother again now and make up their own minds – The Sun Wot Won It? Not any more. It never did in the first place but certainly not any more. There are no secrets anymore, everything you do or say will come out eventually – the question is when and does it matter?"

At the same time, he wants to take an active role in the negotiations over a referendum on the UK's continued membership of the European Union, touring the country and speaking to the public.

But if he's willing to make that commitment, surely he already knows which way he'll campaign in the referendum?

"It depends! I will wait to see what the prime minister comes back with [from negotiations with EU leaders]. It would require returning some important powers, not just a standstill. Everyone in Europe knows the system is screwed and could be screwed magnificently over Greece. It is madness to put institutions before the people they are meant to serve. 50% youth unemployment in Greece is not their fault – that is the madness, Brussels thinks there is a way to make the Greeks to pay their debts back. There's no way of paying it back! They are bankrupt!"

So is he a libertarian? "Well, I'm not a great believer in big government: the more government promises, the less it delivers, that's been my entire experience. It'd be wonderful if we could find a way for people to say 'I want government less in my life and for me to get on with it more'. There are plenty of people who need government, it has got to a point where the system isn't working anymore."

Ultimately Dobbs credits his sacking from the 1980s Conservative government by Britain's first female prime minister as the moment that gave the world one of the greatest ever political dramas: "Politics is cruel. If you go into politics to be cuddled and be hugged the whole time then you're in the wrong business. That was the start of House of Cards."

"To that extent, I owe it all to Maggie."

Beghazi Committee Chairman: Clinton's Made "Maybe Half Dozen Demonstrably False Statements" // BuzzFeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 10, 2015

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the Republican chairman of the House Benghazi Committee, said Hillary Clinton has made "maybe" a "half dozen" false statements about her compliance with the committee's requests and her exclusive use of a private email server during her time at the State Department.

"We're getting up near maybe half dozen demonstrably false statements," the South Carolina congressman said on the Mike Gallagher Show Thursday.

Gowdy said Clinton should turn her private email server over to the State Department's inspector general for review.

"Let the inspector general make sure that the public record was intact and not your own lawyers," said Gowdy.

Clinton turned over about 55,000 pages of emails to the State Department last December. Clinton's team decided which emails were personal and which were official government records that needed to be turned over to the State Department. Her lawyer told the Benghazi Committee in March that her server was wiped and the emails were deleted after they were turned over.

Clinton said in an interview with CNN she hadn't received a subpoena for emails from her time as secretary of state. A spokesperson for Clinton told CNN after the interview that Clinton was responding to the suggestion that she was under subpoena when her emails were deleted in December. Clinton was subpoenaed by the Benghazi Committee in March.

Clinton Foundation Donor Violated Iran Sanctions, Tried to Sells 747s to Tehran // Daily Beast // Michael Weiss and Alex Shirazi – July 10, 2015

An Iranian businessman accused by the U.S. government of violating sanctions on Tehran donated money to the Clinton Foundation, The Daily Beast has confirmed.

Vahid Alaghband's Balli Aviation Ltd., a London-based subsidiary of the commodities trading firm Balli Group PLC, tried to sell 747 airplanes to Iran, despite a federal ban on such sales. The company pleaded guilty to two counts of criminal information in 2010. In its plea agreement with the Department of Justice, Balli Aviation agreed to pay a $2 million criminal fine, serve five years corporate probation, and pay an additional $15 million in civil fines. The hefty sum was "a direct consequence of the level of deception used to mislead investigators," Thomas Madigan, a top Justice Department official, said at the time.

Alaghband is one of an array of questionable actors who've been found in recent months to give to the Clinton Foundation. The gifts – from foreign governments with human rights violations like Qatar, Algeria, Saudi Arabia and China as well as FIFA, soccer's corrupt governing body – have complicated Hillary Clinton's campaign for president and raised questions as to whether these entities were trying to curry favor with the former Secretary of State.

But Alaghband stands out from the rest, because the beneficiary of his firm's deals with Tehran was an Iranian airline accused by the U.S. government of working with the regime's foreign intelligence operatives and shipping arms and troops to Syria. Plus, if an agreement between Iran and the world's major powers is concluded in the coming days – as is widely expected – operators like Alaghband could stand to benefit. Hillary Clinton will be put in the awkward position of either defending the act of the Obama administration in which she once served or criticizing the culmination of a U.S.-Iran rapprochement effort, which her State Department began.

One of the two counts against Balli Aviation was that it "conspired to export three Boeing 747 aircraft from the United States to Iran," according to a Justice Department statement, without first obtaining the necessary export licenses from the U.S. government. The company then used its Armenian airline subsidiary to buy the 747s with financing obtained from Mahan Air, Iran's largest private airline, which is thought by the State Department to be controlled by former Iranian President Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani.

In 2011, the Treasury Department sanctioned the airline for "providing financial, material and technological support to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps-Qods Force (IRGC-QF)," or the expeditionary arm of the Islamic Republic's praetorian military division, now heavily active in both Syria and Iraq. At the time, the Treasury Department accused the Qods Force of "secretly ferrying operatives, weapons and funds" on Mahan flights.

On the Clinton Foundation website, Alaghband's company is listed as a donor in the $10,001 to $25,000 bracket. Moreover, on the website for Balli Real Estate, a property investment and development subsidiary also based in the UK, his personal bio describes him as a member of the Clinton Global Initiative.

This affiliation, along with his donation to the Foundation, came as a surprise to Alaghband.

"I am not a member of the Clinton Global Initiative," he told The Daily Beast from London. "I attended a few meetings. The last meeting was 10 years ago. I don't recall having ever made a contribution." Asked why he was listed as a member of the CGI on his own corporate website, he said: "I haven't seen this website recently. If attending a few meetings makes you a member, I don't know."

A source familiar with the Clinton Foundation told The Daily Beast that "Vahid Alaghband was never a member of CGI in a personal capacity." However, the source added, "In 2007, Balli Group paid a onetime CGI membership fee and they designated him as their delegate to the meeting."

Alaghband did recall giving money to another influential organization — the Washington, D.C.-based think tank the Brookings Institution. The donation he gave was to Brookings' former Middle East policy shop, the Saban Center, which had been named for its major benefactor, the Israeli billionaire Haim Saban. (Staunchly pro-Israel, Saban is also, coincidentally, an avowed supporter of Hillary Clinton's presidential ambitions.)

In 2007, Alaghband offered to give a $900,000 donation to run for three years to Brookings via the U.S.-based PARSA Foundation, "the first Persian community foundation in the U.S. and the leading Persian philanthropic institution practicing strategic philanthropy and promoting social entrepreneurship around the globe," as the foundation's website describes it.

Emails obtained in the discovery process of a separate libel case show that Alaghband, who had already donated at least $50,000 to PARSA, initially intended to make a pass-through donation via the foundation to Brookings.

But Alaghband says that he never ultimately used PARSA as a conduit for his donation; instead made his contribution directly to the Saban Center. He claims that the amount given was "far less" than $900,000 but declined to specify how much. Furthermore, he insisted, the money wasn't ear-marked for any specific project or research use. "Our donation went to the Saban Center and they had full discretion as to what to do with it," Alaghband said. "Martin Indyk had discretion over the use of the funds."

Indyk, who headed the Saban Center from 2002 to 2013, is today the Vice President and Director for Foreign Policy at Brookings. He also served— twice—as U.S. ambassador to Israel under the Clinton administration. In 2013, Secretary of State John Kerry named Indyk the U.S. envoy to the Middle East.

"When we took the donation nobody knew there were any problems with Alaghband," David Nassar, the Vice President of Communications for Brookings, told The Daily Beast, speaking on behalf of the think tank. Nassar also specified that the donation came from Balli Group bank accounts, not from Alaghband's personal accounts. (Full disclosure: Daily Beast executive editor Noah Shachtman previously did work as a non-resident fellow in Brookings' foreign policy division.)

Asked why he was listed as a member of the Clinton Global Initiative on his own corporate website, he said: "I haven't seen this website recently."
A former Brookings staffer with direct knowledge of the donation told The Daily Beast said that, on the contrary, Alaghband's problems with the U.S. government were known to the think tank at the time and that the money helped finance the work of Suzanne Maloney, a former State Department policy advisor and Republican advocate of U.S.-Iranian rapprochement.

Nassar told The Daily Beast that the suggestion that Alaghband's donation was intended to bolster Maloney's pro-rapprochement research was false. "The money was general funding for the Persian Gulf Initiative and not directed at any particular issue or any particular scholar," he said. Nevertheless, the Persian Gulf Initiative was a program run by the Saban Center and Maloney worked on it.

Maloney is married to Ray Takeyh, an Iran scholar who served in the Obama White House in 2009 and who, during that period, was one of the lead advocates of engagement with Tehran.

Since leaving the administration, Takeyh has emerged as a scathing critic of his former employer's nuclear diplomacy. But in 2008, Maloney and Takeyh jointly published a 34-page white paper with the Saban Center titled, "Pathway to Coexistence: A New U.S. Policy toward Iran." Arguing that the longstanding U.S. policy of containment "is actually obsolete because Iran is no longer an expansionist power," they called not for a mere "policy shift but for a paradigm change" in Washington.

In many ways, the paper essentially forecasted what Obama administration's approach to dealing with Iran, from the largely hands-off approach to Iran's bloody 2009 Green Revolution to the present-day compromises on its nuclear program.

Alaghband's legal troubles did not appear to affect his relationship with Brookings a year after Balli Aviation was hit by the U.S. Commerce Department with a temporary ban on his Iranian export business. In February 2009, he spoke at the U.S.-Islamic World Forum in Doha, where Brookings has another Middle East center, this one bankrolled by the Qatari government. The forum, in fact, was organized by the Saban Center on behalf of that government.

Alaghband, for his part, insists that he did nothing wrong, despite his company's guilty plea.

"The settlement [with the Justice Department] was one under which we did not have to accept liability. We just agreed to make a payment and settle out of court," he told The Daily Beast. "We had to establish a compliance program and do all of those things. The transactions we were engaged in was reviewed by and subject to a legal to a legal opinion both in the UK and U.S. about the compliance of with sanctions. We proceeded on this basis."

The settlement also represented the largest civil penalty ever imposed by the Commerce Department's Bureau of Industry and Security.

PARSA's second largest recipient of grants is the National Iranian American Council (NIAC), a Washington, D.C.-based lobby group close to the Iranian regime, which advocates an end to all U.S. sanctions on Iran. It received a total received a total of $591,500 from the foundation. Alaghband's brother, Hassan Alaghband, who is also the CEO of the Balli Group, spoke at a organized conference in Tehran by one of NIAC's founders in June 2007, at which he spoke about Western companies doing business in Iran and cited Balli's client, Caterpillar, as a case study.

The Balli Group PLC had once been the world's second-largest steel trader but it declared bankruptcy in 2013. A major reason for its folding? U.S. sanctions on Iran.

Hillary's Strategy Is Actually Brilliant // Daily Beast // Nick Gillespie – July 10, 2015

Has any future president been more misunderstood than Hillary Clinton?

As someone who cannot imagine any possible scenario in which I would cast a ballot for the former Secretary of State, U.S. Senator, First Lady, and Goldwater Girl, I note this with a heavy heart. But Clinton's deafening and widely criticized silence since announcing her candidacy isn't a weakness or a failing on her part. It underscores exactly the professionalism, strategizing, and discipline that explain why she is atop the polls.

She has nothing to gain and everything to lose from shooting off her mouth for at least the rest of the year. Like an aging boxer who survives more by smarts than by slugging, Clinton knows that the fight for the White House is a 15-round bout that will certainly go the distance. Only a showboating chump would punch themselves out in the early rounds.

Sure, over the past few weeks, she's lost some ground among Democratic voters to socialist Bernie Sanders. But she's still ahead of him, not to mention the ever-growing gaggle of Republican rivals. Sure, ever since announcing she was running for president, Clinton has stayed awfully quiet, popping up in Chipotle surveillance camera footage like Patty Hearst on the lam and eschewing actual public events for "intimate" meetings with vetted, handpicked supporters.

On the rare occasions when she does step out of her bubble, things have gotten hinky, like when she literally roped off the press during a Fourth of July parade in New Hampshire. The optics of that scene—photogs and journos being physically restrained from getting close enough to her highness to take good pics or ask embarrassing queries—would be shame-inducing if not suicide-inducing to most candidates.

But do we need to spell it out, really? Hillary Clinton is not most candidates.

Hillary is turning into a defensive master, but on her own terms.
She's learned from the acknowledged master—husband Bill, who can't even be bothered to flatly promise not to give paid speeches if he becomes First Dude—that there's never a reason to give in to common decency and slink off into the dark night of political oblivion. Hillary Clinton hasn't driven a car since 1996 and it's a safe bet that she hasn't felt shame for even longer.

Since announcing for president, Clinton has granted exactly one television interview, with CNN's Brianna Keilar, and smartly used the occasion to attack the Republican field for their weak-tea responses to Donald Trump's muy stupido assertion that Mexican immigrants are mostly rapists. Indicating that she was "disappointed" (read: elated) "in those comments," Clinton went on to note that her Republican rivals "are all in the same general area on immigration."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The worst part of that? She's absolutely right. Once the party of near-open borders (watch this video from 1980 in which Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush one up each other on praising the contributions of illegal immigrants), today's GOP, with minor exceptions, vilifies the wretched yearning to breathe free, at least when they come from Latin America.

In 2004, George Bush won 44 percent of the Hispanic vote. Eight years later, Mitt Romney—who counseled that illegal immigrants should practice "self-deportation"—pulled just 27 percent. In the GOP "autopsy" of Romney's failure in 2012, the authors wrote, "If Hispanic Americans hear that the GOP doesn't want them in the United States, they won't pay attention to our next sentence." Given the way that the current candidates have been non-reacting to Trump, that might be the best outcome the Republican Party could hope for.

Against such a backdrop, Clinton is right to keep mum, except when making easy layups against her opponents. Let Bernie Sanders whip Democrats into a progressive frenzy and then step in with vague nods toward equality and growth for all. She knows full well that Sanders is not her real rival—that will be the GOP nominee, not a frothing-at-the-mouth socialist from a state with a population smaller than Washington, D.C.

She also knows as well as anyone that her toughest challenge will be sweetening the air of inevitability that surrounds her like noxious second-hand smoke. No one outside of their immediate families wants to see a Clinton-Bush contest, but such a showdown is more likely than not. She may indeed be as "arrogant" as Commentary and a thousand other similar publications contend, but she's likely smart enough to realize that nothing humanizes her more than right-wing outlets foaming at the mouth about everything from blowjobs to Benghazi.

This is not to say that she's a perfect candidate. In fact, the roping off of journalists—on a day celebrating indepence, no less!—suggests Hillary Clinton is in many ways singularly off-putting. Her feminist bona fides were rightly called into question during her time as First Lady, her time as senator from New York was unmemorable, and her tenure as secretary of state nothing short of disastrous. When under attack, she's capable of mind-bogglingly stupid comments, like when she started talking about Bobby Kennedy's assassination during the end days of her 2008 run for the Democratic nomination.

This is why she is smart to be running rope-a-dope strategy, essentially letting her opponents (Democratic and Republican) punch themselves out in the early rounds. When they've taken their best shots and mostly exhausted themselves, she can come off the ropes and throw a haymaker or two. Along with forgoing shame, this is another great tactical advantage she's learned from her husband.

Bill Clinton outlasted his opponents—think Newt Gingrich and a gaggle of moralistic congressmen, many of whom had skeletons of their own to hide. Bill was like Muhammad Ali taking on George Foreman in the jungle heat, a personable motormouth who loved to talk and press the flesh (sometimes a bit too much, to be sure). Hillary is turning into a defensive master, but on her own terms. She's more like Floyd Mayweather, nobody's idea of a fun person to hang out with, but capable of taking huge amounts of punishment and coming off the ropes in the late rounds to secure victory.

If the eventual Republican nominee—whether it's Jeb Bush or Rand Paul or god help us all Donald Trump—wants a real chance at the crown, they'd do best to back away from Hillary and the anger-bear rhetoric that only makes her more sympathetic. The nominee would do well to outline an actually positive and inclusive message about how they plan to guide the country into the 21st century rather than constantly harp on last century's scandals, the need for even newer and bigger wars, and protecting us from the scourge of immigrants so desperate for a better life that they're willing to risk arrest to come to America.

A Republican employing positive rhetoric—which is exactly how Barack Obama toppled Clinton in 2008—would pull her out of her crouch and cause her to swing recklessly and wildly. In all that lunging, she'd be likely to knock herself out. But so long as the Republicans keep smacking themselves in the face, she's smart to hold her punches.

Clinton camp on Bush's fundraising: It should scare you // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign is looking to turn Jeb Bush's money into her own.

The Republican presidential candidate's super PAC announced Thursday a record-shattering $103 million fundraising haul, an astonishing number even in the post-Citizens United era. That's almost quadruple the amount of money every super PAC had raised by this point in the 2012 election cycle combined, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, and more than the pro-Obama super PAC Priorities USA, which is now backing Clinton, raised in two years during the last presidential election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's campaign is sounding the alarm, even as allies see a potential silver lining in Bush's haul.

On Friday, Clinton finance director Dennis Cheng sent an email to supporters pleading for contributions with the subject line: "Hillary needs you." In the email, Cheng said he had "bad news" and noted that Bush's campaign and super PAC had raised a combined $114 million. "If that number scares you, good. It should," Cheng warned.

"[T]here's a point at which it may be too much – when we can't make up for it by organizing better and spending our resources more wisely," Cheng continued. "We cannot hit that point, especially this early in the campaign."

But the Clinton campaign is hardly broke.

Last week, her campaign announced that it had raised $45 million since it launched – the most any primary candidate had raised in history. Priorities USA, that super PAC supporting Clinton, announced that it raised $15.6 millions so far this year, almost all of it coming in the previous four weeks.

Clinton has been on a break-neck fundraising spree since announcing her campaign in April, hopscotching across the country to attend dozens of $2,700 per head fundraises. Aware of Team Bush's goal of raising more than $100 million, Clinton's campaign pushed back her big kick-off rally in part to give her more time to fundraise. Donors reported intense pressure to get checks in early, and Clinton has gone hardly more than a few days between fundraisers.

Bush's haul is daunting, but not surprising since his campaign telegraphed their goal. And some Clinton allies insist it could actually help encourage their donors to pony up. "It's obviously an impressive number. But it could be good for us, it's not easy to raise money against nothing. We now have a real threat that should motivate our prospective donors to step up in a way most haven't yet," said one source in the pro-Clinton super PAC world, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

There are also downsides to Bush in raising most of his money via super PACs instead of campaigns. Super PACs are legally prohibited from coordinating with campaigns, so the candidate has little say in how the money is spent or what the super PAC does. For instance, Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley was recently forced to publicly denounce an ad made by the super PAC supporting him attacking Bernie Sanders on gun control.

And campaigns get a discounted rate not available to super PACs when it comes to purchasing TV ads, the main expenditure of super PACs. That means campaigns can run more ads for less money than super PACs, potentially paying huge dividends. Mitt Romney learned this the hard way when he and his super PAC outspent Obama by almost a third, but ended up running 50,000 fewer ads nonetheless.

"Hillary's $45m in campaign money is much more valuable to her campaign than Jeb's $100m in Super Pac money is to his," former Obama official Dan Pfeiffer said on twitter.

And Clinton allies note that Bush's super PAC may not be able to repeat its massive haul again. Bush himself led the PAC and made personal appeals to donors on its behalf, something he is now prohibited from doing since he's an official candidate. Enthusiasm could drop off if Bush is no longer involved.

But even setting aside the super PAC, Clinton could fall behind Bush. Bush's official campaign managed to out-compete Clinton's record-breaking haul in one key measure. Bush's campaign raised $11.4 million to Clinton's $45 million, but he did it just 16 days compared to Clinton's 81. That breaks down to $555,555 a day for Clinton, but $712,500 per day for Bush.

Bush's sprint could just capture the boost of enthusiasm any candidate receives after they announce, and his numbers could drop off afterwards. Meanwhile, he'll be preoccupied with the Republican presidential primary and will have to spend most of money bashing Republicans before he even makes it to the general election – if he makes it at all.

But it could also spell trouble for Clinton is she continues to be out-raised among both Bush's campaign and super PAC.

Medical Bill: Mystery donor picked up $150G tab for 2010 Clinton speech // Fox // Malia Zimmerman – July 10, 2015

It was a big coup when a nonprofit medical trade group landed Bill Clinton as a speaker at its 2010 annual conference in Chicago -- so big that some members wondered how the former president was being paid.

Not to worry, members of the Radiological Society of North America were told: An anonymous donor footed his bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The $150,000 fee was a mere fraction of the $48 million Clinton took in from 215 speeches between 2009 and 2013, while his wife was secretary of state. Who paid Clinton and why they thought it was a fair bargain may never be known — but government watchdogs say it is a prime example of how elusive accounting can be for the ex-president's eye-popping earnings.

It was clear, however, that the husband of America's top diplomat was not chosen for his medical expertise.

“I think this is interesting that you would ask me to come and speak today to a group of people from all over the world, and everyone of you knows more about the subject than I do,” Clinton said at the beginning of his 45-minute address to an audience of 4,250.

Dr. Sam Friedman, a radiologist from Columbia, SC., said at first he was “peeved” when he heard Clinton was paid $150,000 for the “rambling” speech, during which Clinton took several “gratuitous shots” at Republicans and blamed U.S. doctors for many of the healthcare problems in third world countries. When he and like-minded members made their objections known to the organization, they were told the fee was paid by an “anonymous” donor.

Radiological Society of North America spokesman Marijo Millette told FoxNews.com the group “strives to provide compelling speakers that will satisfy the educational needs and special interests of a diverse audience.”

Millette would not comment on Friedman's claim, which was also reported by trade media, but said Clinton's fee and travel expenses were paid to the Harry Walker Agency, which represents Clinton. The organization’s 990 forms, filed with the Internal Revenue Service and required to maintain its 501(c)3 status, do not list any payment to Clinton or his representative. Neither the executive director nor three executive board members contacted by FoxNews.com would divulge who paid Clinton's fee.

Matthew Whitaker, executive director of the Foundation for Accountability & Civic Trust, a Washington-based, non-partisan campaign and ethics watchdog group, said the anonymous donation “opens up a Pandora’s box of questions including who funded this speech and what their motivations were.”

“This issue has to be resolved," Whitaker told FoxNews.com. "There has to be an answer as to who gave the money. “It has the smell of someone trying to move money through an organization to curry favor with the former president. It also calls into question almost every speech Bill Clinton as made and who the ultimate funder is.”

Neither Clinton's representatives at Harry Walker nor at the Clinton Foundation responded to a request for the name of the mystery sponsor. It was not clear if other speeches by Clinton were similarly funded by anonymous third parties.

Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, a Washington D.C.-based government watchdog foundation, said much of the $48 million Bill Clinton made from 215 speeches during the time Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State went to the Clintons' personal coffers, not to the foundation. Federal disclosure forms filed by Hillary Clinton for 2010 record her husband’s compensation as $150,000 from the Oak Brook, Ill.-based group, but critics say the lack of transparency about where the money really came from raises serious questions.

“Bill and Hillary Clinton are married, so under the law, paying him for a speech is like giving money directly to her – to the Secretary of State,” Fitton said. “I cannot think of a comparable ‘pay to play’ scandal.”

Clinton gave 542 speeches around the world between 2001 and 2013, earning $104.9 million, and delivered another 53 speeches between January 2014 and May 2015, earning an additional $13.5 million, according to reports by Fox News and the Washington Post. The former president's speaking fees have ranged from $28,100 for a 2001 talk at the London School of Economics to $750,000 for a 2011 appearance at an event for Swedish communications company Ericsson.

While Clinton's knowledge of world events and charm as a raconteur is well-documented, critics doubt the sky-high fees are doled out by anonymous parties for sheer entertainment value.

"These donors don't cut checks because they want to hear a brief speech," said Sean Davis, co- founder of The Federalist, a conservative online magazine. "They do it to gain access or favors from the Clintons. The Clintons owe voters a clear explanation of who is funneling them this money and why.”

Kudos To Sanders, With A Wink To Clinton, Too // NPR // Ron Elving – July 10, 2015

These are palmy days for Sen. Bernie Sanders and his improbable campaign for president. Thousands throng his events in Maine, Iowa and Wisconsin. He has raised $15 million in just a few months, and he polls better among Democrats than any one Republican is polling among Republicans.

At a minimum, the "independent socialist" senator has established himself as the insurgent to watch among

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats in this cycle. So, we should salute the man. But we should also cast a smiling glance toward the other, possibly ultimate, beneficiary of his early success.

That would be Hillary Clinton.

Why? Because in the long run, "the Sanders summer" is likely to boost her bid for the White House. Indeed, from her perspective, Sanders may be the ideal rival en route to the nomination.

He's a man, he's 73, and he's well to her left on most issues. Moreover, he starts from a low base of national recognition, lacks conventional media appeal and hails from a tiny northeastern state that is totally lopsided politically. Did we mention he calls himself a socialist?

Clinton would have had far more to fear from the candidate dynamics had another senator, Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, made the race. Even if Clinton prevailed, the inevitable wounds would be felt in the fall campaign.

Warren would have equal claim to Clinton's magic demographic wand: the prospect of being the nation's first female president. Warren is also eight years younger than Sanders, and two years younger than Clinton. She has heartland roots in Oklahoma, and the momentum from a late-blooming career and a scrappy battle to the top of Bay State politics. Her issue profile would match the economic equality mood of the moment without stretching the point.

Sanders, of course, goes further. He pleases crowds with full-throated proclamations about universal health care and Wall Street reform. He quickens the pulse of liberals and populists alike, including many who, like Sanders, have not been card-carrying Democrats.

Beyond that, he has earned his moment with his own brand of vitality and political punch. Brooklyn born and raised, Sanders is far more New York than Clinton will ever be, but even his combative nature carries a certain charm.

All this helps explain Sanders' rise to the level of respectable in national polls, including strong numbers in tuned-in Iowa and New Hampshire. But those polls also bespeak the hunger many Democrats feel for a choice in 2016. They may be "ready for Hillary," or resigned to her, but they feel entitled to a little competition first. It's just part of being a Democrat.

Sanders should benefit from this, tapping into the nostalgia of boomers who rebelled against the Democratic establishment decades ago, backing Eugene McCarthy in 1968 and George McGovern in 1972. Some also remember their enthusiasm for Howard Dean a dozen years ago. Those upstart candidates, too, made a virtue of lacking conventional charisma.

Taken together, these threads of political sentiment weave a ready-to-wear mantle for some Democrat plucky enough to put it on. Naturally, the Clinton camp has been watching keenly for years now to see who it would be.

Now, halfway through the critical pre-election year, the Democratic field consists of Clinton, Sanders and three other white males who have failed to make much of a dent. It is possible one of them will catch fire, but Sanders is in their way. It is also possible other candidates will emerge, but Sanders is in their way, too.

And that helps Clinton.

Ultimately, though, Sanders' greatest boon to Clinton may be in making her work harder to connect — both with the party's activist left and with its traditional lunch-bucket issues. Rooting her in what Dean liked to call "the democratic wing of the Democratic Party."

We always knew that Clinton could not be crowned the nominee in the presumptive manner of an incumbent president, or even an incumbent vice president. We always knew there needed to be, and would inevitably be, someone who mounted a challenge from within Democratic ranks.

Now that someone has emerged. He's Bernie Sanders, and he's doing very well, thank you.

Clinton should be grateful.

Hillary Clinton to Visit Senate Democrats at Lunch // Roll Call // Niels Lesniewski – July 10, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is scheduled to attend the July 14 Senate Democratic caucus lunch, a senior Democratic aide told CQ Roll Call.

It is one of several meetings with congressional Democrats Clinton is expected to hold while in Washington, D.C., next week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the visit with her former Senate colleagues, a good number of whom have already endorsed her presidential bid, is interesting because another person seeking the Democratic nomination in 2016, Sen. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., caucuses with the Democrats and serves as their ranking member on the Budget Committee.

Another Questionable Donor to the Clinton Foundation Emerges, and This One Could Tie in With the Pending Iran Deal // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – July 10, 2015

Additionally, the website for Balli Real Estate, a property investment and development subsidiary based in Britain, says that Alaghband is a member of the Clinton Global Initiative.

From the Daily Beast:

The company pleaded guilty to two counts of criminal information in 2010. In its plea agreement with the Department of Justice, Balli Aviation agreed to pay a $2 million criminal fine, serve five years corporate probation, and pay an additional $15 million in civil fines. The hefty sum was “a direct consequence of the level of deception used to mislead investigators,” Thomas Madigan, a top Justice Department official, said at the time.

Alaghband is one of an array of questionable actors who’ve been found in recent months to give to the Clinton Foundation. The gifts – from foreign governments with human rights violations like Qatar, Algeria, Saudi Arabia and China as well as FIFA, soccer’s corrupt governing body – have complicated Hillary Clinton’s campaign for president and raised questions as to whether these entities were trying to curry favor with the former Secretary of State.

But Alaghband stands out from the rest, because the beneficiary of his firm’s deals with Tehran was an Iranian airline accused by the U.S. government of working with the regime’s foreign intelligence operatives and shipping arms and troops to Syria. Plus, if an agreement between Iran and the world’s major powers is concluded in the coming days – as is widely expected – operators like Alaghband could stand to benefit. Hillary Clinton will be put in the awkward position of either defending the act of the Obama administration in which she once served or criticizing the culmination of a U.S.-Iran rapprochement effort, which her State Department began.

Interestingly, Alaghband, told the Daily Beast, “I am not a member of the Clinton Global Initiative.”

“I attended a few meetings. The last meeting was 10 years ago,” he said. “I don’t recall having ever made a contribution.”

As to why his own corporate website listed him as a member, he said: “I haven’t seen this website recently. If attending a few meetings makes you a member, I don’t know.”

A source close to the Clinton Foundation told the Daily Beast that Alaghband “was never a member of CGI in a personal capacity,” but added, “In 2007, Balli Group paid a onetime CGI membership fee and they designated him as their delegate to the meeting.”

One of the charges against Balli Aviation was that it “conspired to export three Boeing 747 aircraft from the United States to Iran,” without obtaining the necessary export licenses from the U.S. government, according to a Justice Department statement reported by the Daily Beast. It further used an U.S. airline subsidiary to buy 747s with financing from the Iranian-based Mahan Air – a company the State Department sais is controlled by former Iranian President Hashemi Rafsanjani. Mahan was sanctioned by the Treasury Department in 2011 for “providing financial, material and technological support to the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps-Qods Force (IRGC-QF).”

It doesn't seem likely that Hillary Clinton would have gotten UK's "House of Cards" creator Lord Michael Dobbs' vote if her were able to cast a ballot in US elections.

Dobbs believes Clinton most resembles a real life Claire Underwood (Robyn Wright), the conniving and politically ambitious wife of president Frank Underwood (Kevin Spacey) on Netflix's adaptation of Dobbs' "House of Cards."

Dobbs, who wrote the novel "House of Cards" after serving as an advisor to Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, has a healthy obsession of Clinton.

“I’m fascinated by Hillary, of course, because she comes with so much baggage,” he told the online site. “That baggage is her strength but also her vulnerability. We just have to wait and see where the balance lies on that. Though it is bizarre that the system that was bred out of [rejection of a King] has produced the Bushes, the Kennedys, the Clintons, the Roosevelts…."

Dobbs' TV version of "House of Cards" ended after just four one-hour episodes aired on BBC in 1990. Netflix's adaptation will return with its fourth season next year.s

Don't believe Hillary Clinton's campaign – here's why they're not 'worried' about Bernie Sanders
// Business Insider // Maxwell Tani – July 10, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vermont) is gaining momentum as a Democratic presidential rival to Hillary Clinton. But he's no threat just yet.

On Monday, The New York Times reported that Clinton staffers are becoming increasingly concerned that the Vermont senator is a serious threat to Clinton's campaign.

They point to his rising poll numbers and his large event turnouts — according to The Washington Post, Sanders drew 7,500 at a Maine event on Monday, a week after drawing a 10,000-person crowd in Wisconsin.

But Sanders' first problem is that, as political strategists and analysts told Business Insider, his candidacy at this point is more resembling that of former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean (D) in 2004 than Barack Obama in 2008.

His momentum is concentrated in the first two early-voting states, Iowa and New Hampshire. The general consensus among many left-leaning strategists and pollsters is that Sanders is best suited to win in those two states, where there are a sizeable portion of white, liberal voters.

"Sanders is certainly doing a lot better in Iowa and New Hampshire where voters are playing close attention than he is anywhere else," Tom Jensen, the director of Public Policy Polling, told Business Insider.

"I don't think that [Clinton campaign strategists] think that Sanders is going to win the nomination, but they probably take it seriously that he could win a state or two early," added John Hagner, a campaign strategist at Clarity Campaign Labs.

Hagner, a veteran of the former Democratic National Committee chairman Dean's 2004 presidential campaign team in New Hampshire, pointed to similarities between Sanders and Dean's momentous starts — and not just the fact that they're both from Vermont.

Hagner noted that Dean's team also garnered lots of liberal enthusiasm early on, raising millions in small donations from passionate primary voters. And he said Dean wasn't the only upstart to mount a challenge in New Hampshire. Former Vice President Al Gore almost lost the state to former Sen. Bill Bradley (D-New Jersey) in 2000.

"The similarities [between Dean and Sanders] is in the fan base and in the intensity. And there really are, particularly in New Hampshire, a lot of very progressive voters who enjoy uncertain candidates," Hagner said.

Analysts also told Business Insider that Sanders is benefiting from the disproportionate share of white voters in Iowa and New Hampshire. Though he's tried to outflank Clinton to the left on a number of issues like income inequality and taxes, Sanders has been less decidedly liberal on topics like immigration reform and gun control.

In 2007, he voted against an immigration-reform package in the Senate, teaming up with Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) to add restrictive amendments to the bill. Many Latino lawmakers don't believe that Sanders has immigration reform at the top of his agenda in the same way that Clinton does.

"It is not his priority," Arturo Vargas, the executive director of the National Association of Latino Elected Office, told CNN last month. "I think that is one of the challenges his campaign is going to have to confront."

Sanders also hasn't made many inroads with African-American voters. Jensen, the director of Public Policy Polling, told Business Insider that most recent polls put the former Secretary of State's support among African-American voters at around 70-80%.

"If Sanders wins Iowa or New Hampshire it will build a lot of momentum for him that will help in the states that follow, but he's still going to struggle in places like South Carolina with large black populations and Nevada with large Hispanic populations unless he improves his appeal to nonwhite voters," Jensen said.

Hagner said that if the Clinton campaign becomes legitimately nervous, they may start putting issues in the spotlight that historically resonate with black and Hispanic voters.

"Immigration and gun rights are going to be problems for him. If you start to see stories pop up that have some finger prints, we'll know they're taking it seriously," Hagner said.

hillary clintonL.E. BaskowPresidential candidate Hillary Clinton arrives at the Aria and greets workers before speaking at a conference in Las Vegas.

For its part, the Clinton campaign could also see the benefit in a strengthened Sanders.

Republicans have repeatedly slammed national Democrats for running a campaign that much more resembles an incumbent's. Clinton has long sought to avoid looking like she's taking her party's nomination for granted.

And campaigns always like to lower expectations in the early-voting states. And every candidate wants to be able to claim momentum, regardless of the reality on the ground.

Said Bill Burton, a former top adviser to Obama's 2008 campaign: "Hillary Clinton tried out inevitability as a message, and it was not successful."

No, Hillary Clinton Doesn't Need a Plan For Passing Gun Control Legislation // Mother Jones // Kevin Drum – July 10, 2015

Lots of political observers are surprised that Hillary Clinton is talking about guns. That's a loser for Democrats, isn't it? Paul Waldman isn't so sure:

The truth is quite a bit more complicated than that — in fact, pushing for measures like expanded background checks is likely to help Clinton in the 2016 election. But if she's going to promise to make headway on this issue, she needs to offer some plausible account of how as president she could make real progress where Barack Obama couldn't.

Allow me to impolitely disagree. Presidential campaigns are extended exercises in affinity marketing. No presidential candidate ever has to explain how they're going to enact legislation. The most they have to do is offer a bit of breezy blather about crossing the aisle and focusing on areas of agreement and Americans not really being as polarized as the media makes them out to be. That's plenty.

Oh sure, there are a few thousand annoying know-it-alls like Waldman and me who are going to write blog posts about how this or that promise ain't gonna happen because the politics are impossible. But hell, even we don't care. We're still going to vote for whoever we planned to vote for anyway. It's not as if any of the other candidates are going to work miracles either.

Now, it's true that some candidates run on a theme of competence, of "getting things done." Scott Walker is doing it this year. Michael Dukakis did it. But I don't think there's any evidence that even this pale shadow of "how I'm going to get things done" has much effect on voters. They just vote for the candidate who seems to be generally on their side, or generally most reasonable, or generally good to have a beer with. The details can be left to the wonks.

Ariana Grande's Manager Is Throwing a Big Fundraiser for Hillary Clinton // Mediaite // Jamie Frevele – July 10, 2015

It looks like Hillary Clinton definitely has the Canadian teenybopper vote, if they're old enough and not all Canadian! Scooter Braun, who manages musical acts including Justin Bieber and donut-licking America-hater Ariana Grande, announced that he and his wife Yael will host a fundraiser for the Democratic candidate in Los Angeles.

Billed as a "conversation" with Clinton, the event will take place at the Brauns' home on August 6 and will cost $2,700 to get in.

A fundraiser for Clinton at the Brauns' abode could be pretty fun, considering how Braun does pretty wicked impressions of Clinton's former boss, President Obama, and her husband, former President Bill Clinton. So that'll be a neat little party trick. Just maybe don't talk about the clients until this donut thing blows over. And let's not forget Bieber's previous run-in with a Clinton.

Hillary Clinton aligns herself with a surprising party // Elle // Alyssa Bailey – July 10, 2015

Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton made a very strategic move last night, aligning herself with a party whose fan base is among the most active in the U.S. (and really world). Clinton casually tweeted this:

Throwing her support behind One Direction and its activism efforts: Genius. No word yet on her favorite member or song, but the campaign just started—and she's clearly courting the Directioner endorsement. Expect that Harry Styles-Hillary Clinton photo in the months to come.

Bill and Hillary Clinton ordered to give depositions about emails in civil case // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, have been ordered to give depositions in a civil case investigating the pair's growing email scandal.

Mrs. Clinton will giver her deposition on the morning of July 28 in Washington, and Mr. Clinton will give his the following morning, according to copies of the notices of deposition reviewed by The Washington Times.

The case, filed by Freedom Watch founder and former federal prosecutor Larry Klayman, alleges the couple committed criminal violations under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO).

According to a statement from Freedom Watch, the suit alleges Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the 2016 Democratic nomination, covered up these crimes by destroying her personal emails sent during her time as Secretary of State.

Mr. Klayman alleges in his lawsuit that the Clintons — through mail and wire fraud, and various false statements — misappropriated documents that he requested under the Freedom of Information concerning the Mrs. Clinton's involvement in releasing Israeli war and cyber-warfare plans and practices.

The lawsuit, filed in March, claims that Mrs. Clinton orchestrated the release to thwart Israeli plans to preemptively attack Iranian nuclear sites.

Mr. Klayman also requested Mrs. Clinton's and other State Department records pertaining to waivers that were granted for persons, companies, countries and other interests that do business with Iran, undermining economic sanctions.

"This is the first and only hard-hitting case to address the growing email scandal," Mr. Klayman said in a statement. "What Hillary Clinton, her husband, and their foundation have done is nothing new. It is simply part of a criminal enterprise which dates back at least 10 years, all designed to enrich themselves personally at the expense of the American people and our nation. It's time, however, that they finally be held legally accountable."

Chelsea Clinton to speak at World Food Prize // Des Moines Register // Donnelle Eller – July 10, 2015

Chelsea Clinton will speak at the World Food Prize symposium this fall about encouraging girls in the U.S. and developing countries to pursue math, science and technology educations as way to escape poverty.

Clinton is vice chair of the Clinton Foundation, the New York-based nonprofit focused on improving global health, creating economic opportunity, and increasing opportunities for women and girls. The group's founder is former President Bill Clinton.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's entry into the presidential race has prompted questions about the foundation, including foreign donations to it and potential conflicts of interest. The campaign has rejected those criticisms.

Ken Quinn, president of the World Food Prize, said he doesn't intend for the event to become political. But Timothy Hagle, a University of Iowa political science professor, said that might be hard to avoid.

"That might be difficult in Iowa, in the middle of a presidential cycle," Hagle said. "Even with an important issue, politics may intrude."

Quinn said he reached out to invite Chelsea Clinton months before her mother decided to take another run at the White House. "I've worked very hard to never have the World Food Prize seen as anyway involved in politics," said Quinn, a former ambassador.

Chelsea Clinton will receive no fee for speaking at the event, scheduled for Oct. 14-16. The World Food Prize will provide airfare and lodging, he said.

Encouraging the education of women and girls is a big push for the World Food Prize. This year's prize winner, Sir Fazle Hasan Abed, is being honored for his work creating the Bangladesh Rural Advancement Committee, focused on giving women the social and economic tools to help themselves and their communities.

Quinn said women play key roles in attacking hunger, improving health and incomes in developing countries. As small-holder farmers, they make many of the decisions about growing but often have limited access to education.

"Chelsea Clinton has been speaking a great deal, and the Clinton Global Initiative is focused on, girls' education and empowering women around the world," Quinn said.

Quinn said he also invited Lauren Bush Lauren, founder of FEED, a nonprofit that uses part of the sale of bags and accessories to help address hunger. Lauren, granddaughter of president George H.W. Bush and niece of president George W. Bush, was unable to attend the Des Moines event.

Chelsea Clinton will speak about the foundation's work, not politics, Quinn said. "I stressed that we are nonpartisan."

Hagle said even talking issues like STEM — science, technology, engineering and math training that many political leaders favor — could be viewed as Chelsea Clinton subtly pushing for her mother. "She will bring attention to the issue, but she could get some eyebrows raised and criticism," he said.

Quinn said other political figures have been honored and spoken at the World Food Prize in the past, without being political, including current Republican presidential candidate Mike Huckabee and former President Jimmy Carter, who is an honorary member of the council of advisers.

Quinn said it's unclear whether Chelsea Clinton will take the opportunity to be in Iowa to campaign for her mother. Campaign and foundation officials could not immediately say what her plans are while in Iowa.

Quinn said Chelsea Clinton's staff has indicated she wants to meet with young people to talk about the importance of education.

In addition to Clinton, Sheryl WuDunn, an author and Pulitzer Prize winner, also will speak about empowering women. She wrote her most recent book, "A Path Appears: Transforming Lives, Creating Opportunity," with her husband, Nicholas Kristof, a New York Times columnist.

Hillary Clinton campaign releases video about Confederate flag // Post and Courier // July 10, 2015

About an hour after the Confederate flag was removed from the Statehouse grounds today, the Hillary Clinton for South Carolina staff released a campaign video about the flag's removal being a good first step.

The video features interviews with South Carolinians discussing the historic significance of removing the flag as well as offering their views on the next steps that need to take place, such as action on issues like wages, prison reform, education, gun control, and poverty.

Clinton has commended state leaders for their action, a Clinton staffer said in a news release.

"Removing this symbol of our nation's racist past is an important step towards equality and civil rights in America," Clinton said. "There is still unfinished business in confronting and acting on the inequalities that still exist in our country. We can't hide from the hard truths about race and justice. We must do everything in our power to have the courage to name them and change them."

Hillary Clinton to make first Utah trip of 2016 race // Salt Lake Tribune // Robert Gehrke – July 9, 2015

Hillary Clinton, the Democratic presidential front-runner, will make her first visit to Utah during her 2016 campaign next month, holding a fundraiser at a posh Park City home.

"I think it's always exciting to have a presidential candidate come to Utah and, of course, from my perspective, it's great to have a Democrat coming to Utah this early in the campaign," said Utah Democratic Party Chairman Peter Corroon. "I think it shows Utah is playing a more prominent role in politics."

The event, billed as a "Conversation with Hillary," is available to those who give between $500 and $2,700. It is being held at the home of Barry and Amy Baker, who have hosted the Clintons before.

Barry Baker is the former president of USA Networks and is a senior adviser to Lee Equity Partners, LLC, a private equity and venture-capital firm. Amy Baker spent 20 years at NBC News.

Clinton, the former secretary of state, U.S. senator from New York and first lady, holds a wide lead over the Democratic field and all of the Republican contenders in head-to-head polling.

But she is a polarizing figure reviled among Republicans.

"I'm sure she'll get a very positive reaction from most of the Democratic faithful. I'm not so sure the feelings will be the same on the Republican side," Corroon said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Utah Republican Party Chairman James Evans said he isn't surprised Clinton is coming to Utah — the Democratic candidates have in the past — and he doesn't expect her visit to stir up protests.

"They come to Park City several times and I would expect her to visit with the liberal elite, as she certainly is not connected to the everyday American," Evans said. "I don't think people are going to go out of their way to protest her. We'll be respectful because everybody knows who she is and what she's about. So there's nothing else to really say other than certainly she will be a disaster as president. I think people already know that."

Evans said he expects prominent Republican candidates to visit the state for fundraisers, possibly as early as next month.

Six of the Republican contenders already visited Utah last month — Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Ohio Gov. Jon Kasich, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham and businesswoman Carly Fiorina — for an annual Deer Valley retreat with donors and politicos hosted by Mitt Romney.

In April, Clinton became the first presidential hopeful to hire staff in Utah, engaging Ben Haynes, an American Fork native who worked to re-elect Salt Lake County District Attorney Sim Gill and on the Count My Vote initiative, to lead the Clinton campaign efforts in Utah.

Martin O'Malley Takes a Shot at Hillary Clinton Over 'Sanctuary Cities' Policy // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – July 10, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley took a veiled swipe at front runner Hillary Clinton on Friday, over the case of a convicted felon who had been deported multiple times and who has been charged with murdering a woman in San Francisco on July 1.

In an interview this week on CNN, Mrs. Clinton was asked about the San Francisco sheriff's office decision in April to release the suspect, Juan Francisco Lopez Sanchez, even though federal authorities had wanted him held with a view toward deporting him again.

The sheriff's office has said it was following procedures in keeping with San Francisco's status as a "sanctuary city" that provides protections for certain undocumented immigrants.

In the CNN interview, Mrs. Clinton said: "Well, what should be done is any city should listen to the Department of Homeland Security, which as I understand it, urged them to deport this man again after he got out of prison another time. You know, here's a case where we've deported, we've deported, we've deported. He ends back up in our country and I think the city made a mistake. The city made a mistake not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported"

Mr. O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland, weighed in with a statement that defended the sanctuary cities policy. He did not mention Mrs. Clinton by name, but said: "It's lamentable that the senseless and tragic act of violence that occurred in San Francisco is prompting a rush to judgment and finger pointing: we can and should do better. Local governments should not be blamed for the federal government's inability to fix our broken immigration system nor should they be held responsible for doing the federal government's job."

Mr. O'Malley is competing for Hispanic voters as part of a larger strategy of appealing to liberal Democrats who might see Mrs. Clinton as too centrist for their taste. Thus far, though, he has lost ground to Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has been gaining on Mrs. Clinton in surveys of voters in Iowa and New Hampshire.

On student loans, do as O'Malley says, not as he does // WaPo // Michelle Singletary – July 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley surrendered — just like many other parents.

When his daughters were choosing their colleges, he let them have their way. He didn't want to crush their dreams, and he ended up with crushing debt.

Last week, O'Malley spelled out a proposal to help students graduate debt-free from public colleges and universities by increasing Pell Grants and automatically enrolling borrowers in income-based repayment plans. One key part of his plan calls for helping students and parents refinance their debt at lower interest rates.

O'Malley knows of what he speaks. In announcing his proposals, he revealed that his family has accumulated more than $339,200 in student loans, the bulk of which are parent PLUS loans. He and his wife borrowed to educate their daughters, Grace, 24, who attended Georgetown University and is a public school teacher in Baltimore, and Tara, 23, who attended the College of Charleston in South Carolina and is now an administrative assistant for the United Nations Foundation in the District. The couple still has two sons to get through college, William 17, and Jack, 12.

When O'Malley was governor of Maryland, he fought to have the state universities freeze tuition. Even with his vast political and legal experience, O'Malley couldn't win a key argument with his daughters that state schools were a good bargain.

"I'm blessed with strong-willed women in my life," he gently laughed during a phone interview while campaigning in New Hampshire. "I wanted them to go in-state. But I lost the vote."

I can empathize with O'Malley's dilemma. His father, a World War II veteran, graduated from Georgetown. His daughter pleaded to have the same opportunity, although his father went on the G.I. Bill. And once you allow the first child to go out-of-state, it's hard to deny the second.

We can second-guess the wisdom of the O'Malleys' decision, and I do. But now that they've made it, I hope the family — given their public platform — will use their experience as a cautionary tale that, for most families, it's not okay to cave to an 18-year-old whose dreams of a particular college will create decades of debt.

"I don't want to hold us up as a metaphor of every family," O'Malley said. "We are very lucky in that both of us are working and hopefully will continue to work. I think one thing that is true for all of us as Americans, it's not good for our country or our economy to saddle [families] with the sort of debt that we have. A lot of families don't have the ability to go into that sort of debt."

Total outstanding student loan debt has reached $1.3 trillion. When we talk about the student-loan crisis, we mostly focus on the amount of debt being accumulated by students. But there's not enough emphasis on the amount parents are borrowing. PLUS loans for parents have reached almost $69 billion, according to Department of Education data.

"Better we have the debt than [our children] have the debt," O'Malley said.

That's a sentiment many parents hold. And even as public servants, the O'Malleys (Katie O'Malley is a Baltimore District Court judge) may be able to manage the debt load. But are other families really thinking through whether they can?

As Consumers Union points out, PLUS loans, which are also available for graduate students, have much higher borrowing limits. The organization, in a letter urging the Department of Education not to lower borrowing standards for PLUS loans, made some important observations.

"Loans to graduate students are made on the promise that they will see an increase in salary from their educational attainment that enables them to repay the loans they borrowed," wrote Suzanne Martindale, a staff attorney for Consumers Union. "Parents, on the other hand, do not see an increase in their incomes from their children's education. . . . They have no guarantee that their children will help pay the loans back, or will even finish school. For these reasons, allowing parents to borrow many thousands of dollars in PLUS loans raises unique concerns."

We've heard promises on the campaign trail this year about helping families afford college. And we do need some legislative intervention so that many people won't be priced out of a college education.

But we also need to press upon parents and their children that dreams can come true without going to colleges that result in a heavy debt load.

As we wrapped up our conversation, I asked O'Malley an obvious question. What's the plan for their sons?

"I hope to make a compelling argument with them to choose more affordable options for their parents," he said. "I may put your column under their pillows."

Hey, governor, I'm willing to do an in-person intervention.

Martin O'Malley's comeback plot // Politico // Jonathan Topaz and Gabriel Debenedetti – July 10, 2015

Martin O'Malley, stuck in low single digits in national and early-state polls, has embarked on an aggressive strategy to out-wonk his rivals, sending out a flood of super-specific policy proposals on Wall Street and climate change and more.

But fellow Democrats who themselves have slogged through long-shot campaigns aren't sold.

"It's not going to grab voters' attentions," said 2008 presidential candidate and former New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, of O'Malley's policy proposals.

"Martin O'Malley's challenge is this: why him and not Hillary Clinton? There's no good reason," said Steve Murphy, who was Dick Gephardt's campaign manager in 2004.
The contrast between O'Malley and his rivals can be jarring.

On the same day that Bernie Sanders rallied nearly 8,000 raucous supporters in Portland, Maine, O'Malley was on Haitian radio discussing the humanitarian crisis in the Dominican Republic.

And while the political world had its eyes fixed on Hillary Clinton's first nationally televised interview this week, O'Malley was readying to detail policy proposals on debt-free college and financial regulation.

Running a distant third behind a popular, entrenched front-runner in Clinton and a surging liberal firebrand in Sanders, O'Malley — whose camp always assumed he would be the progressive alternative in the race — is hoping that he can grab voters' attention by staking out deeply specific and deeply liberal positions on issues other candidates have yet to weigh in on.

Last month, O'Malley released a white paper on climate change that vowed to transition to 100 percent clean energy by 2050 — a bold plan that earned the praise of billionaire Democratic donor and environmentalist Tom Steyer (who has longstanding ties to Clinton and already hosted a fundraiser for her).

On Wednesday, he put forth a plan to increase Pell Grants and offer debt-free public higher education within five years. A day later, he released a set of financial regulatory proposals that would, in part, put a greater emphasis on criminal prosecution on Wall Street and institute a three-year revolving door ban on regulators and Wall Street firms.

And early next week, the campaign — which has placed significant emphasis on immigration early in the campaign — will release a similarly detailed policy rollout on that issue.

Meanwhile, he has also pushed hard on a series of issues that are far from the front of Clinton's and Sanders' minds. His statement on providing some relief for Puerto Rico's debt crisis came days before Clinton or Sanders weighed in, and he remains the only candidate to talk about the crisis in the Dominican Republic. To his team, such issues are moral ones that distinguish O'Malley from his supposedly more poll-driven competitors.

O'Malley's advisers say his attempt to dig in on progressive policy will put him in a strong position in the early-voting states when it comes time for caucus- and primary-goers to actually make up their mind.

"We're going to be policy-heavy," said top O'Malley strategist Bill Hyers. "Our plan is to do a bunch of policy and have him in Iowa rolling out his plans — talking about them in Iowa and New Hampshire. That's where we'll grind it out."

Hyers concedes that the candidate is a virtual unknown — 70 percent of Iowa Democrats in a recent Quinnipiac survey said they didn't know enough about him to make an opinion.

The idea, then, is to continue to introduce the candidate to voters by staying the course and being specific on policy, especially as Clinton draws flak for her vague stances on issues like trade and the Iran deal. The campaign is also presenting O'Malley as more of a heavyweight than Sanders, who harbors a radical past.

"I lived through Howard Dean. Al Cranston won the Wisconsin straw poll in 84," added Hyers — an implicit jab at Sanders, whom several Democrats have compared to Dean and Cranston, who ultimately flamed out after hot starts. "Bruce Babbitt was hot in Iowa. It was Joe Biden at some point. That's the fun of it."

But Sanders has hardly been vague himself. Forcing specificity from Clinton was a core plank of his strategy from the start, as he — like O'Malley — has refused to go after the front-runner by name with attack ads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders, for example, has said that he wants to raise top marginal tax rates to above 50 percent. He was one of the leaders in Congress leading against fast-track authority and the Trans-Pacific Partnership. He has released a proposal on paid sick leave and a 40-hour work week. And since launching his candidacy, he's introduced legislation to break up so-called Too Big to Fail banks and provide tuition-free college at four-year public colleges.

Staking out his own position, O'Malley offered some criticism for the latter plan on Wednesday, saying — again without naming Sanders — that addressing tuition alone wasn't enough.

But the liberal former governor is hardly a red-in-the-face anti-establishment crusader like the Vermont legislator, despite his penchant for railing against Wall Street.
Having developed a name for himself back in Maryland as a data-driven executive, the policy roll-outs fit his style better than the massive rallies Sanders has been headlining across the country.

"Sanders is basically seen as the anti-establishment candidate," explained Richardson, who found himself far behind Clinton and Obama — not to mention John Edwards — early in the 2008 race. The New Mexican said he had reviewed O'Malley's climate plan, and that he has discussed foreign policy with the Marylander as recently as a month ago. "O'Malley is seen as the progressive establishment candidate," he said.

Unaffiliated Democratic strategists who've run previous long-shot campaigns aren't convinced that O'Malley's in a position to catch up to Clinton, or even Sanders. No number of wonky or lefty policy roll-outs can make up for his name recognition or polling deficits, they say — not to mention the fact that there's little room on the left as the front-runner continues to work to win over the liberal base. And O'Malley's organization in Iowa, where caucus mechanisms must be built months in advance, lags as well.

"Let's put it this way, this strategy would not get him a spot on the Republican debate stage," said Gina Glantz, who ran Bill Bradley's 2000 long-shot campaign against Al Gore.

"She's doing exactly the same thing," added Murphy, referring to Clinton. "She's addressing one issue after the other in comprehensive fashion."

Nonetheless, while many Democrats are skeptical of O'Malley's ability to pass Sanders anytime soon, Richardson counseled patience.

"Let the Bernie Sanders boomlet develop," he advised. "He can't stop it anyway, for now."

How O'Malley Would Let Private Lenders Back Into Federal Student Loans // Forbes // Jason Delisle – July 10, 2015

President Obama won a major victory by kicking banks out of the federal student loan program in 2010. It was no-brainer good policy. Now Governor Martin O'Malley is proposing to let the same banks into the program through the back door. And expensive colleges are likely to pick up a little cash as part of the deal.

O'Malley wants to let people with private student loans convert them to federal student loans. The plan is a little light on details (there's only one sentence on his campaign webpage) but we can assume it works like this. You have a private student loan. You file an application with the U.S. Department of Education to "refinance" your private loan into a federal loan. The federal government pays off your lender and issues you a new loan with the same balance. This loan now has a lower interest rate and you can repay it through income-based repayment or any other repayment plan the government offers.

Here is why expensive colleges will like the plan. It makes the limits lawmakers placed on the amount undergraduates can borrow each year in federal loans moot. The federal loan program doesn't let undergraduates borrow an unlimited amount of money for a variety of good reasons (Parent PLUS loans not withstanding). But under Governor O'Malley's plan students would max out federal loans and then take out even more private loans. Then they would promptly convert the private loans to federal student loans. That would allow them to enroll in income-based repayment and make progress toward having their erstwhile private student loan forgiven at the expense of taxpayers. Few policies would drive tuition up more.

Private lenders are big winners, too. Private lenders do not make loans to anyone at any school. They underwrite, trying to gauge who is likely to repay, who is a good bet, etc. But under Governor O'Malley's plan they can safely get out of the underwriting business and make loans to everyone. If a borrower gets behind on payments the lender can inform him of the wonderful benefits of refinancing his loan into the federal loan program. Heck, they might even pay him to do so. The federal student loan program can provide him no-questions-asked forbearance or loan forgiveness through income-based repayment.

In finance lingo, O'Malley is selling private lenders a put option on every loan they make — taxpayers bear 100 percent of the risk on each and every loan. Make a bad loan; put it to the government at face value. In fact, that's a lot like how the federal loan program used to work when banks made loans with full government guarantees.

Governor O'Malley may be the only progressive who wants taxpayers guaranteeing student loans again. Sadly, some Republican candidates might actually get behind this idea.

O'Malley to speak at candidate forum in Des Moines // Des Moines Register // Jason Noble – July 10, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley will speak in Des Moines on July 24 as part of a bipartisan series of candidate forums.

O'Malley is the former governor of Maryland and one of several declared candidates for the Democratic nomination.

He'll appear at 11:30 on July 24 at the State Historical Building in downtown Des Moines. He'll speak and take questions.

Attendees may RSVP ahead of the event, but are not required to do so.

The candidate forum series is organized by the Iowa Caucus Consortium, an initiative of several Des Moines area organizations — including the Des Moines Register — to provide educational and informational resources on the caucuses.

The consortium aims to bring Democratic and Republican candidates alike to Des Moines for free and open-to-the-public events in the months leading up to the Feb. 1 caucuses.

Bernie Sander's misleading characterization of a controversial gun law // WaPo // Michelle Ye Hee Lee – July 10, 2015

Jake Tapper: "One issue where your Democratic rivals are starting to hit you is the fact that you have, in the past, sided with the NRA on some gun issues. Earlier this year, the parents of one of the 12 innocent people killed during the Aurora movie theater shooting, they saw their lawsuit to hold ammunition sellers liable for the attack, they saw that dismissed. And one of the reasons was a law that you voted for, which protects manufacturers of firearms and ammunition from being sued. Why did you vote that way?"

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.): "Now, the issues that you're talking about is, if somebody has a gun and it falls into the hands of a murderer, and that murderer kills somebody with the gun, do you hold the gun manufacturer responsible? Not anymore than you would hold a hammer company responsible if somebody beat somebody over the head with a hammer. That is not what a lawsuit should be about."

— exchange during a CNN interview, July 5, 2015

Sanders's answer, which came after an aside about the low grade the National Rifle Association gave him and the need for a sensible debate on gun control, was circulated online amid growing attention to his record on gun issues. His vote on the 2005 law is one of the key criticisms from Democrats about his record.

Sanders, an Independent running for the Democratic presidential nomination, characterized the law as providing immunity for gun manufacturers from being sued when a gun is misused by a third party. It's as if a hammer manufacturer were to be held responsible if someone used the hammer to beat someone else, he said.

Clearly, there is a difference between using a gun and using a hammer as a weapon. Our goal is not to nitpick or play gotcha, but rather explore the types of protection a gun manufacturer has under this law that would not apply to other consumer-goods manufacturers — hammer or otherwise. How accurate is Sanders's characterization?

The Facts

Congress passed the Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act in 2005 after a wave of lawsuits filed against gun manufacturers by municipalities and gun-control advocates. Some of this can get technical, so bear with us.

Victims accused manufacturers of creating "public nuisance" and not doing enough to ensure safe distribution of guns or prevent the flow of guns into illegal markets. They alleged that manufacturers were oversupplying the industry (and therefore knew that some of the guns would end up on the black market) and that they marketed the guns by promoting attributes that could be associated with criminal activities.

Advocates for gunmakers argued that these lawsuits threatened Second Amendment rights and that law-abiding manufacturers should not be held liable for criminal actions of individuals. They pushed for the 2005 law, which generally shielded manufacturers and sellers of firearms and ammunition from civil lawsuits "resulting from criminal or unlawful misuse" of their product by a third party.

The law's proponents, including the NRA, argued it was necessary to block baseless lawsuits that threatened to bankrupt the firearms industry. Opponents said it gave unprecedented blanket immunity and took away consumer rights. The Fact Checker takes no position on the law.

The bill passed the House (where Sanders was at the time) 223 to 140, with 59 Democrats voting with the majority.

Interestingly, just five years earlier, the Clinton administration had reached an unprecedented deal with a major gun manufacturer, Smith & Wesson, to adopt safety measures. The agreement nearly ruined the company, as revenues declined 40 percent within a year amid an NRA boycott and criticism from gun advocates.

The 2005 law does not guarantee blanket immunity, and it has some exceptions. Manufacturers or dealers can be sued if they knowingly sold a product that would be used to commit a crime. They can be sued if they were negligent in selling the product to someone they knew was unfit (i.e., a child or someone who was drunk). They can be sued for another technical negligence claim ("negligence per se") that relates to the violation of a safety statute. The law bars any other type of negligence claims against a gun manufacturer.

Still, it provides a unique federal legal shield that most consumer goods manufacturers do not have.

Negligence claims in tort law allow consumers to sue for negligence caused by carelessness, which doesn't always involve a violation of the law or knowingly entrusting someone unfit to handle the product, said Timothy Lytton, a Georgia State University law professor who specializes in tort law and gun policies. (For example, doctors can be sued for carelessness and negligence in medical malpractice. You can sue a supermarket if you slip and are injured, and the market did not display a "wet floor" sign.)

While the law allows victims to sue if there was a design defect or a malfunction with the gun, there have been exceptions. For example, the Illinois Supreme Court in 2009 cited the law in dismissing a case where a young boy playing with his father's gun accidentally shot and killed his friend. The victim's family sued the gun manufacturer, saying the gun did not have proper safety features or proper warnings. The court found the plaintiffs did not fit the technical definition in the exception.

"If the gun is defectively designed so that when fired it explodes and injures the shooter's hand, they can sue for that. The suit that's barred is by a crime victim who wants to say that a different design could have prevented or mitigated the crime," said Kermit Roosevelt III, a University of Pennsylvania constitutional law professor specializing in Second Amendment and gun-control laws.

Few industries have federal liability immunity. Vaccine manufacturers have limited protection from lawsuits if their vaccine led to an injury. The federal government enacted this immunity to encourage companies to produce more vaccines without the fear of lawsuits, for their benefit to public health. Another example is federal protection for the airline industry from lawsuits arising from the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But unlike the gun law, both cases established a compensation scheme for victims to recover money for damages.

While the law provides protections that no other industry has, courts have been reluctant to impose liability on manufacturers for third-party misuse of the product, said John Goldberg, Harvard Law School professor who specializes in product liability. So the types of lawsuits that Sanders mentioned (for hammers or guns) didn't have a slam-dunk chance in court before this law came about. Instead, this law ensures that those types of lawsuits can't be brought against gun manufacturers.

Sanders's spokesman, Michael Briggs, said in a statement: "Bernie's position is that a manufacturer should not be held liable for the illegal and unintended use of its product."

The Pinocchio Test

As Sanders says, under the 2005 law, gun manufacturers are not held responsible if a murderer uses their gun to kill someone. But it does more than that. It gives broad protections to gun manufacturers, including for negligence, and can protect them from being sued in certain types of claims relating to the gun's design. The Illinois case is one example where this immunity was cited to dismiss a lawsuit over the safety features of a gun that was accidentally fired by a boy. That type of technical protection would not apply to someone using a hammer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Further, Sanders's comparison makes it seem as if this lawsuit came about solely because people were suing gun manufacturers for making guns that somehow fell in the hands of criminals. But that is not exactly the case. Advocates and cities were suing manufacturers alleging their actions were increasing the risk that guns would fall into criminal hands. The gun industry then responded with legislation to shut down those lawsuits. Sanders's statement is misleading and a simplification of this complex case.

Two Pinocchios

Sanders Makes Play for Caucus States // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – July 10, 2015

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has been showing up in unexpected places: Colorado, Maine and Minnesota, states that seldom see a candidate at this early point in a presidential-primary campaign.

Drawing large, boisterous crowds, Mr. Sanders's travel itinerary may seem a quixotic hunt for the most liberal pockets of the Democratic Party that relish his anti-Wall Street, pro-tax-and-spend messages. It isn't.

Mr. Sanders is making a play for caucus states rather than traditional primaries. His goal is to mobilize his passionate, grass-roots backers and rack up enough delegates to pose a real challenge to Hillary Clinton. It is a tactic President Barack Obama successfully used against Mrs. Clinton in 2008, which raises the bar for Mr. Sanders. Can he pull off a repeat?

"It's something we've thought about for a while," said Tad Devine, an adviser to the Sanders campaign. "A few thousand people can make a big difference in those early caucus states, so that's a big part of the strategy."

Of the 57 states and territories that will hold contests in the Democratic primary, about one-third use caucuses to determine the winner. Last month, Mr. Sanders spoke to almost 5,000 people in Colorado, a state tentatively set to hold its caucus on March 1. He addressed more than 7,500 people earlier this week in Maine, where a caucus is now set for March 6.

Craig Hughes, a Democratic strategist who served as a Colorado senior adviser to Mr. Obama's two presidential bids, said the Sanders strategy makes sense, though it isn't at all certain he can parlay the early enthusiasm into concrete support in the caucuses.

"What you saw in Denver was a very large crowd for Sanders, but I don't see much ability to grow that for him as I see the potential for Hillary here," Mr. Hughes said.

Iowa, the state that kicks off the nomination contests, is also a caucus state, and Mr. Sanders is spending ample time and money there, too. After collecting $15 million in campaign donations in the last quarter, he has hired 27 people in Iowa, compared with five in New Hampshire, which holds a traditional primary election. Mrs. Clinton, who raised three times as much as Mr. Sanders in that same time frame, has 47 organizers on the ground in Iowa.

In his book about the 2008 campaign, "The Audacity to Win," former Obama Campaign Manager David Plouffe wrote that "the Clinton campaign was essentially ceding caucus states."

Not this time, her advisers said.

One of her most important hires may turn out to be Jeff Berman, who helped execute the 2008 Obama campaign's strategy of capitalizing on the often arcane caucus rules to maximize his delegate take.

Asked to contrast the present-day Clinton campaign with the 2008 model, one senior campaign manager ruefully made the point that this time around, Team Clinton grasps that caucus states can't be ignored because—no less than states that hold primaries—they help candidates amass the delegates needed to clinch the nomination.

Paul Begala, a Democratic strategist who is now part of the pro-Clinton super PAC Priorities USA Action, recalled Mrs. Clinton's decision to fly around Iowa in a helicopter at one point in the 2008 race. "You couldn't have had a worse way to approach Iowans than flying around in a helicopter like the Queen of England," Mr. Begala said.

In April, after announcing her candidacy, Mrs. Clinton visited Iowa before any other state, eschewing a chartered helicopter and opting for a road trip from her New York home in a van she dubbed "Scooby-Doo."

In an interview with CNN this week, Mrs. Clinton said: "One of the things that I learned last time is it's organize, organize, organize." She now has a supporter in each of Iowa's 1,682 election precincts, the campaign said.

Still, Mr. Sanders's large crowds have raised worries inside the Clinton camp. Rightly so, said Troy Jackson, a Maine Democrat. In 2008, he backed Mrs. Clinton; now he supports Mr. Sanders. "Obama never had crowds like that," he said.

Bernie defends Jeb's 'longer hours' comment // Politico // Nick Gass—July 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders on Friday defended Jeb Bush's remarks that Americans need to work longer hours, acknowledging that Bush was "absolutely correct" if he was referring to the need for more full-time jobs than part-time jobs.

"Well, of course we need full-time jobs rather than part-time jobs, but to suggest that people have got to work harder —Chris, here's the fact: People in the United States of America today are working the longest hours of a people of any major industrialized countries," Sanders said in an interview on CNN's "New Day" with Chris Cuomo.

Bush came under fire from his presidential race rivals, including Hillary Clinton and Sanders, for his comments late Wednesday, which reminded some of Mitt Romney's "47 percent" moment.

But Bush quickly clarified that he was referring the millions of people who want full-time employment and can't find it, and has found some success in defusing the situation.

In the interview on Friday morning, Sanders also acknowledged that he will not be able to avoid having every part of his personal life scrutinized as he runs for the Democratic presidential nomination. But politicians and the media should not turn it into a soap opera, he said.

The self-described democratic socialist candidate addressed a POLITICO Magazine article in which Sanders spokesman Michael Briggs confirmed that Sanders had his only son Levi in a relationship outside of his first marriage.

The United States, Sanders said, "faces enormous problems, and I think it's incumbent upon political leaders and the media to focus on those issues and not make politics into a soap opera."

He also partially defended Democratic rival Hillary Clinton against what he called "unjustified attacks," urging a focus on the issues rather than the people. At the same time, Sanders noted his policy differences with the former secretary of state and his former Senate colleague.

"I am prepared to break up the large financial institutions because I feel that Wall Street has too much power. She has not been clear on that. So you know, I'm not going to be beating her up and attacking her in personal ways," he said. "I like her."

The One Point on Which Bernie Sanders Agrees With Jeb Bush // Bloomberg // Arit John – July 10, 2015

News flash: Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders just said Republican presidential rival Jeb Bush is right about something. Sort of.

One day after saying Bush "does not seem to understand what is happening in our economy today," Sanders, Vermont's democratic socialist senator, grudgingly acknowledged Friday that he may actually agree on at least one aspect of the former Florida governor's views.

At issue: Bush's much-discussed interview with the New Hampshire Union Leader editorial board on Wednesday in which Bush said that improving the economy means "that people need to work longer hours and through their productivity gain more income for their families."

On Friday, CNN's "New Day" host Chris Cuomo asked Sanders if he'd been unfair, given that Bush seemed to be talking about the need for more full-time jobs, as opposed to part-time work.

"Of course we need full time jobs rather than part time jobs, but to suggest that people have gotta work harder..." Sanders said, adding that Americans work some of the longest hours of any major industrialized country. "So what we need to do is raise wages and income not force our people, who are already stressed out by long hours, to work even more hours."

Cuomo pushed him, and said that Sanders needed to be "consistent" if he wanted to stay above the board of dirty politics.

"Well if he is talking about the need for more full-time jobs rather than part-time jobs he's absolutely correct. That's what we have to do," Sanders said.

In an earlier statement released after Bush's comment, Sanders said that "[u]nfortunately ... Gov. Bush does not seem to understand what is happening in our economy today." Hillary Clinton also criticized Bush in a tweet:

Bush pushed back on Thursday. "You can take it out of context all you want, but high sustained growth means people work 40 hours rather than 30 hours and that by our success they have disposable income for their families to decide how they want to spend it rather than standing in line and being dependent upon government," he said.

Sanders was less willing to go after Hillary Clinton. Cuomo mentioned that Clinton has "trust issues"—specifically, a June CNN poll found that 57 percent of Americans don't consider her to be honest and trustworthy.

"Look, I have known Hillary Clinton for 25 years. I respect her. I like her," Sanders said. His criticism of her lies with her stances, or lack of stances, on issues like the Trans-Pacific Partnership and breaking up large financial institutions.

The interview also touched on a new Politico profile, which reports that Sanders has a son born out of wedlock. Cuomo asked Sanders if he thinks he can continue to run his campaign without opening up more about his personal life.

Sanders said he couldn't avoid it, but would rather focus on the issues, given the problems the country is facing. "I think it's incumbent on political leaders and media to focus on those issues and not make politics into a soap opera," he said.

Sanders dings Bush on work, ducks personal questions // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 10, 2015

Democratic candidate Bernie Sanders hit Republican contender Jeb Bush for his comments on the productivity of American workers and said he was best positioned to take on the nation's "billionaire class" if elected president.

The Vermont senator, who identifies as a Democratic socialist, said that 85 percent of men and 65 percent of women are working more than 40 hours a week.

"So what we need to do is raise wages and income, not force more people, who are already stressed out by long hours, to work even more hours," Sanders said on CNN's "New Day".

Jeb Bush told The Union Leader in New Hampshire Wednesday that "people need to work longer hours", which quickly drew a blast from frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who accused Bush of not understanding how hard Americans already work.

The Bush team explained his comments were taken out of context and said he meant that more part-time workers need full time jobs.

When pressed on if he was twisting Bush's comments, which Bush has said were about the availability of good full time jobs an not about American work ethic, Sanders relented.

"If he is talking about the need for more full time jobs than part time jobs he is absolutely correct," Sanders said.

Sanders has been gaining ground on frontrunner Hillary Clinton steadily, as the liberal wing of the Democratic party has coalesced behind him. As he has inched forward, personal questions from his past have bubbled up in media.

Asked about a Politico story on the child he had out of wedlock almost 40 years ago, Sanders deflected, saying he wanted to focus instead on issues. CNN's Chris Cuomo asked Sanders if he believed he could avoid personal scrutiny while running for president.

"I'm not being naïve, I understand it, yes," Sanders said. "No, no, I don't think I can avoid it. But this this country faces enormous problems and I think it's incumbent upon political leaders and the media to focus on those issues and not make politics into a soap opera."

Bernie Sanders: The Cable Bill Is Too Damn High // HuffPo // Zach Carter – July 10, 2015

Sens. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) sent a letter on Friday accusing big cable companies of using monopoly powers to muscle consumers into paying higher prices.

In the letter, addressed to Federal Communications Commission Chairman Tom Wheeler, Sanders and Warren wrote that mega-mergers have left over 60 percent of Americans with no choice whatsoever when it comes to their cable and Internet providers. This state of things, they wrote, makes it possible for companies to jack up prices without losing customers to competition. Sens. Al Franken (D-Minn.) and Ed Markey (D-Mass.) also signed the letter.

"As the telecommunications industry becomes increasingly concentrated, this lack of choice has resulted in huge price increases and often poor service for consumers," the senators wrote. "There are now de facto telecommunications monopolies throughout the United States."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The letter noted that a new merger between Time Warner Cable and Charter Communications would only exacerbate the problem, saying that recent Time Warner price increases suggest the cable giant is already insulated from normal market pressures. Modem rental charges for Time Warner have jumped 203 percent since they were introduced in 2012, according to the letter. The FCC has the power to block the TWC-Charter deal.

"Given the lack of incentive for companies to provide better quality service and competitive prices, it is no surprise that individuals rank cable and Internet providers last in customer satisfaction when compared to other companies in other industries," the senators wrote.

Sanders and his colleagues asked for the FCC to publish a host of cable and broadband pricing data, so consumers could see how much they pay compared to customers in other areas. They asked the FCC to provide average prices for each state and each cable provider, and also asked the agency to publicize the average prices in urban areas compared to those in rural markets.

Bernie Sanders: Income Tax Proposal To Come "In Two Or Three Weeks" // BuzzFeed // Christopher Massie – July 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders said on Friday that he would have a concrete proposal for an income tax rate on the highest earners "in two or three weeks."

The Democratic presidential candidate was discussing legislation he has introduced as a senator from Vermont that he says "would end this business of companies being able to store their profits in the Cayman Islands" and tax "Wall Street speculation," when he was asked to name his preferred tax rate on the upper echelon of individual incomes.

"We're working on that," Sanders said on a New Hampshire radio station. "Ask me that question in two or three weeks, I will give you a definitive answer. How's that?"

In late May, Sanders said that, under the Eisenhower administration, the top tax rate "was something like 90 percent," and said he didn't think that was necessarily too high a rate to reinstate.

In June, Sanders alluded to "a comprehensive tax package" his team was working on and said he suspected that it would, "for the top marginal rates, go over 50 percent."
In the interview on Friday, Sanders said that the plan to be released in the coming weeks would "ask the rich to pay a higher tax rate."

"In general, what I can tell you is that when Warren Buffett tells us that he pays an effective tax rate lower than his secretaries or lower than nurses, there's something wrong with our tax system," he said, after again refusing to give a specific number. "So yes, my proposal will ask the wealthiest people in this country, who, by and large, are doing phenomenally well right now, while the middle class is disappearing, yes, I will ask the rich to pay a higher tax rate."

Bernie Sanders Is The Left's Trump // Daily Beast // Ana Marie Cox – July 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders is the Left's Donald Trump.

Bear with me here. There is a lot they don't have in common, including where they stand in their respective party's polls—though Sanders' slow creep into a distant second is likely to be more sustainable. Still, they have both managed to disrupt their respective nomination races, and they've done that because they both have a similar appeal: They've tapped into anti-establishment passions with rhetoric that is a kind of wish-fulfillment fantasy for some voters. "He has the guts to say what others won't" could be the slogan for either of them.

I don't want to gloss over the content of that gut-driven bluntness. In Trump's case, just because he's saying what others won't doesn't mean what he's saying is true. And it's fair to point out that Trump's lowest-common-denominator xenophobia is a sugar high kind populism: it's cheap and easily reproduced but difficult to sustain. Sanders, on the other hand, offers a chewier and less visceral version of "us-versus-them": discussions about income inequality and financial regulatory policy don't create the same kind of direct line to voters' emotions that Trump's talk of rapists and thieves travels on.

The media is covering them in a similar fashion, too, though that's mainly a function of how the political media cover campaigns in general. The story is the process, not the messages or ideas. "Analysis" consists of asking, "What this will do the race?" and not, "What does it mean for voters?" Granted, only one of the candidates in question has ideas to cover. Indeed, Sanders reliance on a few big ideas—not personality, not easy outrage—is one of the reasons coverage of Sanders' rise has an element of arch bemusement. Note The New York Times: "Somehow, Bernie Sanders, the 73-year-old senator from Vermont, has emerged as a king of social media." Somehow!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think we need to just cut to the chase and have a real libertarian/conservative go up against Elizabeth Warren or avowed socialist Bernie Sanders.”
Trump coverage, of course, is more straightforwardly mocking (I highly recommend the Trump Chrome extension). While everyone wonders what Trump’s rise might do to the GOP race, no one is wondering how it is he got as far as he did. Just ask any of the other, “more serious” candidates, whose reluctance to criticize Trump proves that his only real divergence from the Republican mainstream is stylistic, not substantive.

On the other hand, there are real policy differences between Sanders and the Democratic leadership—that’s why he wasn’t a Democrat until recently, after all. Moderate Democrats have been denouncing Sanders with a vigor conspicuously absent from the intraparty Trump conversation: Missouri Senator Claire McCaskill complained, “I very rarely read in any coverage of Bernie that he’s a socialist” and declared him “too liberal” to be president.

Put it another way: When Democratic base voters flock to Sanders, they are expressing dissatisfaction what current Democratic policies. When Republican base voters flock to Trump, they are expressing dissatisfaction with Republican rhetoric.

But I said I was going to talk about what they had in common, and that’s easy enough here: whether its rhetorically or policy-wise, Trump and Sanders supporters are asking their parties to move away from the center—or, perhaps more clearly stated, away from each other.

Indeed, there are those on both sides who long for a Trump-Sanders match-up. It would, on some level, be a battle of caricatures—as defined by the opposing side. And what about the Democrats who would love to see Trump get the nomination? And Republicans who’d like to see Sanders? They envision that contest as referendum more than an election, a chance to finally and fatally eject the other side from the political spectrum. As Glenn Beck put it recently: “I think we need to just cut to the chase and have a real libertarian/conservative go up against Elizabeth Warren or avowed socialist Bernie Sanders. This country could finally make up its mind based on two honest and completely different visions of the future of this country.”

A nation born of revolution is given to absolutes, of course. (“Give me liberty or give me death,” no middle ground, etc.) But the Founders never thought we’d be using those words against each other. Beck and others frame the prospect of two extremists as a contest of “visions” but both sides are actually color blind: Everything is black and white. One side is totally wrong; one side is totally right. This zero-sum mentality and vengeful nihilism threaten to turn government into just another WWE show, a cage match of ideologies.

Left unspoken in these hyperbolic hypotheticals is what happens if the other guy’s caricature wins. That 50-50 chance of total validation is just too blinding, I guess. But what happens if their own caricature wins, more often than not, is just as vague. It’s standard practice to snigger when asking a supporter of a fringe candidate (though neither Trump nor Sanders are really fringe) what will happen were their dream president actually to sit down in the Oval Office. The objectively ridiculous proposition of a President Sanders or a President Trump actually trying to govern is supposed to destabilize the fantasy.

But the attraction of a Sanders or Trump presidency for true believers isn’t the opportunity to govern all of us, but the chance to punish the rest of us.

In June, the South Carolina Highway Patrol honor guard carried the mortal remains of the murdered Sen. Clementa Pinckney up the State House steps and into the rotunda.

Members of the honor guard flanked the open coffin, spit polished and erect, eyes straight ahead in a silent show of respect as thousands of mourners filed past. A black cloth had been draped over one of the windows to spare anyone who might be offended by the Confederate battle flag flying out front.

A bill called the Heritage Act passed in this very building prevented the flag from being lowered even to half-staff, much less taken down without a two-thirds vote of the legislature.

But on Thursday, the legislature voted to do just that and set a 24-hour deadline on having it done.

On Friday, the honor guard returned, this this time to lower the Confederate battle flag, which had been designed by William Porcher Miles, a onetime mayor of Charleston who had been a prominent “fire-eater,” as the most ardent proponents of slavery and secession leading up to the Civil War were called.

The honor guard had performed countless other ceremonies, but this one was a little different. And they had not been given much time to work out exactly how it should go.

The flag was being taken down in the first place because it was seen by many people—African-Americans in particular—as a hateful symbol of slavery and oppression. Some rightly view it as a shameful banner of treason.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Nothing was said. I felt like that was appropriate.”
But it had been hoisted there in the first place because it is viewed by others—none of them African-Americans—as a symbol of an idealized heritage and history.

And the very fact that the honor guard had been chosen to lower it was an implicit nod to those people.

At the appointed time on Friday morning, the guard went about lowering the flag with the same ritualistic respect as it would with the Stars and Stripes.

Two of the officers took the lowered banner in their white gloved hands.

And for a moment, it seemed as if they might fold it as they would an American flag that had covered the coffin of a fellow cop or a U.S. solider who had made the supreme sacrifice.

Instead, they rolled it, presumably an echo of the way Confederate regiments furled their battle flags in surrender at the end of the Civil War.

A black sergeant was the one who then took the furled banner. He had done this at American flag ceremonies where race was not issue, but it was hard to believe that he had been chosen by chance in this instance.

He seemed to be an attempt to compensate for the bigotry associated with what he now carried so solemnly over to the State House steps. The director of the South Carolina Relic Room and Military Museum waited to receive it.

For a second, truly terrible moment, the ritual was too much like that performed when the flag from a hero’s coffin is presented to a grieving loved one along with the words, “On behalf of a grateful nation….”

Thankfully, the sergeant uttered not a word. The director, Allen Roberson, was also silent as he took the furled flag.

“Nothing was said,” Roberson later told The Daily Beast. “I felt like that was appropriate.”

Roberson was escorted up into the State House.

“I just wanted to make sure I didn’t trip when I was carrying the flag,” he recalled.

He then descended to the basement, where an armored car was waiting to transport the flag to the museum.

Upon arriving, Robeson brought the flag in through a back door. The flag was unrolled, smoothed and carefully folded.

“So it wouldn’t crease,” Roberson said.

The museum’s registrar, Rachel Cockrell, and an intern named John Faulkenberry placed it in an “acid-free textile storage box, padded with acid-free tissue.” The box was stored in the museum’s “secure, climate-controlled Artifact Storage area.”

“Locked and alarmed,” Roberson said.

Courtesy of the SC Confederate Relic Room and Military Museum
Roberson dismissed as not entirely accurate reports that there had been a tacit agreement as part of a legislative compromise to store the flag in a multimillion-dollar facility funded by the taxpayers—which would include, necessarily, the descendants of slaves.

He allowed that there had been some brainstorming with various architects and planners, but nothing had been decided and whatever was ultimately done would not likely be so grand.

He noted that he has not been able to get added funding for anything in recent years.

“Our budget has not increased at all,” he said.

Back at the State House, the flagpole where the banner had flown was now bare, but a monument to the Confederate dead remained. The inscription on the north side reads:

perpetuates the memory, of those who

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

true to the instincts of their birth, faithful to the teachings of their fathers, constant in their love for the State,
died in the performance of their duty:
Who have glorified a fallen cause by the simple manhood of their lives, the patient endurance of suffering, and the heroism of death,
and who,
in the dark house of imprisonment,
in the hopelessness of the hospital, in the short, sharp agony of the field found support and consolation in the belief that at home they would not be forgotten.
Unveiled May 13, 1879"

The fallen cause they glorified included sedition and slavery. The people at home included slaves who had suffered horrors that outdid even war.

There is also an inscription on the north side:

"Let the stranger,
who may in the future times
read this inscription, recognize that these were men whom power could not corrupt, whom death could not terrify, whom defeat could not dishonor and let their virtues plead for just judgment of the cause in which they perished.
Let the South Carolinian of another generation remember that the State taught them how to live and how to die.
And that from her broken fortunes
she has preserved for her children the priceless treasure of their memories, teaching all who may claim the same birthright that truth, courage and patriotism endure forever."

The truth is they died fighting to deny fellow human beings the right to life and liberty. Their legacy is racism and hate.

The flowery falsehoods on the monument remain, now that the flag has been taken down in somber ceremony with white gloved hands and tucked safely away by a very nice museum director in an acid-free box, locked and alarmed.

Bernie Sanders is the Ron Paul of 2016 // The Hill // Eddie Zipperer – July 10, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is the Ron Paul of the 2016 election — with his enormous crowds, a network of hardcore supporters and an iconoclasm that seems to transcend the politics-as-usual establishment.

But none of that will be enough to carry him to victory. The fringe candidate drawing huge crowds and surging in the polls because he appeals to the party base is nothing new. He'll strut and fret his hour upon the stage and then be heard no more — just like then-Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas) in 2012.
Here's how Nina Malika Henderson summed up the state of the Paul campaign in The Washington Post on April 1, 2012: "[E]nthusiastic crowds who love Paul's fierce independence but fail to carry him to victory at the polls. After running in 30 states and gaining a scant 50 delegates, according to the Associated Press, Paul has learned a hard lesson: Crowds don't vote."

Sanders is going to learn the same lesson in a few months.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Geoffrey Skelley, associate editor of Larry Sabato's Crystal Ball at the University of Virginia Center for Politics, had this to say about Sanders's crowds:

Most of the places we've seen him draw huge crowds are exactly the kinds of spots where we might expect it: whiter urban areas like Denver and Minneapolis (compared to most big cities), liberal college towns like Madison, Wis., and now most recently in very white Portland, Maine, the most liberal part of the Pine Tree State. National polling hasn't shown Sanders making in-roads with nonwhite voters, and much of his support is coming from whites who are particularly liberal.

Progressive media outlets will continue to cite enormous crowds, cherry-picked state polls and a general feeling of Bernie-mania in order to push the narrative that Hillary Clinton is being seriously challenged.

In late 2011 to early 2012, Paul had a media surge very similar to what Sanders is experiencing now.

When Paul spoke at UCLA to a crowd of 6,000 to 7,000 people jammed into an over-capacity stadium, one wire service reported that Paul fans who couldn't get in were "climbing nearby trees to see the speech."

Stories of Paul's rise in the Iowa polls were ubiquitous for weeks.

But you know how the story ends: with former Gov. Mitt Romney (R-Mass.) coasting over the finish line and beating Paul by a count of nearly 1,400 delegates.

Paul had niche appeal, but not mass appeal. Any argument that Sanders will be different — that he'll score the mass appeal that Paul lacked — is two parts hope and zero parts reality.

Sanders's power to rise in the polls is going to slam headfirst into the socialist ceiling. It makes no difference what the word "socialism" means to Sanders or his supporters. A Gallup poll from June 22 showed that while 74 percent of Americans would vote for a gay or lesbian presidential candidate, 73 percent would vote for an evangelical Christian and 60 percent would vote for a Muslim, only 47 percent of Americans would vote for a socialist presidential candidate.

Then, there's money. If the rest of Sanders's problems don't shut his campaign down, the money problem will. Michael Hagen, associate professor of political science at Temple University, points out that "Sanders's funding situation will make it difficult for him to let Democrats know who he is and what he stands for."

The largest differences between Paul and Sanders are the advantages Paul enjoyed, which Sanders does not.

In order for Sanders — a candidate on the party's fringe — to win, he would need serious challengers to divide and conquer the Clinton coalition. Former Gov. Martin O'Malley (D-Md.), former Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) and former Gov. Lincoln Chaffee (D-R.I.) are practically nonexistent. Vice President Biden puts a small dent in Clinton's lead (as we've seen when his name is removed from polls). But Sanders fanatics need Biden and a second establishment challenger to step in. Preferably a big-name Democrat who is within an ideological arm's length of Clinton.

My goal is not to pour cold water on the hopes of Sanders fans. It is simply to hold a mirror up to nature and present the reality of his situation — a reality being ignored by the left-wing media where many Sanders fans turn to for their news.

Partisan news sources are food for intellectual dishonesty. The real story about candidates like Ron Paul and Bernie Sanders is the same every four years: big crowds, big hype, big loss.

Sanders: 'We have got to apologize for slavery' // Washington Examiner // Barbara Boland – July 10, 2015

"As a nation, we have got to apologize for slavery" Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., said during a recent Sirius XM interview.

Host Joe Madison of Sirius XM's "The Black Eagle" asked Sanders, "If elected president of the United States, would you apologize for slavery?"

"You know, obviously, nobody in this generation is involved in slavery," replied Sanders. "But as a nation, slavery is one of the abominations that our country has experienced. There is no excuse. What can we say about it? It was horrific, it killed millions of people who never made it even across the oceans, and it destroyed just the lives of so many people."

"So as a nation – and I don't think as a president, but as a nation – we have got to apologize for slavery, of course," Sanders said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"So is that a yes or a no?" asked Madison.

"Well, it's ... I mean ... I'm not exactly sure what it means," replied Sanders haltingly. "As a nation, we have got to apologize for slavery; and of course, the president is the leader of the nation."

While a recent poll found that Sanders trailed Democrat rival Hillary Clinton by only 12 points in New Hampshire, Sanders garners the support of only 5 percent of black Democrats according to a poll by Fox News.

The latest RealClearPolitics poll shows Clinton leading Sanders in the Democrat nomination by 48 points.

Presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders defends past votes on gun control measures // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders defended his past opposition to some gun control measures in a testy exchange Thursday night.

The Vermont senator and fast-rising progressive primary challenger to Hillary Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination doubled down on his past votes to block people from suing gun manufacturers and allow people to check guns in their baggage on Amtrak trains.

Sanders was confronted at an appearance by Honora Laszlo, the local chairwoman of Moms Demand Action for Gun Sense in America, who criticized him for his votes and statements opposing some gun control measures.

“If somebody has a gun and somebody steals that gun and shoots somebody, do you really think it makes sense to blame the manufacturer of that weapon?” Sanders said, before he and Laszlo began talking over one another.

“If somebody assaults you with a baseball bat, you hit somebody over the head, you’re not going to sue the baseball bat manufacturer,” Sanders continued. “There’s going to have to be some compromises on both sides. So I don’t apologize for that vote."

Sanders, a self-described Democratic socialist, is a hardline liberal on most issues. His economic populism has been earning him plaudits from progressives, generating enthusiasm with the liberal Democratic base and pumping up his poll numbers in early voting states. But he has a mixed record on gun control, and Clinton is to his left on an issue that’s crucial to many progressives.

The senator touted his votes to ban assault weapons, create instant background checks and close the gun show loophole, arguing that Democrats need to end the culture wars over guns to get “common-sense solutions” through.

“We can argue all that we want between Vermont and Montana and urban America about guns. We are not going to succeed,” he said.

Laszlo said she’d been a longtime Sanders fan and told the Daily News afterward that she arrived hoping he would walk away from his past positions because she’s not crazy about Clinton.

“He was dishonest in the way he talked about it. He is using this language that the NRA and their supporters use to polarize people,” she said. “I really hoped that if I gave him the chance to walk those statements back that he would, and instead he just really threw a bunch of smoke out.”

Bernie’s Big Break With the Left on Guns // US News and World Report // David Catanese – July 10, 2015

As a lifelong Bernie Sanders fan, Honora Laszlo was hoping for the best when she came to a forum here Thursday night to challenge the Vermont senator and presidential candidate on his gun control position.

The avowed socialist Sanders voted in 2005 to prohibit lawsuits against gun manufacturers when crimes are committed with their weapons. In the wake of the 2012 massacre at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Connecticut, he told a home-state media outlet that stronger gun control legislation wouldn't have prevented the shootings.

This bothered Laszlo, a member of the local chapter for Gun Sense In America, who agrees with Sanders on virtually every other issue. So she stood up to pointedly pin him down on the matter, seeking a conversion or at least a concession. Instead, she got a confrontation – which illuminated Sanders' weakest spot with liberals in his long-shot quest for the Democratic Party nomination.

Laszlo first wanted to know how Sanders could claim that further gun control measures wouldn't prevent future mass casualty tragedies. She then pressed for an explanation on his 2005 vote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A defender of the Second Amendment from a rural state, Sanders explained he knows tens of thousands of his constituents who hunt and target practice safely and lawfully. He stressed he has voted for a ban on assault weapons, in favor of instant background checks and to close the gun-show loophole covering private sales.

But not unlike many conservatives from the heartland of America, Sanders asserted that it would be folly to make Burlington and Boston live under the same gun laws.

"The overwhelming majority of people who hunt know about guns and respect guns and are law-abiding people. That's the truth," he said. "We will not succeed on this terribly important issue if we continue the cultural warfare between urban America and rural America."

But his answer on why gun manufacturers should be shielded from civil lawsuits is what really irked Laszlo.

"If somebody sells you a baseball bat and you hit somebody over the head, you're not going to sue the baseball bat manufacturer," Sanders said, to a smattering of applause among a mostly liberal audience. "I don't apologize for that vote."

Afterward, Laszlo called that analogy "ridiculous" and felt Sanders was employing language that mimicked the "dog-whistling" of the National Rifle Association. (The lawmaker's current grade from the NRA is still an F.)

"[Baseball bats] have other uses. The guns we're talking about only are designed to kill a lot of people in a short amount of time," she says. "It's not about whether people like guns or don't. This honest conversation he's talking about is not at all rural versus urban because there's a lot of people that are killed in rural communities all the time."

Whereas Sanders posited that he had a balanced record on gun control that heeds to his state's culture but acknowledges the nationwide problem, Laszlo found his language as polarizing as some on the right.

"He reinforces the idea in people on the other side of the divide that this is about people hating them and about people hating guns. This is not. This is about safety," she says.

A super PAC supporting former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has also identified gun control as Sanders' weak spot, running an ad targeting the very issue concerning Laszlo. "Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns," it blares.

Additionally, Hillary Clinton has been more vocal on gun violence in recent weeks, promising to speak out against the "gun lobby" and "uncontrollable use of guns in our country." She has yet to directly frame a contrast with Sanders.

But the line of attack hasn't gained serious traction yet, mostly because liberals have prioritized Sanders' withering message of economic inequality over all else.

"These Vermonters like their guns, but ya know, we go along with that," says Madi Green, a Sanders fan in the audience who also disagrees with his gun control stand. "You just say, 'OK, they're hunters,' you pardon them.'

But Laszlo isn't giving him a pass.

She was yearning for him to change her mind: "He absolutely could've, if he had talked about it in a different way."

Instead, she walked out of Thursday's forum unable to support him.

"A lot of us were super Bernie Sanders supporters before," she says. "We were all really disappointed to hear him talk about it in this way that is boilerplate NRA language."

Did Bernie Sanders vote against background checks and waiting periods for gun purchases? // PolitiFact // Linda Qiu – July 10, 2015

As hype around Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders grows, political opponents and media reporters are once again suggesting the socialist Vermont senator is a gun nut.

"One issue your Democratic rivals are starting to hit you with is the fact that you have, in the past, sided with the NRA on some gun issues," CNN's Jake Tapper said in a July 5 interview with Sanders, alluding to an attack ad paid for by a pro-Martin O'Malley group.

"Bernie Sanders voted against the Brady Bill -- background checks and waiting periods," said the attack, which first aired June 25. "Bernie Sanders is no progressive when it comes to guns."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders' record on guns has been the subject of liberal ire ("Bernie Sanders, gun nut") as well as conservative glee ("Sorry liberals, Bernie Sanders is a gun nut"). So we wanted to take a look at his vote on the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act, a landmark piece of gun control legislation.

The Brady Act mandated that everyone who wanted to buy a handgun had to wait five days while local law enforcement ran criminal background checks. (After 1998, the firearm dealers became responsible for conducting the checks.)

But before Brady became law, it underwent many transformations. Sanders, elected to the House of Representatives in 1990, voted on it numerous times, virtually almost always in opposition:

• In May 1991, Sanders voted against a version that mandated a seven-day waiting period for background checks, but the bill passed in the House.

• The Senate decreased the waiting period to five days and the bill returned to the House. In Nov. 1991, Sanders voted against that version. Though it passed in the House, the Senate didn't muster enough votes. The Brady bill and its gun control stance remained in limbo during 1992.

• After some back and forth, a version of the bill resurfaced that reinstated the five day waiting period. In November 1993, Sanders voted against that version but for an amendment imposing an instant background check instead (seen by some as pointless, as the technology for instant checks didn't exist at the time).

• He also voted against an amendment that would have ended state waiting periods, and for an amendment giving those denied a gun the right to know why.

• The final compromise version of the Brady bill -- an interim five-day waiting period while installing an instant background check system -- was passed and signed into law on Nov. 30, 1993. Sanders voted against it.

According to Sanders' campaign manager Jeff Weaver, Sanders' reason for opposing the Brady bill was two-fold. First, he believed implementing a national waiting period was federal overreach. And second, he was doing his job.

"He wasn't opposed to states having (waiting periods) if they wanted to. The Republicans wanted to repeal waiting periods in states that had them, and Bernie voted that down," Weaver said. "He said he would be against waiting periods, and he kept his word to the people of Vermont."

In April 1991, Sanders' then-chief of staff Anthony Pollina echoed the idea that Sanders was simply representing the will of his constituents.

"Bernie's response is that he doesn't just represent liberals and progressives. He was sent to Washington to present all of Vermont," Pollina said. "It's not inappropriate for a congressman to support a majority position, particularly on something Vermonters have been very clear about."

The Green Mountain State, though left-leaning, has a high gun ownership rate and lax gun control laws (as well as a low homicide rate). That and Sanders' own personal views are reflected in his overall voting record, experts told us.

"As a rural state with a large number of hunters and other gun owners, Vermont has been less liberal on guns than on most other issues, historically," explained Bertram Johnson, a professor of political science at Middlebury College in Vermont. "He seems to support more regulation of guns than the U.S. presently has, but he recognizes his constituents' preferences so does not make gun control a priority."

"I think he has disappointed many progressives in Vermont with his gun positions, which sort of walk a middle line – and angering both sides through the years," said Chris Graff, the former Vermont Associated Press bureau chief. "Gun control is a tough issue in Vermont for all politicians."

Former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, whose 2004 presidential bid is often compared to Sanders' 2016 run, received high marks from the National Rifle Association. Vermont Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy also voted against the Brady bill. For his part, Sanders has voted to tighten gun control about half the time, and to protect Second Amendment rights the other half.

Here are his votes on key gun bills in his 25 years in Congress (bold reflects a pro-gun control position):

Sanders' moderate stance is noted by firearm enthusiasts and gun control advocates alike. Former NRA research coordinator Paul Blackman says the group doesn't consider Sanders "an anti-gunner," and he's received mixed marks from NRA ranging from a C- to F. Brady Campaign president Dan Gross says Sanders has shown suppleness and evolution since those first Brady votes and added he isn't a "gun lobby lapdog."

Experts agreed that on guns, Sanders' views are to the right of his Democratic rivals.

"When it comes to guns, he's not Ted Cruz, but he believes federal policy should be less intrusive than Martin O'Malley or Hillary Clinton," said Eric Davis, who studies Vermont politics at Middlebury College. "Guns are not an important issue for him, because they don't fit into the class-based framework that Bernie looks at politics through."

Our ruling

An attack ad said, "Bernie Sanders voted against the Brady Bill -- background checks and waiting periods."

The Brady bill imposed a five-day waiting period for would-be purchasers of handguns. Between 1991 and 1993, Sanders voted against it five times. He did, however, vote for a version of the bill that imposed instant background checks, and against an amendment that repealed state background checks.

Experts noted Sanders' votes were representative of Vermont's gun owners and gun laws. Since the 1990s, his record on gun control is mixed.

GOP Officials Publicly Denounce Bernie Sanders' Obamacare Expansion, Quietly Request Funding // The Intercept // Lee Fang – July 10, 2015

he conventional wisdom on Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont is that he's a charming if impractical dreamer, a pie-in-the-sky socialist who's good at inspiring young people and aging hippies, but hopeless at the knife fighting that real-life politics requires.

Despite the inherent limitations of a self-described democratic socialist who eschews the norms of Beltway fundraising, the Democratic presidential candidate from Vermont has won legislative victory after victory on an issue that has been dear to him since his days as Burlington's mayor.

That issue is the simultaneously benign and revolutionary expansion of federally qualified community health clinics.

Over the years, Sanders has tucked away funding for health centers in appropriation bills signed by George W. Bush, into Barack Obama's stimulus program, and through the earmarking process. But his biggest achievement came in 2010 through the Affordable Care Act. In a series of high-stakes legislative maneuvers, Sanders struck a deal to include $11 billion for health clinics in the law.

The result has made an indelible mark on American health care, extending the number of people served by clinics from 18 million before the ACA to an expected 28 million next year.

As one would expect, the program was largely met with plaudits from patients and public health experts, but it has also won praise from even the biggest Obamacare critics on Capitol Hill. In letters I obtained through multiple record requests, dozens of Republican lawmakers, including members of the House and Senate leadership, have privately praised the ACA clinic funding, calling health centers a vital provider in both rural and urban communities.

To Sanders, the clinics have served as an alternative to his preferred single-payer system. Community health centers accept anyone regardless of health, insurance status or ability to pay. They are founded and managed by a board composed of patients and local residents, so each center is customized to fit the needs of a community. No two health centers are alike.

In rural North Carolina, ACA-backed health centers now provide dental and nutrition services, while in San Francisco, the clinics provide translation services and outreach for immigrant families. In other areas, they provide mental health counseling, low-cost prescription drugs, and serve as the primary care doctors for entire counties. They have also served as a platform for innovation, introducing electronic medical record systems and paving the way with new methods for tracking those most susceptible for heart disease and diabetes.

Author John Dittmer, in The Good Doctors, traces the history of the modern health center to the civil rights activists who ventured into the South during the early 1960s. The activists were seen as outside agitators, and local doctors refused to treat them. As a solution, volunteer bands of physicians were organized by a group called the Medical Committee for Human Rights.

Beyond treating the civil rights workers, the MCHR physicians were struck by the stark disparity in health services, encountering many African-Americans who had never seen a doctor before in their lives. The activist physicians returned to the South after the “Freedom Rides” to found a small clinic in Mound Bayou, Mississippi, in the heart of the Mississippi Delta, and by doing so, began a movement to launch health clinics across the country in underserved areas. Winning support from President Lyndon Johnson’s Office of Economic Opportunity, the clinics became part of Johnson’s “War on Poverty.”

Over the years, health centers have gained support on a bipartisan basis. Health centers secured critical funding from the efforts of the late Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., and both George W. Bush and John McCain campaigned on pledges to expand them.

Sanders’s place in health clinic history will be remembered for his forceful role in the winter of the health reform debate. In December 2009, tensions ran high as Congress inched closer to a final health reform deal. Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., tapped Sanders to help win support from liberals who thought the bill was too weak as well as from Democrats from rural states who were facing mounting pressure. More funding for community health centers, Sanders argued, was a win-win solution for both camps, since the program would ensure access to health care for even the most remote areas of the country while also helping those without insurance. Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., among others, held out to the very last moment.

Two days before the Senate voted to break a Republican filibuster of the bill, Reid called on Sanders to make his case on the Senate floor. Sanders, in typical fashion, said the legislation was far from perfect, but thundered about the common-sense need for health centers, citing the acute demand for more primary care doctors, the cost-savings from patients who would otherwise use the emergency room for the common cold, the patient-centered model of clinics, and so on. Senate Democrats rallied and overcame the Republican filibuster.

Another turning point came several weeks later, when Massachusetts Republican Scott Brown won a special election in an upset victory, ending the Democrats’ filibuster-proof majority. Brown’s election brought Democrats close to despair, because lawmakers could only use a procedure called reconciliation to pass the law. Such a move would keep chances for passage alive while foreclosing any chance of enacting the much stronger legislation that originated in the House of Representatives through a conference committee. For progressives, it was a painful blow that not only sealed the defeat of the Public Option insurance program but also removed many robust provisions they had worked hard to include. Again called upon to work out a solution with House liberals, with whom Sanders enjoys a strong working relationship, the Vermont senator forged a deal to build support for the bill by focusing on health clinics.

Daniel Hawkins, vice president of the National Association of Community Health Centers, recalls that in the end Sanders was able to negotiate with Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C., to increase health clinic funding through a special technical amendment that could modify the reconciliation Senate bill through a simple majority vote. The technical amendment passed, with $9.5 billion targeted for health center operations and $1.5 billion for construction and renovation projects. The House passed the final Senate bill, and President Obama signed the legislation with $11 billion in health clinic funding into law on March 23, 2010.

“There was no one who played a more important role than Senator Sanders,” Hawkins says, remembering Sanders’s constant lobbying of other lawmakers to support the funding.

Although the health reform has transformed the funding of local health clinics, few patients even realize that the changes have occurred as a result of the law, because few aspects of the health reform are explicitly branded as being part of the ACA.

That relative invisibility has shielded health clinic funding from the hyper-partisan attacks faced by other provisions of the law. But it has also allowed Republican opponents of Obamacare to play a two-faced game. Every single congressional Republican has voted to repeal the entire bill, health center funding included. But many have taken credit for popular local health clinic programs funded by the ACA, without disclosing the source of the funds. Others have written letters expressing their support for the money.

As I reported previously for The Nation, Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., among other Republicans, authored letters to the Obama administration to recommend ACA funding for local health clinics. Now, a new batch of letters, obtained through a Freedom of Information Act request, shows other requests by GOP leaders.

Rep. Steve Scalise, R-La., the House Republican whip, for instance, signed onto a letter with other members of the Louisiana congressional delegation to ask the Obama administration for health center funding in New Orleans. The proposed clinic, the letter noted, would build a graduate medical training program, a proposal that “will attract not only more citizens back to our community but provide critical training opportunities for our region’s future healthcare workforce.”

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, the number two leader in the Senate, wrote at least 17 letters to the administration asking for funding, in cities such as Lubbock and Houston, for a wide range of programs, including clinics devoted to low-income rural residents and Asian-Americans in Texas. Senators Mark Kirk, R-Ill., Kelly Ayotte, R-N.H.,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

David Vitter, R-La., Rob Portman, R-Ohio, and Pat Toomey, R-Pa., made similar requests.

It's no wonder that politicians from rural states such as Texas would seek community health centers to better serve their constituents. A recent report from the Texas A&M School of Public Health found that only 9 percent of physicians practice in rural areas. Many rural Texans live in areas that are more than 30 minutes from the nearest hospital, which dramatically raises mortality rates in cases of medical emergencies.

Still, press releases from GOP officials have lashed out at the Affordable Care Act's health center funding as some sort of "slush fund."

Regardless of the politics, the success of health centers has been particularly satisfying for Sanders, who can simply point to his own state as a reminder of its impact. One in four Vermonters are now served by more than 50 health centers throughout the state, according to the senator's office. Just last month, a new federally qualified health clinic opened in Shoreham, Vermont, to provide dental care, physicals and medication for common diseases.

Though his own role in securing the funds for the ACA is barely mentioned on his Senate website, the image gallery is adorned with pictures of Sanders beaming a smile as he breaks ground and cuts ribbons for various health clinic openings in Vermont.

Jim Webb arrives in the age of Sanders and Trump // The Hill // Bernie Quigley – July 10, 2015

Years ago, when I went to the Baptist South to work at a college, the country women who came down from the hills to work in our offices offered life advice as I, coming into the country from New York City, seemed likely to need it. Which I did. Like when our last child was about to be born, they would ask, "Did you get your girl yet?" Actually, no. All boys so far. "She'll come on the moon," they would say. And as I recall, she did come on the full moon. They would often advise, "When God closes a door, he opens a window," which was pretty metaphysical stuff but might be as accurate as any historical hypothesis: Things begin again where they end, and the world starts again right there as if from scratch.

It came to mind yesterday afternoon, when South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R) announced that the Confederate battle flag would be removed from the State House. Fifty years ago it went up, not so much to respect the tradition of honor and bravery in America's most difficult and important moment, but to repudiate congressional passage of the civil rights efforts.
The Confederate flag, shorn of original intent, symbolically represented that counterforce and yesterday it ended. So it was an auspicious day for Jim Webb (D), former Virginia senator and secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, who announced last week that he will run for president, to make his public debut in a morning interview on "CBS This Morning."

The battle flag has "long been due to come down," he said. Webb had been criticized on comments recently on the history of the South and the Confederate flag. And it was a good interview. It slowed things down. Webb explained his thinking as the interviewers egged him on to speed it up and get to it: How you gonna beat Hillary, that's what we're talking about.

But that was not what Webb was talking about. When Webb cited statistics about slave ownership and participation of the Civil War, he explained himself, citing the master historian John Hope Franklin, bringing his own tempo to the discussion.

It may have been one of those days yesterday when the South awakened as if from a great sleep, or another day, possibly beginning a new era in which the South will fight for its life and our own. As oddly enough, history has turned in the last few weeks and Webb comes to us in that turning.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and celebrity entrepreneur and politico Donald Trump enter fate virtually at the same moment. The mainstream media tell us not to worry — they will soon go away (it is their job to say so) — but one can look with some disgust today at former Presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush on stage together, Bush declaring that former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, both candidates for president, will "elevate the discourse." It is, as might be heard in the hills, "enough to gag a horse."

Instead, for whatever else might be said about these two, Sanders and Trump, they transcend the painful banality of Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush and awaken new energies. Energies, however, which suggest or approximate the formulation of the the last world more than a hundred years ago, when Leon Trotsky was writing his first dramatic prose in Russia and Gabriele D'Annunzio rode bareback on the beach to the rise of fascism in Italy.

Sanders has hundreds of thousands of Facebook followers and has commandeered the millennials. Trump comes at a time when at least two dozen American states in the middle and north of Texas are looking for a dramatic, public figure to oppose the federal government on a garden variety of issues. They will not go away. It is Jeb Bush will go away. Hillary Clinton will go away. Like Haile Selassie, god king of Ethiopia, an old antique lost in the attic of history, they are suddenly caught in history's cross fires and will remain mystified to the very end about their sudden irrelevance.

Said here in The Hill recently, as the Confederate flag comes down, the Gadsden flag goes up. We face a coming era of civil disobedience, commentator Pat Buchanan writes this week, but this time it will be conservatives. Indeed, it is well underway as Texas Gov. Greg Abbott (R) brings an impressive posse of heartland governors to challenge the president's executive order on immigration. The idea has caught on. As The Hill reports, "State legislators around the country have introduced more than 200 bills aiming to nullify regulations and laws coming out of Washington, D.C., as they look to rein in the federal government."

This movement needs a dramatic (flamboyant) public spokesperson and it will be Trump. And New York Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) today rallies the major cities against the governors, in coordination with the president and the federal government. He likewise needs a dramatic, charismatic public figure as spokesperson and that surely is to be Sanders.

This is where Webb enters history, and he arrives with a sterling endorsement by one of the most respected scholars and commentators today, Andrew Bacevich.

Of all proposed candidates, writes Bacevich, "Only Webb has the bona fides to promote a serious debate that looks beyond bogus issues such as Benghazi."

Possibly it is nature that sends the single indispensable warrior to us at times like this, as the women of Appalachian hills will say, to open a window. That warrior is Jim Webb.

Bill Clinton's Candid Views of the Political Press // NYT // Amy Chozick – July 10, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's relations with the political news media had been tense long before she declared her candidacy in April, and her campaign's efforts to try and improve those relations have backfired at times.

On Thursday, Bill Clinton provided a candid look at how the former first couple felt about the role the news media played in the presidential campaign.

At a joint event in Dallas alongside George W. Bush, Mr. Clinton said that part of the nation's problem was a news media driven by the belief that "conflict is better than concord."

Mr. Bush blamed the political divisiveness on candidates' impassioned surrogates and the Internet granting them a veil of anonymity to hurl nasty attacks. But Mr. Clinton ultimately put the blame squarely on the political press.

"Let's suppose we were in a campaign against each other," he said to his predecessor. "He would have his narrative and I would have mine and each of us would try to convince you that our narrative was better than the other. That's O.K.

"But the people covering the campaign, they develop a narrative, too, a storyline, and it's almost impossible for the real story to be the same as the storyline," Mr. Clinton said. "It's very hard for the American people to be well informed if the storyline swamps the real story."

Mr. Clinton did not specifically mention Mrs. Clinton's campaign (except for saying "I know who I want to win") and he did not discuss recent articles about her use of private email at the State Department and foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation.

His comments come just days after Mrs. Clinton tried to begin a more accessible phase in the campaign, by sitting down on Tuesday with CNN's Brianna Keilar in her first national interview.

In his remarks, Mr. Clinton also echoed a frequent and widely held complaint that the political press is too focused on the horse race of who is ahead in the campaign rather than policy and issues.

Latinos Gather For NCLR Conference Amid Political Spotlight // // NYT – Upshot // Griselda Nevarez – July 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An estimated 2,000 Latinos are expected to attend the National Council of La Raza's annual conference, which kicks off Saturday in Kansas City, Missouri.

NCLR prides itself as the nation's largest Hispanic civil rights and advocacy organization. The four-day conference is garnering the national political spotlight - the top three Democratic presidential candidates will address the Latino advocates and leaders gathered at the event.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is scheduled to speak Monday morning at a town hall forum. Also speaking Monday during a luncheon are former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who is considered the Democratic front-runner in the race for president, and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

The candidates are "expected to address issues vital to Latinos and all Americans: jobs and the economy, civil rights, immigration, education and more," according to NCLR.

Republican presidential candidates were invited to attend but none are scheduled to speak.

The conference comes several weeks after Republican presidential hopeful Ben Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, was the only Republican to speak at the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials' annual conference in Las Vegas. Sanders and Clinton also spoke at the NALEO conference.

It also comes as at a time when Latino leaders are urging Republican presidential candidates to counter remarks surrounding Donald Trump after his controversial comments that Mexico is sending "rapists" and "criminals" to the U.S.

The conference takes place in Missouri, a state which has experienced strong Latino growth over the last few years. Currently, Latinos make up nearly 4 percent of the state's population and 10 percent of Kansas City residents. Between 2000 and 2010, Missouri's Latino population grew by 79.2 percent, according to the U.S. Census.

DNC Chair Says Candidates Must Meet 'Threshold' For Debates, Though Criteria And Dates Still Unclear // HuffPo // Michael Calderone – July 10, 2015

Democratic presidential candidates will have to meet a certain "threshold" to participate in the party's six scheduled primary debates, Democratic National Committee Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz said Thursday, though she did not specify which criteria, such as state or national polling, will be used to determine who qualifies.

"It'll be a threshold that'll be expansive and allows for the maximum inclusion of our major party candidates," Wasserman Schultz told MSNBC's Ari Melber. She said the DNC hasn't "quite finished formulating the details" for the debates, including specific dates, locations and media sponsors.

The lack of clarity has been frustrating to both campaigns and major TV networks, the latter of which produce the debates and need to book venues and handle logistical details well in advance.

In May, the DNC announced plans to hold six primary debates, four of which would be held in the early voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada. The DNC said debates would begin in "the fall of 2015," though didn't specify when.

The first Republican debate, sponsored by Fox News, is scheduled to take place less than four weeks from now, with the second and third GOP contests planned for September (CNN) and October (CNBC).

The DNC's plan drew criticism from Democratic presidential contender Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who urged Wasserman Schultz to accelerate the schedule and start debates during the summer, as well as to consider including Republican contenders. "I believe we need to go beyond the bounds of traditional party debates," Sanders wrote in a letter.

It's understandable Sanders would want more debates given that national media exposure likely benefits him and any candidates not named Hillary Clinton. She already has worldwide name recognition, is a clear front-runner in the polls, and presumably has the most to lose by getting on the debate stage. Some Democrats have suggested the DNC is protecting Clinton by sanctioning only six debates.

In response to Sanders' request, a DNC spokeswoman reiterated on June 1 that the committee would continue with the six-debate framework and said more details would be provided "in the coming weeks."

The Republican schedule, meanwhile, has been settled since January. The Republican National Committee announced plans to hold nine debates, along with their locations, media sponsors and each month they'd take place. The RNC also announced that three additional debates could be sanctioned depending on the circumstances next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though the Republicans' schedule was rolled out smoothly, the debates haven't been without controversy. Fox News' decision to limit its primetime debate to only candidates ranking in the top 10 in national polls has drawn criticism from campaigns arguing that the barrier for entry is placing too much emphasis on national name recognition rather than early state campaigning.

Both the RNC and DNC are taking a firmer hand with the debate process by penalizing candidates who participate in non-sanctioned debates by not allowing them in sanctioned events. Candidates may attend forums in which they don't directly engage with one another.

Democratic candidates appeared in over two dozen debates in 2008, which included repeated verbal slugfests between Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton. Republican candidates debated 20 times in 2012, a grueling process that party leaders want to avoid this cycle.

Hillary and her rivals to meet with union leaders // Washington Examiner // Sean Higgins – July 10, 2015

Front-running Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and her top challengers, Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, will meet privately with the AFL-CIO's executive council at the end of July.

Union leaders will press the candidates on their stances, particularly on international trade, at the meeting in Silver Spring, Md., Reuters reported.

That will be a tricky issue for Clinton, who has tried to stay above both the recent congressional fight over Trade Promotion Authority legislation and the looming one over the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a 12-nation trade deal. Clinton has not taken definitive positions on either. Labor leaders strongly oppose both, and AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka has said trade will be crucial to 12 million-member labor federation's presidential endorsement.

Sanders, I-Vt., has consistently and loudly opposed President Obama's trade agenda. O'Malley opposes both as well.

"There is no middle ground, and the time for deliberations is drawing to a close. In the 2016 campaign, there will be no place to hide for those who aspire to lead America," Trumka said in an April speech at the AFL-CIO's Washington headquarters on trade and the election.

Asked after the speech if he was calling on Clinton to issue a clear statement on Trade Promotion Authority, Trumka told the Washington Examiner, he was referring to "all candidates." He added later that Clinton "would have to respond like every candidate."

Clinton, nevertheless, did not issue a clear statement. Her status as the front-runner far ahead of all other Democratic candidates in the polls has made liberal groups reluctant to criticize her. Sanders has gained in recent polls, though, and the prospect of Vice President Joe Biden entering the race means she may not be able to count on that advantage forever.

Trade is treacherous territory for Clinton. Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, used a version of Trade Promotion Authority to help secure passage of the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement in 1994, but she voted against renewing the authority in 2002 when she was a New York senator.

Coming out in opposition of the Trans-Pacific Partnership would put Clinton at odds with the administration where she served as the top official on international relations and took part in the deal's negotiations. Supporting it would put her at odds with much of the party's base as she tries to lock down the party's presidential nomination with a minimum of drama.

She has tried to adopt a more skeptical position on trade in recent months, but has left open the possibility that she could support the administration's agenda.

Jeb Bush Draws on Family Dynasty for Fund-Raising Efforts // NYT // Nicholas Confessore – July 10, 2015

The Bush people arrived by private plane, black car and finally old-fashioned trolley, shuttled in by the hundreds for a bonding ritual unlike anything else in contemporary politics.

They posed on the lawn for pictures with Barbara Bush, the former first lady. They dined on lobster rolls and burgers, traded business cards with eminent executives and former ambassadors, and basked in the inner sanctum of the most successful political dynasty in history.

“This is to the Bushes what Hyannis Port is to the Kennedys,” said Dirk Van Dongen, a lobbyist in Washington, making his first journey to the Bush family compound.

In his early months as a candidate, Jeb Bush seemed unsure of how tightly to embrace the family mantle, dodging questions about the record of his older brother, George W. Bush, as president, eschewing his surname on bumper stickers and declaring at his campaign kickoff that “not a one of us deserves the job by right of résumé, party, seniority, family or family narrative.”

But Jeb Bush is now seeking both advantage and refuge in the trappings of a dynasty, eagerly deploying the unique political assets of a family that has already supplied two United States presidents and that hopes to produce a third.

His father, his mother, his wife and even his son have raised money for the campaign or for his “super PAC,” tapping into a vast network of donors that began with the Bush family’s Christmas card mailing list. And the Bush family compound in Kennebunkport — for decades the ultimate V.I.P. room in Republican politics — is now Mr. Bush’s reward to bestow.

On Monday, the last Republican presidential candidate, Mitt Romney, dined there with Mr. Bush, hoping to soothe lingering hurt over what Mr. Romney’s supporters considered a desultory endorsement of their nominee in 2012.

And as the donors arrived here on Thursday for two days of cocktails and strategy briefings, Mr. Bush’s campaign and super PAC announced that they had amassed more money, and more quickly, than any presidential effort in history, easily outpacing his rivals for the Republican nomination.

Money Raised So Far
The first Federal Election Commission filing deadline for presidential candidates is Wednesday, but some organizations have released their totals early. Below, the announced money raised by the campaigns, “super PACs” and nonprofits supporting each candidate.

“I think Jeb’s made clear that he’s not going to run away from his family,” said Eric J. Tanenblatt, who led the Georgia campaign efforts of George W. Bush during the 2000 presidential campaign.

Donor retreats have become a routine feature of presidential campaigns, all the more important as the price tag for a major-party candidacy breaches the $1 billion mark. They are curated to reflect some actual or projected essence of the candidate: Hillary Rodham Clinton gathered her top fund-raisers in May at a Brooklyn warehouse, for example, while Mr. Romney invited top donors for annual hikes and foreign policy lectures at the Stein Eriksen ski resort in Utah, a favorite destination of his family.

George W. Bush, a Texan who styled himself as a political outsider, pointedly eschewed the establishment trappings of Maine: Many of the donors in Kennebunkport recalled, with something less than fondness, their frequent meetings at Mr. Bush’s ranch in Crawford, Tex., huddled under a tent in 100-degree heat.

But few candidates, they said, could compete with the Bush family seat, a compound of a half-dozen homes on a rocky spit jutting into the Atlantic, one of them recently built for Jeb Bush and his family. The guests were greeted by Mr. Bush’s mother and ushered into the main house for drinks, where the elder George Bush made a brief appearance.

The veteran Bush donors had chosen their socks carefully, in tribute to the elder Mr. Bush, known for his taste in brightly colored ones. Later, they dined at a nearby luxury hotel, where Jeb Bush promised his guests that he would not let their hard work go for naught.

“You leave saying: Not only was the next president of the United States, but the most important American of my lifetime, George H. W. Bush, sitting at my table, making me feel comfortable,” said Ron Kaufman, who served as political director for the elder Mr. Bush.

crass, said, “For fund-raising, it is gold.”

“It’s not hauling these guys into a two-week rental in Martha’s Vineyard,” the fund-raiser said, adding that Kennebunkport was “a little bit more special than what Hillary can offer.”

The guests who trickled onto the compound were a microcosm of the financial operation that Mr. Bush is hoping will overwhelm his rivals. Robert M. Duncan, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, and Woody Johnson, the owner of the New York Jets, are among the party’s leading fund-raisers. There was also new blood: a contingent in their 30s and 40s who one donor referred to as “P’s crowd,” referring to one of Jeb Bush’s sons, George P. Bush.

Some had served under, or raised money for, the last two Presidents Bush and fondly recalled their past visits to Maine. One guest, trying to convey the simplicity of the Bush home, described arriving on a past Kennebunkport visit and being offered a bowl of Fritos.

“All of you who are playing shrink to the Bushes these days overstate a lot of things,” Mr. Kaufman said. “The truth is, Jeb has always summered in Kennebunkport. This is his place. He loves it in his blood. This is him.”

That time Jeb Bush invited 300 top donors to his parents’ house // WaPo // Ed O’Keefe – July 10, 2015

One by one, nearly 300 of Jeb Bush's top donors, from New York, Washington, Miami — even Americans living abroad in China and Germany — climbed aboard a trolley here for a trip a mile and a half down Ocean Avenue.

There was Dina Powell, a Goldman Sachs executive and a former assistant secretary of state under George W. Bush. And Mike Duncan, the former Republican National Committee chairman. Several Floridians — including Agriculture Commissioner Adam Putnam, former Republican Sen. George Lemieux and former Republican Gov. Bob Martinez. Younger faces like Jay Zeidman, a close friend of George P. Bush, were among a few dozen notably youthful benefactors.

Woody Johnson, Bush's national finance chairman, was one of the last people to board a trolley Thursday evening as the crowd traveled to the nearby Bush family estate. The owner of the NFL's New York Jets was carrying a white visor with the team's green logo.

Admiring a green sweater slung over the shoulders of a fellow donor, Johnson commented: "You can never have too much green."

The confab for some of the GOP's wealthiest donors came just hours after Bush's campaign and an allied super PAC announced that they'd donated more than $114 million to support the former governor — an unprecedented sum in American politics that gives him a sizable financial advantage over more than a dozen GOP rivals.

Bush had announced plans for the Kennebunkport donor retreat at the start of his campaign, dangling one of the most cherished chits in Republican politics -- a visit to his family's storied beachfront estate -- as an incentive to entice benefactors to deliver. Supporters who gave the maximum $2,700 to Bush's primary campaign, and were able to find at least 10 other people also willing to do so, were invited to attend.

Bush was asked by reporters on Wednesday night why he had decided to hold the retreat at his parents' estate, known as Walker's Point. He deflected the question by clarifying that "It's at the Colony, it's not at my parents' home, that would be a little overwhelming for them."

That was kind of correct.

The Colony Hotel is where most guests stayed and where closed-door briefings will be held with top campaign officials on Friday. But on Thursday evening, the family compound at Walker's Point was the main venue.

The gathering began at the hotel around 5 p.m., as attendees gathered at the Carriage House, with about a half dozen Secret Service agents looking on. Some in the crowd said that they'd just learned about Bush's fundraising total.

Once on the grounds of the estate, the crowd was split up in groups of 40 or 50 for a quick tour. Former President George H.W. Bush and his wife, Barbara, were the main tour guides, leading people across the compound to their home on the southern tip. Elated at the invitation, some attendees quickly posted photos on social media.

"Incredible night in Kennebunkport! #allinforjeb," Fritz Brogan, a Washington-based donor and former aide to Jeb Bush when he was Florida governor, wrote on Facebook as he posted a photo of him alongside George H.W. Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reporters were not allowed to attend the dinner, but could easily watch the proceedings from a public overlook about 1,200 yards to the west, where tourists and locals often gawk at the property.

Around 5:30 p.m., Jeb Bush was spotted entering his parents' home and came out a few minutes later, dressed in a dark blue sweater, to greet his donors. The entire party posed for a photo on the western lawn of the home around 6 p.m. Several attendees held campaign signs aloft as a photographer took shots of the crowd. Barbara Bush — with her infamous locks of white hair — was easily spotted from a distance standing in the front wearing a bright coral sweater.

After the photo and more mingling, the crowd was transported to the nearby Hidden Pond luxury resort. The mood was celebratory, as donors dined on lobster rolls and hamburgers and Bush touted their record-breaking fundraising effort. His wife, Columba, was on hand, smiling proudly.

"Money is great but votes matter a lot more. I will outwork everybody," Bush said, according to attendees, who asked to remain anonymous because guests were asked not to discuss details.

Already, the campaign is plotting ahead: Donors said there's talk of plans to have top donors help raise another $20,000 over the next 20 days in order to win an invitation to a campaign-sponsored party in Cleveland on Aug. 6 — the date of the first Republican presidential debate.

As the crowd mingled on the lawn of Bush home, tourists at the lookout watched unaware of why such a large crowd had gathered.

"They didn't invite us," quipped a woman who said she grew up in Kennebunkport and was visiting from Seattle, but declined to give her name.

As trolleys full of donors kept driving past, she turned to her daughter-in-law and said, "Those are trolleys full of Republicans. Because usually they never let trolleys in there."

Another man watching the reception unfold marveled at the scene: "Every time I come here I think: There's two people who spend time over there who know the contents of what's in Area 51."

Jeb Bush and Allies Raise More Than $114 Million in 2016 Race // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush's campaign and his allies have raised more than $114 million to back him in the 2016 race, surpassing expectations.

Jeb Bush's campaign and its allied super PAC raised more than $114 million in the first half of the year, surpassing expectations and far outstripping his Democratic and Republican rivals for the White House.

The Republican presidential hopeful's super PAC, called Right to Rise USA, said Thursday that it had received $103 million from more than 9,900 donors—a broad pool of supporters he could tap for yet more money for the super PAC and for donations to his campaign, which are capped at $2,700 per person for the primary. The campaign, meanwhile, took in $11.4 million in the two weeks between its launch and the end of June.

The only candidate positioned to keep up with Mr. Bush's fundraising is the Democratic front-runner, Hillary Clinton, who launched her campaign two months before he did. She has raised $45 million for her campaign and three groups backing her raised about $24 million, for a total of $69 million.

Mr. Bush's campaign fundraising also outpaced many GOP rivals who started raising money earlier in the year.

The rise of the super PACs and their expanding roles in presidential campaigns means any candidate with a wealthy backer, or a collection of them, can spend exponentially more on his or her candidacy and stay in the race longer than in prior presidential contests. There is a cost, though: The candidates can't control their friendly super PACs by directing where they spend their money and what messages they send to try to motivate voters.

Only one-tenth of Mr. Bush's haul went to his Miami-based campaign, with the rest going to the technically independent super PAC, which is based in California and is legally barred from coordinating its activities with his team.

The imbalance exists partly because the super PAC has been raising money since January, while Mr. Bush didn't launch his campaign until mid-June, only two weeks ahead of the second-quarter fundraising deadline. But since the super PAC can raise money without contribution caps, it is expected to continue to overpower the campaign.

In the 2016 presidential race, the balance of cash increasingly favors outside groups over campaigns, a shift political strategists say threatens to reduce the effectiveness of their political operations—or to turn some voters away.

“Candidates are going to have less control over the resources in their campaigns than ever before,” said Tony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College and a campaign-finance expert.

Super PACs first began backing individual candidates in the 2012 election, following a 2010 Supreme Court decision that led to their creation. They are poised to play a much bigger role in the current election cycle.

Mr. Bush’s super PAC smashed all previous fundraising records set by such groups. In the 2012 election, the super PAC backing GOP nominee Mitt Romney raised just $12 million in the first half of 2011, and brought in $153 million over the course of the race. Priorities USA Action, the super PAC backing President Barack Obama, raised less than $80 million for the entire cycle.

As super PACs’ roles grows, campaigns and super PACs supporting the same candidate risk duplicating their activities, particularly voter mobilization and grass roots organizing.

“The question will be whether you will reach the point where voters are tired of having people at their door or picking up the phone,” Mr. Corrado said.

Kevin Madden, a GOP strategist who advised Mr. Romney, said there is a “strong advantage” to keeping field work under the campaign’s supervision.

“I’d want to have as robust a field operation under the auspices of my campaign as possible,” he said. “It’s the difference between losing and winning sometimes.”

Barred from coordinating with campaign leadership, super PACs also risk veering away from the candidate’s central message, even though many—including Mr. Bush’s—are being run by former top aides to the candidates themselves.

Mr. Madden recalls a moment when the Romney campaign was focused on neutralizing former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum while the super PAC was running ads attacking Newt Gingrich. “We were like, ‘What are they doing?’” he said.

In the current election cycle, super PACs have outraised the campaigns of at least three out of the four Republicans who have disclosed their fundraising totals so far. The super PAC backing the fourth, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, hasn’t yet released its fundraising haul.

Four super PACs backing Texas Sen. Ted Cruz have raised nearly $38 million, almost four times as much as the amount raised in the second quarter by his campaign, which launched in March.

Unlike many candidates, Mr. Bush and his supporters haven’t touted grass roots support from small donors.

Mr. Bush’s campaign didn’t provide an average donation size, while his super PAC disclosed that about 95% of its donors had given $25,000 or less. Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, by contrast, stressed that about 90% of its donations were for $100 or less.

As their share of funds grows, super PACs are expanding their roles to include tasks traditionally reserved for a campaign, such as compiling voter data and running field operations.

That marks a contrast from 2012, when super PACs were new to the scene and mostly focused on running advertisements.

The super PAC backing former Hewlett-Packard Co. chief executive Carly Fiorina has taken on some press operations and helped set up candidate events. Her super PAC said this week it raised $3.4 million, more than twice as much as her campaign.

Over the next month, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal is slated to hold at least seven town hall events in Iowa, where he will speak about the “most important issues of the day,” according to the organizers. The events have the trappings of a traditional campaign event, but their host is Mr. Jindal’s super PAC, called Believe Again. Neither the campaign nor the super PAC has yet released fundraising details, but the totals for the super PAC that launched in January are virtually certain to be higher than those of the campaign, which began in late June.

On the Democratic side, super PACs seem to be operating more like they did in the 2012 election. Priorities USA Action, the main super PAC backing Mrs. Clinton, plans to limit its efforts to paid advertising on television and the Internet, according to people close to the group. It won’t do any organizing or field work, they say.

Going where no candidate has gone before, presidential fundraising leader Jeb Bush is naming donor levels after the great NASA space missions of the past.

"The Mission Jeb 2016" levels: Voyager, for donors who raise $250,000; Endeavor for $150,000, and Apollo for $75,000.

Mr. Bush's team announced the categories Friday to the roughly 250 donors gathered for a two-day retreat at Kennebunkport, Maine. Donors are expected to hit up their business associates, friends and family members for maximum contributions of $2,700 to the campaign in order to reach the different levels.

Mr. Bush, a self-proclaimed "space guy" and the former governor of Florida, which hosts the Kennedy Space Center, has said he would increase funding for space exploration if elected president.

The retreat for donors who raised at least $27,000 in the first two weeks of Mr. Bush's campaign amounts to a victory party for a record-setting fundraising team. Mr. Bush's campaign and super PAC announced Friday they had raised more than $114 million since January.

On Friday night, the donors dined on burgers and lobster rolls at Walker's Point, where the Bush family has long vacationed. Former President George H.W. Bush and former First Lady Barbara Bush offered tours of the family compound, where they are building a new home for their son as well as an artist's studio for his brother, former President George W. Bush.

George W. Bush was the candidate who pioneered the system of encouraging donors to bundle campaign contributions. Texans for Public Justice, a non-partisan non-profit, lists 940 people who achieved the status of Ranger (raising at least $200,000) or Pioneer (at least $100,000) in the 2000 and 2004 campaigns.

When Mr. Bush first began raising money earlier this year for his Right to Rise super PAC – which unlike the campaign can collect unlimited donations — he was encouraging donors to write checks or raise as much as $500,000. The campaign is required to disclose the names of its donors and the size of their contributions next week, while the super PAC's disclosure is due at the end of July.

According to donors who attended the dinner Friday, Mr. Bush told them that he planned to outwork all of his rivals.

Jeb to donors: You're not done // Politico // Eli Stokols and Anna Palmer – July 10, 2015

Less than 24 hours after Jeb Bush revealed an unprecedented war chest, he and his top campaign staffers gathered donors at the family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, to let them know that $114 million is not enough.

This weekend's invitation wasn't just a reward for the roughly 200 major donors who helped Bush amass a just-announced record fundraising haul — although, as one attendee said, "there was lots of high-fiving."

It was a reminder that, with the Iowa caucuses still seven months away, this is just the beginning. Bush's operation doesn't plan to sit on its massive cash pile, but to keep adding to it.

According to sources who attended two days of meetings at the Bush family's picturesque seaside compound, the Bush team outlined a number of ambitious new incentives for donors including one called "Eight for Eight," tasking major bundlers with signing up eight new supporters to make a maximum $2,700 contribution by Aug. 8.

Donors learned Friday morning that the Right to Rise leadership PAC, a third fundraising entity,has hauled in $5 million, bringing the total combined war chest of Bush's campaign and supporting super PAC, which both announced their fundraising hauls Thursday, to $119 million.

Even though that's more than twice the total haul of any other presidential candidates (Ted Cruz sits in second place with a combined $51 million), Bush's team reminded donors that there's more work to be done, and laid out a near-term schedule of fundraisers and future meetings.

One highlight: cocktails with Columba. According to a one source, Bush's wife is scheduled to host a cocktail fundraiser in Washington, DC on July 22 with a minimum required contribution of $500.

The next gathering of Bush donors is likely to take place just days before the first GOP primary debate, scheduled for Aug. 6 in Cleveland; and the group is planning another get-together in Miami, where the campaign is headquartered, in the fall.

Even as his campaign is focused on introducing him apart from his presidential father and brother, Jeb Bush's robust fundraising machine is built in large part on the strength of his family's network, which started as his mother's Christmas card list and has been growing for more than 50 years.

While Jeb Bush will continue to assume the posture of a humble, hard-working candidate, careful to avoid giving off even a whiff of entitlement, his campaign's fundraising prowess is a signal of strength to undecided donors that should grease the skids for even more contributions.

Former president George H.W. Bush made a brief appearance Friday night during a welcome reception at Hunter's Point, the home he shares with his wife, Barbara Bush, who greeted donors as they arrived.

Among those attending: Ron Kaufman, Woody Johnson, Brian McCormack, Kimberly Fritts, Reg Brown, Al Cardenas, Jamie Wareham and Dirk Van Dongen.

Presentations from Jeb Bush, finance director Heather Larrison and campaign manager Danny Diaz took place Friday morning. Bush, according to sources, told donors that he is enjoying the campaign and sticking to his plan — and he promised not to squander their overwhelming financial support.

All of them were careful, sources said, not to talk about the Right to Rise super PAC, which Bush spent the first six months of the year raising money for but is now, as an official candidate, prohibited from coordinating or communicating with in any way.
Bush's fundraising numbers aren't just staggering for the amount of money raised but the breadth of his donor list. Nearly 10,000 individuals gave money to his super PAC; of those, 500 gave $25,000 or more. Such a diversified portfolio of donors allows Bush a huge cash advantage and the ability to compete in every state; and it helps establish his independence from any individual billionaire.

"It means he won't have any one person you can characterize as a co-investor," said Charlie Black, a GOP lobbyist who advised George W. Bush and Mitt Romney's presidential campaigns. "I think these others that have big super PAC donors are honest, sincere people, but it's a better perception for Jeb that he doesn't have one big sugar daddy."

Mike Murphy, who is running Bush's media operation through the super PAC, "has told donors a number he wants to hit by end of the year," a source said, without divulging what that number is.

For the last few weeks, even before the fundraising numbers were released Thursday, donors headed to Kennebunkport knew the initial effort had hit the mark, that the two days of meetings would be a chance to celebrate the early success and to lay out a path that will sustain it.

"If they hadn't hit their numbers, they'd have been on everyone's ass for the last several weeks," one donor said. "But that dog didn't bark, so we could all tell they'd gotten what they wanted."

Is Donald Trump Helping the Bush Brand? // Bloomberg // Michael C. Bender – July 10, 2015

While Republican Party mandarins wring their hands over Donald Trump's presidential bid, the celebrity real estate mogul's untethered political approach may actually be buoying Jeb Bush, the target of his most frequent attacks, and making the former Florida governor's moderate approach to immigration more palatable in the process.

That's the case for a least some New Hampshire voters who were impressed by Bush's performance at a town hall meeting this week and offered favorable — and unprompted — comparisons to Trump.

"He seemed to really get into the weeds talking about issues," Dennis Hogan, the Hillsborough County Attorney, said after listening to Bush. "And he says it in a sellable way. Not like Trump, where you're saying something and you're losing as many people as you're gaining. We don't need that in a nominee."

Trump announced his presidential campaign on June 16 by saying the country needs "somebody that can take the brand of the United States and make it great again." But following that speech and a series of interviews, Republican donors and elected leaders have worried about what damage he's doing to the party's brand.

NBC, Univision, Macy's and other companies cut ties with Trump as he defended his comments that many immigrants in the country illegally are rapists. Republican donor John Jordan told the Associated Press on Monday that GOP leaders should take steps to block Trump's access to the first presidential debate next month. Trump told CNN that Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Preibus asked him to "tone it down a little bit."

Much of Trump's invective has been targeted at Bush. Trump briefly posted on his Twitter page, followed by 3.14 million people, another person's comment that Bush "has to like the Mexican Illegals" (sic) because his wife is from Mexico. Trump called Bush's position on education standards "pathetic" and ridiculed the former governor for saying many immigrants illegally cross the border as "an act of love. "I mean what kind of stuff is that?" Trump said on Fox News this week. "It's baby stuff."

The comments have earned him media attention, and now the top spot in the Republican field, according to a new Economist/YouGov poll. The poll showed Trump with support of 15 percent of respondents, 4 percentage points ahead of Bush and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky. A plurality of respondents, 29 percent, said they believed Jeb Bush would ultimately win the party's nomination.

Trump, who lives part-time in Palm Beach, Florida, has a long and complicated history with Bush, whose home is about 90 minutes south in Miami. The two helped raise money in 1990 for a Nicaraguan presidential candidate. Trump gave $50,000 to the Florida Republican Party while Bush was governor as he unsuccessfully pushed for Bush to expand gambling in the state. Trump has called Bush's brother, George W. Bush, "probably the worst president in the history of the United States," and repeatedly says that the "last thing we need is another Bush."

Just a few weeks ago, Bush was chuckling at criticisms from Trump. Now, he's taking it personally. "His views are way out of the mainstream of what Republicans think," Bush told reporters after marching in a pair of Fourth of July parades in New Hampshire.

On immigration, it can be difficult to define the mainstream of the party. Two of the four U.S. senators running for president backed a bipartisan bill that included a path to citizenship for many of the country'a 12 million undocumented immigrants. But House Speaker John Boehner, an Ohio Republican, couldn't get enough support for even a watered-down version in his chamber. "This has become the biggest political football I've seen in my congressional career, this whole issue of illegal immigration and what to do about it," Boehner told reporters on Thursday.

Bush has thrown himself into the immigration issue, and is attempting to persuade his party to take a more moderate position on immigration, arguing that legalizing undocumented workers will boost the economy and help the party.

"I want to win elections," Bush said while answering an immigration question on Wednesday at the New Hampshire town hall meeting. "And to win we better start figuring out ways to message our beliefs in a way that gives people hope that everybody will be included in the progress that comes with this."

Bush added a dose of humor. When one man started his question about border control by saying, "Me gusta Latinos y Mexicanos," Bush laughed. "Maybe you could talk to Donald Trump about that," Bush said. "I don't have his number, but I can find it for you. Give him a call."

Bush, who has led in most recent president polls of New Hampshire, is also figuring out ways to connect with Republican crowds as he pushes a plan legalize undocumented immigrants.

He earned applause from the audience when he said he'd campaign "in Spanish and English," and again for tough talk about the death of Kathryn Steinle, who prosecutors say was killed in San Francisco by a Mexican man who had already been deported five times. "We ought to eliminate sanctuary cities," Bush said. "We shouldn't provide law enforcement monies for cities like San Francisco until they change their policies."

On the border, Bush talked about stationing agents closer to the U.S.-Mexico line, building a "virtual wall," and using drones to patrol the area and "send a signal."

"Donald Trump is colorful, but Bush is trying to think of a solution," Valerie Morelli, a 69-year-old from Amherst said when asked why she was impressed with Bush's performance. "One thing I wish is that he (Bush) would still build a wall, even though he said there's other way to do it."

"I was impressed," said Ed Gorman, a 66-year-old from Londonderry who has concerns about illegal immigration. "He's the first candidate that I've heard actually say that we have a situation with illegal immigrants, that if you're not going to deport them wholesale, you've got to deal with them here. And it sounded like he's going to do that."

Gorman isn't totally sold yet. He brought up Trump's comments on immigration, saying "there's a smidgeon of truth there."

"The best people are not always coming over, but I'm not going to support anything he said," Gorman said of Trump.

Gorman said he was looking forward to seeing other Republican presidential candidates speak in New Hampshire before making his decision, mentioning U.S. Senator Marco Rubio, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker.

"I don't want to see Trump," he offered. "That's a waste of my time."

Bush raises over $100 million to help his campaign // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – July 10, 2015

Jeb Bush and his allied super PAC raised $114 million to support his campaign, a massive fundraising haul made possible in part by rewriting the rules of how presidential campaigns raise money.

Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise USA, said Thursday it collected $103 million since January, money that it must spend independently to back Bush's presidential bid. Together, Bush's super PAC and campaign came close to raising as much money in the first half of 2015 -- a year before a general election -- as American Crossroads, the second biggest super PAC in 2012, did during the entire two-year cycle.

All groups will be required to file detailed reports by the end of the month, but the Bush super PAC raised two and a half times as much as its current closest competitor.

What enabled its size was an innovative strategy that some of Bush's GOP rivals chose to emulate: By not formally running for President, Bush could keep the independent group close by and help it grow into a political and financial juggernaut.

Fundraisers and strategists had questioned aloud whether or not Bush would succeed in raising the $100 million, a benchmark repeatedly swatted away by campaign aides looking to measure expectations. But it was never in doubt that the former Florida governor would lead the pack by a significant margin.

Though campaign-finance reformers scoffed at what they saw as Bush's feigned indecision, he was able to hire staff, travel the country and share strategy with advisers who soon would be off limits. And most critically of all, he was able to headline high-dollar fundraisers for the super PAC for six months, delaying his own campaign launch in order to ask donors for unlimited cash that gives him an unparalleled bank account entering the summer.

Bush eventually formally launched his campaign in mid-June, and the campaign itself said it raised $11.4 million in the 16 days between the launch and the end of the fundraising quarter in June. That haul -- at a clip of $710,000 a day -- is all eligible for spending in the primary, his campaign said.

"Jeb is encouraged and grateful for the tremendous early support and enthusiasm his candidacy has generated since he launched his campaign," New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, national finance chairman of Bush's campaign, said in a statement.

Yet it is the Los Angeles-based super PAC that will likely play the heavy in the Bush political shop. The Right to Rise super PAC made its first independent expenditures on Wednesday to bolster the campaign, releasing an advertisement that compared Bush's record on transparency with Clinton's.

The group, led by longtime Bush senior aide Mike Murphy, had over $98 million cash on hand and raked in contributions from 9,900 donors. Five hundred of those contributors gave in excess of $25,000.

Some campaign reformers reflected on the past six months by charging that Bush had made a mockery of the super PAC system. David Donnelly, the head of the advocacy organization Every Voice, said in a statement "that Bush attended dozens of fundraisers to help raise that cash while claiming he wasn't running for president is the political lie of the year so far."

Super PACs directly linked to candidates are playing a more central part in 2016 than the outside groups ever have before. And Bush's super PAC in particular is reported to be playing an even greater role than is traditionally done by outside groups, taking on more of the day-to-day functions typically run out of a campaign headquarters.

"We are grateful for the overwhelming response from the thousands of donors who have been drawn to Jeb's optimistic message of conservative renewal and reform," said Charlie Spies, the election lawyer who is advising Bush and helped Mitt Romney raise more than $150 million for Romney's super PAC in 2012.

The cash announced by Bush Thursday also does not include any money raised by an allied nonprofit group, Right to Rise Policy Solutions. That group won't be required to disclose its contributors.

Drawing on his family's vast network of experienced bundlers and deep-pocketed donors, the Bush fundraising operation is likely to well outperform its nearest competitors. But despite the campaign's opening attempt to convince rival Republicans to pass on the race by exclusively securing major donors -- a "shock and awe" salvo, as some allies described it -- Bush will be joined by 16 other Republicans in the race for the White House.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz posted a greater second-quarter fundraising total than Bush's campaign did, collecting $14.2 million, though he had much more time to raise the cash and that sum includes a small amount of money earmarked for the general election. His four linked super PACs claim together claim to have raised just under $38 million, putting Cruz likely in second place in the fundraising competition.

And on the Democratic side, a set of groups backing Hillary Clinton say they have raised $24 million and her campaign has raised $45 million.

Other top raisers include Florida senator Marco Rubio, who has a nonprofit group and a super PAC that raised $16 million each. His official campaign has not yet said how much it raised in the second quarter.

Bush is currently in Kennebunkport, Maine, huddling with these top donors and bundlers.

Bush rips Obama over OPM hack, but had data issues of own in Florida // CNN // Chris Frates – July 9, 2015

After news broke last month that suspected Chinese hackers stole the sensitive personal data of millions of Americans from the federal government's human resources department, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush called for the agency's director to be fired.

But when a human resources company Florida hired compromised the personal information of an estimated 100,000 state employees, then-Gov. Bush didn't fire the contractor.

In fact, the state official who managed the contract, Bill Simon, is now helping Bush build his presidential campaign's policy team.

In 2006, the Florida Department of Management Services estimated that 108,000 then-current and former state employees may have been affected when their personal data, managed by Convergys Corporation, was improperly sent to India by a subcontractor, Computerworld reported at the time.

Bush spokeswoman Kristy Campbell said Thursday night that Bush's administration acted quickly to address the issue, including strengthening security measures, providing protection for potentially affected employees and tightening oversight of the program.

But Bush didn't cancel the company's $350 million contract.

Campbell argued that the recent Office of Personnel Management case and the Florida incident are not comparable.

"This was not a national security breach or threat," she said. "The OPM breach was just another example of President Obama's failed and flawed leadership."

When it comes to the federal government's data breach, the Republican presidential contender has had tough words for OPM Director Katherine Archuleta. On Thursday, the agency announced the breach compromised the data of 21.5 million Americans, about five times more people than originally estimated.

"The Office of Personnel Management head, a woman who was the political director of the Obama re-election campaign, a political hack, in charge of something of that responsibility, said 'No one was responsible at OPM for this. The Chinese government was responsible,'" Bush told a crowded VFW hall in New Hampshire Wednesday night. "No ma'am, you're responsible for it, and you ought to be fired for incompetence."

Asked by reporters Wednesday if it was appropriate to compare the OPM breach to the data compromise that occurred during Bush's governorship, he strongly pushed back.

"I'd say its a slight difference when you have up to 18 million records that are stolen by a foreign government where security clearances are jeopardized, where people are filling out 100-page forms sharing their whole life history to find out if they are qualified for a security clearance controlled by a foreign government," Bush said.

Jeb Bush's $114 million haul: By the numbers // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin – July 10, 2015

When it comes to fundraising, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush has blown his GOP and Democratic competition out of the water. His campaign and its allied super political action committee announced on Thursday that they had, combined, brought in $114 million in the first half of the year.

Sure, the former Florida governor had a network of donors (via his brother and father, both former presidents) to tap into – and he essentially exploited a campaign finance loophole to raise such massive funds. Nonetheless, the haul is impressive.

To put into perspective just how big that sum is, let's take a look at what else the man who wants to be America's third President Bush could buy with that $114 million.

Jeb Bush 'did it on his own'? // MSNBC // Steve Benen – July 10, 2015

Jeb Bush's presidential campaign operation has a variety of key goals, but as the cycle gets underway in earnest, the Florida Republican's first priority was simple: raise a ridiculous amount of money.
As of yesterday, it's mission accomplished. MSNBC's Aliyah Frumin reported that the former governor's super PAC has raised a staggering $114.4 million, on top of the $11.4 million Bush's campaign itself raised in the 16 days following his formal launch.
To put this in perspective, Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, raised $45 million in the second quarter, on top of the $15.6 million haul for the pro-Clinton super PAC. Those totals were widely seen as pretty impressive – initially the best of any candidate in either party – though they pale in comparison to the Bush fundraising juggernaut.
The former governor's fundraising prowess is all the more impressive in light of the enormous field of Republican candidates – with 17 candidates vying for contributions from GOP donors, it's that much more difficult for one contender to dominate. Bush nevertheless has more than doubled the money raised by his next closest Republican rival.
But what struck me as funny about all of this was a quote in the Associated Press report about Bush's fundraising success.

…Bill Kunkler, a Chicago private equity executive and Bush donor, said that while the Bush name may have opened some doors, it's Jeb Bush who closed the deal.
"People have been willing to take a look, and he's overcome the people who have said, 'Not another Bush,'" Kunkler said Thursday. "People are looking at him as a guy who did it on his own, and who stands on his own."
What's amusing about this is how wrong it is.
I'm not trying to take away anything from Bush's fundraising totals – they're genuinely impressive – but by no fair measure is he someone who succeeded and stands "on his own."
As regular readers may recall, the New York Times reported earlier in the year that Jeb Bush spent much of his adult life taking advantage of his family connections to advance his interests and ambitions. In Florida, people went out of their way to get close to Bush in the hopes that he'd relay messages and suggestions to his powerful relatives – which he routinely did.
When Bush decided to run for president, he quickly exploited a "wide network of donors who supported his father and brother." Indeed, when fundraising appeals started reaching GOP donors, they were sent directly from his father, mother, brother, and even his son (an elected official in Texas). It's consistent with a life filled with unique opportunities made available to Jeb because of his powerful last name and political legacy.
Maybe the voting public will care about this, maybe not. But either way, if "people are looking at him as a guy who did it on his own, and who stands on his own," those people are mistaken.

Paul Ryan Explains What Jeb Bush meant When He Said Americans Should Work Longer Hours // HuffPo // Michael McAuliff – July 10, 2015

Rep. Paul Ryan, who was Mitt Romney's vice presidential nominee in 2012, declined Friday to say whether 2016 contender Jeb Bush's recent declaration that "Americans need to work longer hours" was as damaging as Romney's infamous "47 percent" remarks.

"You're Huffington Post aren't you? What the hell?" the Wisconsin Republican joked at first.

But Ryan, a notorious data geek, did offer his interpretation of what Bush meant to say.

"I think what he's talking about is the fact that there are too many people in America who have part-time jobs who want full-time jobs. That's a problem; that's what he's talking about," Ryan said. "If you get into the labor force participation rates, inside of that, there's a lot of part-time workers who don't want to be part-time workers, who want to be full-time workers."

Bush was hammered over the remark by commentators and the campaign of Hillary Clinton, which noted that Americans are the most productive workers in the world, and that while productivity has kept on rising, it is pay that has lagged. On top of that, Gallup reports that American workers already average nearly 47 hours per week.

Still, part-time workers' share of the workforce has been slowly falling since it peaked at 20 percent after the recession. It still stands at 18.6 percent, a couple of points higher than before the recession.

Asked how many times Bush would now have to say it Ryan's way, Ryan said, "Welcome to politics."

Does Jeb Bush Understand Economics? // Newsweek // Kurt Eichenwald – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush set off a firestorm this week by appearing to say in a newspaper interview that Americans should work longer hours. Democrats pounced, even as the Bush campaign said his comments were taken out of context.

But everyone is missing the real story. Whether Bush's comment was a criticism of American workers or a lament about a weakened job market, his words demonstrated such a lack of knowledge of economics that it's virtually impossible to understand what was the context of his words.

Bush's full statement was: "My aspiration for the country and I believe we can achieve it, is 4% growth as far as the eye can see. Which means we have to be a lot more productive, workforce participation has to rise from its all-time modern lows. It means that people need to work longer hours and, through their productivity, gain more income for their families."

This word salad mixes together different economic terms as if they mean the same thing and reaches for statistics that are, quite simply, ridiculous. Perhaps Bush was just sloppy in his language, but whatever aide is prepping him on economics needs to do a better job–maybe by working longer hours.

The key terms in his statement are growth, workforce participation, productivity and income. His campaign insisted that when he said "people need to work longer hours," he was referring to them being able to obtain jobs that are full-time or offer close to full-time hours. Bush speaks of these economic concepts as if they are all interlinked; some are, some aren't.

Start with 4% growth "as far as the eye can see." Lots of problems there. Constant growth at that rate has never been achieved in the history of the United States. In fact, the average from the boom of 1947 to this year is 3.26%. Even the Republican saint, Ronald Reagan, only achieved an average of 3.5%. The longest period during which the United States achieved 4% or greater growth was four years, under President Bill Clinton. So essentially, Bush has as his aspiration something that has no precedent in history.

But this part of Bush's comment has both a logical flaw and a sign he hasn't been paying much attention to political language over the years. As should be obvious, no one can see growth rates into the future, so the idea of growth "as far as the eye can see" is the kind of clumsy infelicity that should raise an eyebrow. "As far as the eye can see," though, is a common term used by politicians in reference to one element of economics: deficits.

The phrase was first popularized during the Reagan administration by David Stockman, then the director of the Office of Management and Budget. In a 1981 interview with the journalist William Grieder, Stockman let slip the dirty secret of the Reagan budgets: that there would be $200 billion deficits "as far as the eye can see." (Just $200 billion? Ah, those were the days.) Since then, politicians on both sides have used the term endlessly to refer to deficits. (John Boehner, the speaker of the House, said it just a few months ago.) Given that rapid deficit growth started under Reagan, reversed under Clinton and then exploded to astronomical heights under Bush's brother, using phrases that make no logical sense and are connected to huge economic blunders isn't smart.

Just as with the growth rates, Bush's original–and revised–statements about employees working more hours is statistical hooey. The average annual hours per worker has essentially been unchanged for many, many years. Let's take the best full economic year during the George W. Bush presidency–2005–and compare it to the worst under President Barack Obama–2011. Under Bush, American workers put in an average of 34.6 hours of work a week. Under Obama, they worked an average of 34.3 hours a week. That's a difference of 3 minutes and 36 seconds a day, which translates for the median worker salary to $1.62 (for minimum wage workers, it's 39 cents). The problem is that American business believes–unwisely–that using contractors and part-timers boosts profits. How does Bush plan to make economic growth rates translate into longer hours when that hasn't happened in the past 15 years? He doesn't–he's just saying things.

Bush's statement about workforce participation is correct–sort of. No doubt the low workforce participation rate signals a weak recovery. But unlike the unemployment rate, the participation rate is a complex amalgam of issues. According to a just-released report by the American Enterprise Institute–a respected center-right think tank in Washington–the meaning behind the statistics is much more complex than Bush implies. AEI says workforce participation has shrunk 3% since the Great Recession, but it cites a report from Barclay's attributing two points of that drop to the aging population. The report also notes that women have been dropping out of the workforce in a constant pattern since the mid-1990s. Still, there is no doubt that there are plenty of chronically unemployed people who have dropped out of the job market, so Bush gets a point.

But the rest of his comment makes him a loser in this game.

He says, "We have to be a lot more productive," and then later refers to productivity. This clearly demonstrates he has no idea what has been going on in the economy. Productivity means something in economics. As a comparison, it would be like saying the word "inflation" in an economic statement but then arguing you were referring to the expanding American waistline.

When it comes to productivity, American workers have been doing a great job. Productivity, which is the economic output per worker, has grown relentlessly since 1947 in almost a straight upward line. Implying that Americans aren't being productive enough is about the same as saying McDonald's doesn't sell enough hamburgers. How much is enough to Bush? If record productivity–with a cumulative growth of almost 300% since 1947–doesn't cut it, what does?

There is no context where "we have to be more productive" means anything other than "push yourselves past record levels, workers!" That is, unless Bush doesn't know what the word means.

But with this full statement, he has also demonstrated that he has no idea of the real problem facing American workers. No doubt, he is blaming them for their stagnant wages–all that's needed is more hours of work, and wages will improve significantly.

As history proves, that's hokum. America went through nearly a century where the profits generated by growth in worker productivity was shared–the more they produced, the more money everyone made. What Bush and far too many Republicans refuse to acknowledge is that wages and productivity became uncoupled around 1973: Productivity goes up, corporate profits go up, the rich get wealthier, but the financial benefits don't trickle down to workers. Since the great uncoupling, the only times there was significant percentage wage growth that even vaguely mimicked productivity growth were in the Carter and Clinton administrations. (Both George W. Bush and Obama had short periods of wage growth, but nothing to brag about.)

American history's most productive workers are not responsible for the fact that they aren't paid enough. Do Bush and his GOP cohorts really believe that the wealthy are sitting in their offices, twiddling their thumbs, waiting for workers to demand more money that will then be handed over gladly? Wages are growing at their lowest level since World War II. In fact, income inequality is worse today than it was in 1774, even when slavery is included in the numbers, according to a study by the National Bureau of Economic Research.

The bottom line: Folks are missing the real news in Bush's jumble of economic words. He doesn't know what is happening in the economy, he doesn't know what economic terms mean and he is willing to blame workers for their own stagnant wages by proclaiming all that is needed is for them to get more hours a week at the job. And what he leaves off the table? That the problem is his friends in corporate America, whose wages keep skyrocketing because of growing productivity per worker, which allows the companies to shed workers, creating a larger pool of labor going after a shrinking number of jobs, putting more downward pressure on wages–an unbreakable cycle that will continue as far as the eye can see. Add to that corporate outsourcing of jobs overseas, and Bush's simplistic "work more hours" blather–regardless of whether he meant what the Democrats says or his campaign says–is shown up for the nonsense it is.

Bush needs to–but certainly won't–take a new approach. Rather than telling employees that record workforce productivity needs to be even higher, he needs to let his wealthy friends know that record-high income is enough. Already, several of the super-rich have warned their compatriots that the type of massive economic inequality being experienced in the United States has never ended well throughout global history, and that policy changes are needed before mobs start slamming heads on pikes. Unfortunately, with his recent comment proving his feeble understanding of economics and his willingness to attribute low wages to largely irrelevant issues, Jeb Bush has proved he does not have the courage or the knowledge to lead that policy transformation.

Marco Rubio Calls Abortion Rights 'Indefensible' – and Knocks Down 'Pro-Abortion' Straw Man // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 10, 2015

At the National Right to Life Convention on Friday, Florida Senator Marco Rubio touted his opposition to abortion rights, long a prerequisite for being a viable Republican presidential candidate.

Speaking to the crowd in New Orleans, he hit all the necessary notes — legal abortion is "the taking of innocent life on a massive scale"; Roe v. Wade was an "egregiously flawed Supreme Court decision"; the case for abortion rights is "indefensible."

If an embryo is "not a person, what is it? Because if you left it alone, that's the only thing it can become," he said. "It can't develop into a pony!" Though he didn't mention it in his speech, Rubio has supported three exceptions to making abortion illegal—in cases of rape, incest and if the mother's life is at stake.

Also notable was his message of respect for proponents of legal abortion, uncommon for a cause that has sparked ugly clashes and divisive rhetoric between the opposing sides for generations. He knocked down a straw man by some of the more aggressive opponents of the cause, namely the notion that its supporters want more abortions.

"You can judge a cause by the arguments made on both sides. For example, I rarely meet anyone who's willing to say they're pro-abortion," Rubio said. "They'll say they're pro-choice, but almost everyone I've met says that they personally disagree with abortion. That alone tells us a little about the basic common sense the issue is built on."

Rubio's appearance at the National Right to Life Convention came fresh off a three-day swing in Iowa packed with speeches, during which he didn't mention abortion. On Friday, he connected his abortion message to his overall pitch for the presidency—about reviving a disappearing American Dream. "And it is fundamentally impossible," he said, "for America to reach her destiny as a nation founded on the equal rights of all if our government believes an entire segment of the human population doesn't have a right to exist."

Marco Rubio: Roe v. Wade Was 'Egregiously Flawed Decision' // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – July 10, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) laid out his strong anti-abortion views in a speech on Friday, calling the Supreme Court's landmark abortion rights decision in Roe v. Wade a "historically, egregiously flawed decision" that "has condoned the taking of innocent life on a massive scale."

"It is fundamentally impossible for America to reach her destiny as a nation founded on the equal rights of all if our government believes an entire segment of the human population doesn't have a right to exist," the 2016 presidential candidate said at the National Right to Life Convention in New Orleans.

The Supreme Court legalized abortion in the 1973 decision, ruling that states cannot prevent women from obtaining the procedure up until the fetus would be viable outside the womb, around 22 to 24 weeks of pregnancy. In the years before abortion was legal, it was common for women to land in the hospital after seeking illegal, "back-alley" abortions or attempting to self-induce. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates that in 1972, the year before Roe v. Wade, 130,000 women obtained illegal or self-induced procedures, and 39 of them died.

Republicans in Congress are currently trying to chip away at Roe v. Wade by banning abortion at 20 weeks of pregnancy. Rubio and nearly every other Republican presidential candidate has endorsed the legislation. Ten states have enacted similar abortion limits, and anti-abortion advocates hope one of the laws eventually makes its way to the Supreme Court and overturns Roe.

Rubio said Friday that the issue of abortion is "more than political or policy-related. It is a definitional issue about the kind of country we want to be."

According to a recent Gallup poll, half of Americans consider themselves "pro-choice," while 44 percent identify as "pro-life." But Rubio said he believes that nearly every American is personally opposed to the procedure, regardless of whether they think it should be legal.

“You can judge a cause by the arguments made on both sides. For example, I rarely meet anyone who’s willing to say they’re pro-abortion,” he said. “They’ll say they’re pro-choice, but almost everyone I’ve met says that they personally disagree with abortion. That alone tells us a little about the basic common sense the issue is built on.”

Rubio: Confederate Flag A “Deeply Painful Symbol” For Millions, Shouldn’t Be On Government Buildings // BuzzFeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Marco Rubio on the Michael Medved Show Thursday said that although for some the Confederate Flag is a symbol of heritage, “we have to recognize that for millions of Americans, it is a deeply painful symbol and that’s why it shouldn’t be over government buildings, as it is not in Florida and it will now not be over in South Carolina.”

Here’s the full quote:

It was the right decision for South Carolina to make. I knew they would make the decision that was best for them. I had trust and faith in their process and in their leadership. And I felt strongly that outsiders should not be coming in and telling them what to do. That they knew what to do and they would do it. And I thought it would be counterproductive. Look, I know people who see the confederate flag as a symbol of their heritage, not as a symbol of racism. But I also know people, many people, who see it as a symbol of pain. For them, it’s a reminder of an era in which in this country human beings were enslaved. And so, that’s why in Florida and in many parts of the country, people have decided that the time has come for that flag not to be displayed in government buildings. And I think it’s, it’s, you’re — it is possible to say you agree with that decision, as I do, and also say that we recognize, that, for many people, the flag — the reason that they’re tied to it is not because of racism. They’re not racist, it’s a cultural attachment. But we have to recognize that for millions of Americans, it is a deeply painful symbol and that’s why it shouldn’t be over government buildings, as it is not in Florida and it will now not be over in South Carolina.

As Donald Trump Riles GOP Race, Marco Rubio Begins to Connect With Voters In Spanish // ABC // Ines de la Cuetara – July 10, 2015

On the campaign trail this week, Marco Rubio chatted with a woman from San Salvador. Claudia Steele, who is now an American citizen and a voter, eagerly told him she would do everything she could to support his presidential bid. Rubio thanked her, and the two discussed politics and family — all in Spanish.

When Steele told Rubio she was the only Latina member of her local Republican organization, Rubio answered, smiling, "Hay que cambiar eso.” (Translation: “We need to change that.”)

But this wasn’t downtown Miami. It was a western suburb of Des Moines, Iowa.

While Republicans worry recent comments by Donald Trump comparing illegal immigrants to rapists and drug dealers may harm the party’s chances with Hispanic voters during the 2016 election cycle, the 44 year-old Senator from Florida was welcomed with open arms — quite literally — by the Spanish speakers who came to meet him over the course of his three-day swing in Iowa. According to 2003 U.S. Census bureau, just 5.5 percent of the population of the Hawkeye State identifies as Hispanic or Latino, but more than a few found Rubio this week.

Steele said she thinks it’s important Rubio speaks Spanish. "It helps him communicate and connect with the community," she said in an interview with ABC News. (Fellow GOP candidate Jeb Bush is also a fluent Spanish speaker).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the same event Steele attended, held by the Westside Conservative Club in Urbandale, a waitress originally from Barcelona happily conversed with Rubio in Spanish, and later hugged him goodbye.

In Cedar Rapids, Sydney Speltz, whose mother is a Colombian immigrant, said she would definitely be voting for Rubio.

"It's just really inspiring to see a fellow Hispanic be so successful," said Speltz, who works at the Cedar Rapids Country Club, where Rubio hosted the Linn Eagles Lunch.

In Davenport, Morena Gonzales-Castro Hausuer, originally from El Salvador, showed up to hear the Florida senator and son of Cuban immigrants.

"I do believe that he is the one who has the right ideas, the right points about what is going to happen to our youth if we don't change our policies," she said.

This week — like many of his fellow candidates — Rubio was asked to address whether Trump's recent comments were hurting the Republican Party. He said he thinks voters are "capable of distinguishing between Donald Trump and the Republican Party."

"I obviously strongly disagree with him," Rubio told reporters at a campaign stop, reiterating that Trump's comments were "inaccurate, they're offensive, and they're divisive."

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, on the other hand, argued that all of the GOP candidates are "in the same general area on immigration." (Rubio dismissed Clinton's comments as "silly talk").

"We have a right to enforce our immigration laws," Rubio told reporters. "That's not hostility, that's sovereignty."

Gonzalez-Castro Hausuer agreed.

"I believe if someone wants to be in this country, they can come to this country, but they have to do it legally," she said, detailing the lengthy and costly immigration process she had to navigate in order to move to Iowa with her U.S.-born husband.

"But that is the way it should be," she added.

Steele, Gonzalez-Castro Hausuer, and Speltz all said what they liked most about Rubio were his ideas for higher education reform. Neither cited immigration as a top priority, but Speltz acknowledged she saw it as a kind of litmus test for candidates' general opinion of Hispanics.

"I feel that some Republicans are too tough on immigration, and don't show a lot of respect for people from Mexico and South America," she said, referring to Trump. "But I definitely don't think Republicans as a whole are anti-Hispanic."

Marco Rubio: I will absolutely roll back Obama Cuba policy // Guardian // Sabrina Siddiqui – July 10, 2015

Barack Obama's historic policy shift toward Cuba would be short-lived under a Marco Rubio presidency, the Florida senator has told the Guardian, one week after the White House made the final major step in renewing diplomatic ties with the Castro regime.

Rubio, a top contender for the Republican nomination for president, said he would "absolutely" reverse the unilateral steps Obama has taken thus far to normalize relations between the two countries – including closing down the embassies that are slated to open on 20 July – if he is elected to the White House in 2016.

"In fact, I think they're in violation of the law," Rubio said during an interview at the tail end of a three-day campaign swing through Iowa. "The statute passed by Congress specifically prohibits many of the things he [Obama]'s now undertaking. It says those things can only happen after certain conditions have been met, none of which have been met. As president, I will follow the law."

Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants, has been the leading opponent in the US Congress of Obama's overtures to the island nation.

Ever since the president announced in December that the US would end a half-century diplomatic freeze with Cuba, Rubio has publicly castigated the administration at every turn – be it the lifting of certain commercial and travel sanctions, the removal of Cuba from a list of state sponsors of terrorism, and Obama's announcement last week on the reopening of embassies between Washington and Havana.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In addition to saying he would reverse those steps, Rubio also defended his steadfast opposition to lifting the 50-year-old US trade embargo on Cuba – which critics argue has taken a significant humanitarian toll on the Cuban people while doing little to deter the grip on power of the Castro brothers.

Opponents of the embargo, Rubio said, "fundamentally misunderstand" its purpose.

"The purpose of the embargo was not to overthrow Fidel Castro – that's what the Bay of Pigs was about, that's what Operation Mongoose was about, but not the embargo," Rubio said, referring to the failed missions under President John F Kennedy in the early 1960s to help the Cuban people overthrow the communist regime.

The intent of the sanctions, Rubio argued, was to protect the property of Americans and other private owners and prevent stolen goods from being trafficked into the United States as well as to serve as leverage against the Castros.

"We could have used, and can use, economic sanctions through the embargo as a leverage to gain democratic concessions and openings for the Cuban people in exchange for alleviating some of these conditions, especially the diplomatic recognition and the removal of Cuba from the state sponsor of terrorism list," Rubio said. "The Cubans have basically achieved all of those concessions and in return have done nothing to change … The only thing that will change is the amount of money the regime will have access to."

Jeb Bush, regarded as one of Rubio's main rivals in a crowded pathway to the Republican nomination for president, has similarly opposed the Obama administration's Cuba policy but offered a less definitive response when asked if he would allow a US embassy in Havana to remain open.

"Probably not," Bush, a former governor of Florida, told the editorial board of the New Hampshire Union Leader newspaper this week. "I haven't given thought about undoing a work in progress."

Rubio has pledged to oppose whoever Obama nominates as ambassador to Cuba – a post that must be confirmed by the US Senate, where he sits on the influential foreign relations committee. Republican lawmakers in Washington have also refused to take up Obama's request to lift the trade embargo, which requires an act of Congress.

Rubio's unwavering position on US policy toward Cuba is a point of contrast in a presidential campaign built on the notion that he is a next-generation leader with fresh ideas to usher in what he has dubbed "a new American century".

In seven stops this week through different parts of the early battleground state of Iowa, the earliest-voting state in the primaries, the 44-year-old senator sought to convince voters that he is the candidate of the future while declaring that "yesterday is over" – an implicit dig both a Bush and at Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton.

But those in favor of rapprochement in US-Cuba relations see the 50-year policy upheld until Obama's reversal late last year as decidedly antiquated, and at odds with recent decades of bipartisan support for liberalizing international trade with the express purpose of expanding political and economic opportunity around the world.

Rubio himself referred to two such examples – China and Vietnam – in a Wednesday op-ed in the New York Times, but to make a counterpoint: that despite the opening up of economic pathways, both China and Vietnam remain notorious violators of basic human rights.

Asked if he believed the US should then no longer engage in trade with China or Vietnam, Rubio conceded there was a "geopolitical reality" that set the two apart from Cuba – especially with respect to China.

"It's the second largest economy in the world, it has nuclear weapons, it's the second largest military or the third largest on the planet," he said. "There's a reality there that doesn't exist with Cuba that we have to address. It just is what it is – we have to balance geopolitical reality."

Rubio added that concessions to China had nonetheless forced the US to go silent on human rights abuses there, and his broader point was that China, Vietnam and Burma disproved the argument that economic engagement will pave the way for a political transformation.

"It is proof that economic engagement alone does not lead a reluctant tyranny to open up democratically," Rubio said, before identifying the biggest difference, in his view, in the analogy. "China's half a world away, Vietnam is half a world away – Cuba is 90 miles from our shores. It is not in the national security interest of the United States to have a communist, anti-American tyranny 90 miles from our shores."

He said prerequisites necessary for him to consider engagement with Cuba would be free and fair elections, independence of the media, the right to organize political parties, freedom of assembly, and the release of political prisoners.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio further referenced reports of a crackdown last weekend in which nearly a hundred peaceful activists were detained by Cuban authorities, and prominent activist Antonio G Rodiles was beaten, to underscore his point that engagement at this juncture was futile.

The reports of the arrests were confirmed by the State Department earlier this week. A spokesman expressed concern, but argued that such behavior further reinforced "the need to move forward" with restoring diplomatic relations.

Obama acknowledged in his own remarks last week that "very serious differences" will continue between the two countries on freedom of speech and assembly, and access to information, while proposing engagement as the means through which change can occur.

"Nobody expects Cuba to be transformed overnight," Obama said in his speech on the reopening of embassies. "But I believe that American engagement through our embassy, our businesses and most of all through our people, is our best way to advance our interests and support for democracy and human rights."

Although the president did not mention Rubio by name, he criticized Republicans who have rejected his approach. Obama cited public opinion in both the US and Cuba showing a majority support for re-establishing ties, and urged Republicans to "listen to the Cuban people, the American people".

Asked for his response to polling putting the public at odds with his view – which includes a majority of Americans, as well as Cuban Americans, and residents of Cuba – Rubio was unfazed.

"I don't ever believe a president should conduct foreign policy on the basis of polls," he said. "A president's supposed to lead. A president's supposed to do what's right for the country even if it isn't popular, particularly when it comes to national security issues. A president needs to view things with a 20-, a 10- and a 5-year outlook, not what's immediately gratifying. One of the biggest failures of this administration is that it's tried to use foreign policy for domestic political considerations."

Rubio added that the opinion of Americans would shift if they were more informed on the implications of opening up ties with Cuba, which he said would be an "economic opening to the Cuban regime [that] controls the entire economy".

Although Rubio did not raise in detail his stance on Cuba while courting several packed rooms across Iowa this week, he drew heavily on his personal story, as he has since declaring his candidacy for the White House. He recounted how his parents left Cuba in the 1956 in search of a better future.

Their realization of the American Dream – Rubio's father worked as a bartender and his mother a maid – is what set the United States apart from the place his parents once called home he said.

The senator launched his presidential campaign in April from the Freedom Tower in Miami, Florida, which served for more than a decade starting in the early 1960s as the first stop for Cuban exiles seeking asylum in the United States.

Cuban Americans living in Florida who are registered Republicans continue to overwhelmingly oppose Obama's new Cuba policy.

"That combination has been steadfastly anti-Castro and pro-embargo," said Dr. Gregory Weeks, an expert on Latin America who heads the political science department at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte. "This is how Cuban-American Republicans have been for many, many years and something that is very only slowly changing. That's how [Rubio has] developed politically. He also sees that as part of a package that includes relations with Iran, Russia and dealing with Isis, indicative of what he believes is a broader weakness of Obama's foreign policy."

But unravelling the steps the administration has already taken would be politically risky, according to Richard Feinberg, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and an architect of the first Summit of the Americas.

"Latin America as a whole would be outraged. It would be incredibly costly for Rubio's US policies throughout the region," Feinberg said. "Two years from now it's going to be difficult for any Republican to completely reverse the initiative of this administration."

Marco Rubio: The American Dream Is Really A Universal Dream? // Breitbart // Michelle Moons – July 10, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL) addressed Freedom Fest attendees Friday night with a message centered around the idea of the American Dream, the story of his parents' immigration, and his own success.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio is one of two presidential candidates reaching out to a mix of about 2,000 conservative and libertarian-leaning conference goers. The other attendee is the new Republican frontrunner, real estate mogul Donald Trump.

Rubio recalled the story of his hard-working Cuban parents who immigrated to the United States in 1956. His father worked as a bartender, his mother mainly as a maid. He made it a point that he lived in Las Vegas for six years as a kid. The story, which he has told during many a speech, contrasts his father's work at the back of a room to propel Rubio's later ascension to a podium at the front of the room.

"We call it the American dream, but it really is a universal dream," Rubio declared. "People all over the world have this dream, they've had it for millennia, the desire not just to be better off and to earn a better life, but to leave their kids better off than themselves. Why they call it the American dream is because so many millions of people have been able to achieve it here and not enough places. That's the real American Dream.

"Here's the spiritual principal. Every human being, not every human being born in North America, every human being is born with certain rights, life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

"The road to the American Dream has gotten narrower" because of two things, Rubio said. He listed the globalization of the economy and advances in technology as those two obstacles.

"We now compete with people half way around the world for the best ideas, the best talent, the best innovations, the best jobs, the best companies."

It's the relaxing of protections for American workers that has been criticized, as American workers have been replaced by foreign H1B visa workers in instances such as the Disney layoffs. Rubio has come under continual criticism for lax stances on immigration, including his role in the "Gang of 8" immigration reform bill.

He went on to note that today, even bartender and maid positions require more advanced training and technology in the 21st century.

He seemed to pick up Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX)96%'s "cartel" terminology, calling the traditional higher education system an "existing and stagnant cartel." Cruz has been emphasizing the idea of the "Washington Cartel" in his speeches and new book.

Rubio touched on a complicated, burdensome tax system and regulatory system.

He closed with "I have a debt to America I will never repay," and that the journey from the back of the room to the front of the room was the American Dream. "Whether we remain a special country or not will be determined by whether that journey is still possible for the people trying to make that journey now."

PAUL

Rand Paul's Fake Flat Tax // NYT // Editorial Board – July 10, 2015

Every four years, Republican candidates for the White House denounce the federal tax system — often advocating replacing it with a supposedly more equitable single tax rate — and this year is no exception. Senator Rand Paul has already come up with a flat-tax reform plan, and it shows clearly, once again, that this is a fundamentally flawed idea.

Mr. Paul has pledged to "blow up the tax code" by replacing all federal taxes with a flat 14.5 percent tax on personal and corporate income — except, that is, when his plan exempts income from taxation altogether by retaining popular write-offs. Mr. Paul proposes to continue deductions for mortgage interest and charitable donations, which would gut the supposed simplicity of a flat tax.

The Paul plan, like the flat-tax plans from previous campaigns, would fail to raise enough revenue to finance a modern government. Estimates by the conservative Tax Foundation found that it would reduce revenue to the Treasury by $1 trillion to $3 trillion over a decade. Citizens for Tax Justice, a more liberal advocacy group, estimates a 10-year loss of $15 trillion. Arguments about the proper role of government aside, a population and an economy that are growing in size and complexity cannot thrive with a shrinking government.

The Paul plan also fails the basic test of progressivity. It promises a big tax cut for everyone, but analyses show it would be a big tax cut for high earners and businesses and basically a wash for everyone else. And that's being generous. If Mr. Paul were to cut federal spending to offset the plan's revenue loss, as he has promised to do, middle-class and lower-income Americans would be much worse off, because programs that benefit them would have to be reduced or ended. Contenders for the chopping block would include Social Security, health care, education and environmental protection.

Mr. Paul might be on to something if he were willing to acknowledge that his flat tax is essentially a value-added tax similar to those used in all market-oriented democracies except the United States. (With both a flat tax and a VAT, businesses deduct nonlabor expenses from gross receipts and pay taxes on the difference — the value added.)

Mr. Paul doesn't call his flat tax a VAT because anti-tax conservatives are opposed to VATs. So he has taken a baffling approach that would be prone to evasion. But a carefully conceived VAT could be exactly what the United States needs. Experience and research show that it can raise substantial revenue, is relatively easy to administer and is minimally harmful to economic growth. In fact, the reason it is loathed by anti-tax conservatives is that their real agenda is to hobble government.

The problem with a VAT is that it falls more heavily on lower-income taxpayers, who spend all of or most of their earnings, than on higher-income people, who can afford to save some or most of what they make. To offset that disadvantage, a VAT must be part of a progressive fiscal system that includes a graduated income tax; adequate spending on Social Security, Medicare and other government insurance programs; and ample government investment in education, roads, scientific research and other public goods and services.

Mr. Paul's plan heads the wrong way on all those fronts, providing less progressivity and more cuts to spending and investment. It is bad policy, and it does nothing to foster a meaningful debate about the economy or taxes.

Rand Paul's presidential campaign raises $7 million // WaPo // Katie Zezima – July 10, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul's presidential campaign has raised $7 million since its launch in April.

The overwhelming majority of Paul's contributions came through small-dollar donations. Eighty-five percent of Paul's haul came from contributions of $50 or less, and 96 percent from people who gave $100 or less. Paul's fundraising totals were first reported by Breitbart.com and confirmed by his presidential campaign.

More than 108,205 people gave to Paul's campaign, with the average donation coming in at $65. Super PACs supporting Paul have not released their fundraising totals. The money was raised through the presidential campaign and a joint fundraising committee where a portion of the money goes toward Paul's presidential campaign.

Paul, who has positioned himself as a grass-roots fundraiser, lags in the Republican money race. Jeb Bush's campaign raised $11.4 million; his allied super PAC raised more than $103 million between January and June. Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential campaign raised $14.2 million since Cruz announced in March; combined with his super PAC total, Cruz has raised more than $51 million.

Paul's campaign has raised, on average, $83,333.33 a day, putting him behind the campaigns of Ben Carson and ahead of Carly Fiorina. Bush's campaign has raised an average of $760,000 a day.

Paul's campaign attempted to capitalize monetarily on a nearly 11-hour speech he gave about surveillance on the Senate floor in May, peppering inboxes with fundraising pitches, and tried to focus his fundraising pitch on small-dollar, grassroots donations.

"When the media pores through my financial reports next week, they'll be scrutinizing every little detail. And that doesn't include just fundraising totals. They'll also be looking to see how far and wide my base of grass-roots support extends. If they discover my campaign has a grassroots army of supporters in every state and every city across the country, it's sure to make their heads spin," Paul's campaign wrote in a fundraising e-mail days before the end of the June 30 reporting quarter.

Rand Paul pulls in $7 million for presidential run // Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 10, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul pulled in $7 million for his presidential run during the last fundraising quarter, his campaign reported on Friday.

Included in that number are receipts from Paul's joint fundraising committee, and his campaign is able to point to a decently large number of contributors (108,205) with an average donation of $65.

The $7 million figure doesn't, however, include the money raised by the libertarian-ish candidate's super PAC, which is expected to significantly up his total haul.

While that makes comparisons tough, the initial figure pales in comparison to the eye-popping numbers trotted out by his Republican rivals in recent days. On Thursday, Jeb Bush's super PAC that it had exceeded its fundraising target, and had brought in $103 million. On top of that, Bush's campaign reported it had raised $11.4 million.

And Sen. Ted Cruz announced last week that his campaign and super PACs had brought in a total $51 million haul for the second quarter.

During the same fundraising period in the 2012 cycle, Sen. Paul's father, Ron Paul, raised $4.5 million.

Paul's overall fundraising numbers are expected to put him very much in the game, and his polling numbers have him in the upper middle of the field. A recent CNN poll found Paul with 8 percent support, tied with Ben Carson and trailing Bush and Donald Trump.
Breitbart.com first reported Paul's haul.

Rand Paul takes in $7 million in second quarter // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – July 10, 2015

Rand Paul raised $7 million in the opening months of his presidential campaign, sitting in the middle of the pack of Republicans who have so far released their fundraising numbers, his campaign said Friday.

Paul, powered by low-dollar "moneybombs" that catapulted him to the Senate in 2010 and helped his father win delegates in his 2012 presidential campaign, raised the millions from 108,000 donors who gave an average of $65.

The figures were first reported late Friday afternoon by Breitbart.

Paul is also considering running for re-election to the Senate, and the $7 million haul is split between the presidential bank account and a joint fundraising committee, which dedicates the first $2,700 of each donation to his presidential run and the next $2,700 to a potential Senate run. A Paul spokesman, Sergio Gor, declined Friday to say how much of the $7 million was raised by each committee.

The Kentucky senator's numbers show that he raised money at a slower clip than his competitors, raising about $85,000 a day.

Paul also has two major super PAC's backing him, one of which is led by several former Paul aides. But he reportedly has struggled to woo the big moneymen who are choosing instead to line up behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. The Kentucky senator has placed a particular emphasis on courting wealthy donors in Silicon Valley.

Unlike some of his competitors, Paul has had almost the full quarter, which began April 1, to raise money for his official campaign. Bush, who officially announced his candidacy about two weeks before the fundraising quarter closed, currently leads the Republican field in those hauls, gathering about $11 million. Cruz raised $10 million in the second quarter, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson cashed in $8.3 million and businesswoman Carly Fiorina and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry trailed the field with between $1 and $2 million.

Rand Paul Raises $7 Million in Second Quarter with Overwhelming Grassroots Support // Breitbart // Matthew Boyle – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY)93% raked in an impressive more than $7 million in the last Federal Election Commission (FEC) fundraising quarter which includes receipts through the joint fundraising committee, his campaign told Breitbart News exclusively.

What's perhaps more impressive than the dollar amount, however, is just how successful Paul has been with grassroots supporters: the total number of donations is comprised of 108,205 individual donors with an average of $65.

What's more, a whopping 85 percent of all donations were for either $50 or less, and 96 percent of all donations were for $100 or less. Those numbers prove that Paul has raw grassroots support nationwide, and hardworking people who aren't part of the permanent political class—the folks who can't max out in thousands of dollars of donations to various political candidates—are doing whatever they can to help him out.

The numbers Paul's campaign released to Breitbart News exclusively also show he is outpacing the contributions of almost every 2012 Republican campaign and has the resources to build a national campaign capable of competing through the convention. The last quarter's $7 million of receipts come from the time frame of between April and June of this year. Paul announced he's running for president in April.

At this point in the 2012 Republican primary, Paul's father former Rep. Ron Paul (R-TX) raised only $4.5 million, and only former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney raised more. Paul is on pace to raise almost double what his father and almost every other candidate garnered during the 2012 primary.

Additionally, Paul's campaign's announcement of high levels of small dollar donors means he has strong support from real primary voters, not political insiders. His donors are activists who will continue to donate and, as engaged activists, they will drive others to give to and vote for Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY)93%.

Polls continue to show Paul is the best-suited GOP candidate at this time when it comes to facing off against former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in a hypothetical general election. He leads the field against Hillary Clinton nationally, according to Real Clear Politics' average of polls. Also, he is the only candidate who polls ahead of Clinton in polls from key states Republicans need to win the White House, including Colorado, Iowa, New Hampshire, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

Paul is running a grassroots campaign, unlike other candidates who must raise higher amount of funds to overcome monumental negatives. While donor class candidates like Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL)80% or former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush will pump millions into efforts to assuage Republican voters they've infuriated, grassroots insurgent candidates like Paul will continue outside efforts like he's been doing.

In the past two months, Paul has rolled out countless local and national endorsements, opened offices in New Hampshire and Iowa, and focused on campaigning in areas where other Republicans dare not show up, such as liberal college campuses, minority areas throughout the nation, and Silicon Valley. There's also hardly any other candidates as good as Paul at gaining earned media and driving the political narrative—so he's able to, without having to purchase advertising, push the conversation he wants to talk about.

One of the first real tests of any presidential campaign is building an organization that is deep enough in the early states to build momentum and wide enough around the country to sustain the long slog that is a national campaign.

Paul has surpassed such expectations as, in addition to his energized and large grassroots following of liberty supporters, his early state operation has been flexing its muscle since the senator went on his five state announcement tour, packing the house at each spot. Since then, the Senator has announced 125 members to his New Hampshire leadership team, including 25 state representatives and two state senators. He's been lauded for operational efficiency in Iowa and amassed hundreds of volunteers in South Carolina.

And that's not to mention all the endorsements he's pulled together, from people like Congressman Rep. Justin Amash (R-MI)95% of Michigan or Rep. Thomas Massie (R-KY)92% of his home state of Kentucky. Paul also has the endorsement of Senate Majority Leader Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-KY)52%, even though the two have been somewhat at loggerheads with each other since earlier this year on issues like Obamatrade and government surveillance.

CRUZ

Perhaps the only thing better for Sen. Ted Cruz's 2016 candidacy than seeing his book on the New York Times bestseller list is seeing the New York Times refuse to include it.

Politico reported Thursday night that Cruz's (R-Tex.) new book, "A Time for Truth," would be left off of the paper's bestsellers list. It does appear on the Publisher's Weekly list for the week, identifying that 11,853 copies were sold, landing it in fourth place between books from former Playboy bunny Holly Madison and enthusiastic facial-expression-maker Aziz Ansari.

At first, the reason that Cruz wasn't being included weren't clear. A spokesperson for the Times simply told Politico that the paper has "uniform standards that we apply to our best seller list, which includes an analysis of book sales that goes beyond simply the number of books sold. This book didn't meet that standard this week."

Eventually, though, the Times told Politico that "the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases" -- in other words, someone bought a lot of copies of the book so that Cruz would make it onto the bestseller list. Or, to put it more bluntly: Someone gamed the system.

Cruz's publisher denies that. In a statement to Buzzfeed, HarperCollins said that it had "investigated the sales pattern for Ted Cruz's book" and "found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization." It went on to note that Nielsen Bookscan excludes bulk sales from its figures, which resulted in the 11,800 number above.

You will not be surprised to learn that the news of Cruz's omission was met with either gloating or fury directed at the liberal media, depending on observers' political leanings.

For example:
Update, 4:00 p.m.: Cruz joins the fight. In a statement to Politico, spokesman Rick Tyler said, "The Times is presumably embarrassed by having their obvious partisan bias called out. But their response — alleging 'strategic bulk purchases' — is a blatant falsehood. The evidence is directly to the contrary. In leveling this false charge, the Times has tried to impugn the integrity of Senator Cruz and of his publisher Harper Collins."

If you're curious, that 11,800 in sales is substantially lower than the 86,000 first-week sales of Hillary Clinton's "Hard Choices" -- though that was backed up with a healthy public relations blitz. (It's closer to Clinton's fourth week, when she sold 17,000 copies.) It's also lower than the sales of Mitt Romney's 2012 book, "No Apology," which did 42,000 in sales in its first week.

Here is a prediction! The Times will soon include Cruz's book on its list, in part because the negative (or, depending on how you look at it, positive) publicity will help goose sales. When Costco axed Dinesh D'Souza's book from its shelves last summer for poor sales, the resulting outcry ensured so much demand that Costco quickly restocked it.

In which case Cruz gets the conservative cred of being blackballed by the Times and the PR bonus of being a Times bestseller. Win-win.

The Daily Cruz // Politico // Hadas Gold, Katie Glueck, and Kenneth P. Vogel – July 10, 2015

Ted Cruz has a media strategy. It's called Breitbart.com.

The Texas senator is firmly ensconced in the middle of the Republican presidential primary pack. But you wouldn't be able to tell from Breitbart.com.

From reader polls and the conservative website's near cheerleading coverage of the Texas Senator, to donor connections behind the scenes, Cruz likely has the Republican presidential field's deepest relationship with the Breitbart machine — a relationship he's seeking to parlay into more energized grassroots support.

Breitbart.com, which boasts of having 18.7 million unique users per month — almost all of them conservative firebrands — is funded in part by New York hedge fund manager Robert Mercer, whose family is bankrolling a pro-Cruz super PAC as well as a political data company called Cambridge Analytica that is working with Cruz's presidential campaign.

Breitbart.com insists it's independent, though proudly conservative, and attributes its often-favorable assessments of Cruz to the fact that his independent brand of conservatism is appealing to its readers.

But no one disputes the site's enthusiasm for Cruz.

The night before his campaign announcement, Cruz invited a Breitbart reporter to spend one-on-one time with him and his family — an item deemed an "exclusive" with photos of the "potential first family" as they got ready for bed.

A recent story about an AP photo that appeared to position a gun at the senator's head stated that while a Democrat would be incredibly offended by the image, Cruz's "feelings won't get hurt. He's a big boy."

And another blasted former President George W. Bush's senior aide Karl Rove for what the site characterized as "lying" over an exchange Cruz and Rove had during Cruz's run for Texas Attorney General.

"Karl Rove should probably read what he wrote in his own emails before he attacks the integrity of a U.S. Senator and presidential candidate again," the story's lead sentence reads.

The site, founded in 2007 by the now-iconic conservative journalist and activist Andrew Breitbart, can be an important starting ground for driving the conversation on the right — even if its reporting is not always on entirely solid ground. (The site has been known to misquote officials and misidentify others.)

In June, the site's editors said their 18.7 million unique users represented a 56 percent increase over the year before. And nearly all of the Republican presidential candidates regularly post op-eds and grant the site interviews or certain "exclusives," which can range from interviews to excerpts of their forthcoming books.

Cruz's distaste for the mainstream media is well known. Last week, the Texas senator told conservative host Glenn Beck that he once rebuked a young staffer for calling one member of the mainstream media "nice," telling the staffer all the media want to do is "filet" him across the front page. He once told a New York Times reporter he was going to kick around the publication and never give the reporter access.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But conservative media is a different story. He has long used that avenue as a tool to engage conservative audiences. He even broke the news, in 2011, that he was planning to run for Senate in a conference call with conservative bloggers. Just weeks after Andrew Breitbart died at the age of 43 in 2012, a story on Breitbart.com said "The late Andrew Breitbart saw in Sen. Ted Cruz the future of the conservative movement," alongside a photo of Breitbart holding a Ted Cruz for Senate sticker.

And Cruz has gone to bat for Breitbart.com in the Senate. Cruz sent a letter to the IRS commissioner on Breitbart's behalf about the "highly questionable" audit of the company the agency was undertaking last September.

Meanwhile, he has offered toasts and remembrances to Andrew Breitbart and is a frequent guest at Breitbart.com events.

He nodded to Andrew Breitbart's legacy again when he endorsed Mike Flynn, a former editor at Breitbart.com who was running in a GOP congressional primary in Illinois (a race he lost on Tuesday), prompting puzzlement among observers for the spending of political capital on a candidate that was far from viable.

"When Andrew Breitbart launched BigGovernment.com to expose ACORN and fight back against the institutional left and the political class, he chose Mike Flynn as his lieutenant," Cruz said in a statement. "For six years, Flynn helped expose the media's lies and led many fights against the Obama administration."
Cruz spokesman Rick Tyler said that the senator considers Breitbart.com a source of "fair" coverage, its "center-right" perspective a corrective for the mainstream media's "center-left" bias.

"While most of the media covers the news from a center-left perspective, they cover from a center-right perspective, and their readers have been very supportive of Cruz," Tyler said of Breitbart.com. "It can be a vehicle to get covered fairly from a center-right perspective, to an audience that enjoys hearing from Sen. Cruz."

The love runs both ways. For the first time, the site is hosting its own regular online poll of its readers, and Cruz is far and away the favorite candidate. Of the approximately 55,000 responses from June, Breitbart said 33 percent voted in favor of Cruz, putting him in first place ahead of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who garnered 23 percent, and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul who brought in 10 percent. It's hardly a scientific poll — anyone can vote as often as they'd like — but the results match up with the site's favorable coverage of particular candidates.

"I don't think this is a surprise, the result that we have, based on sort of the voice of our site. It tends to favor the tea party grassroots type of conservatives, the independent-minded conservatives, people who don't identify with the Republican establishment," Alex Marlow, the site's editor-in-chief, said in an interview.

Behind the scenes there is perhaps an even more important connection between Cruz and Breitbart.

Breitbart executive chairman Steve Bannon has worked with Mercer on political projects including Cambridge Analytica, according to conservative finance operatives. They describe Bannon as something of a gatekeeper for Mercer, a New York hedge fund magnate who keeps a close circle of associates and has not publicly advocated for Cruz. According to the New York Times, Mercer is the main donor behind a network of four super PACs supporting Cruz's bid for president. Mercer's daughter Rebekah Mercer, who has helped steer the family's increasingly public investment in conservative politics, was an early Cruz supporter, hosting a fundraiser in April for the Texas Senator.

A spokesman for the Mercers decline to comment on their involvement in Breitbart.com or whether they have sought to shape the outlet's coverage of Cruz. Breitbart editors refused to comment on the Mercer connection saying they're a "private company and we don't comment on who our investors or backers are."

"Breitbart is perfectly content letting these nameless/faceless 'multiple places' as you put it speculate, gossip and exhaust their imaginations telling reporters tales of what they think they know," a Breitbart spokesperson said in a statement.

And Tyler, Cruz's spokesman, said that Mercer's involvement in Breitbart also had no effect on the Cruz campaign's dealings with the outlet.

"I answered the phone for you just like I would answer for Breitbart," he told a POLITICO reporter. "I don't stop and look at who POLITICO's investors are. I think we have open access to all the media outlets except the ones that have an agenda," which aren't real outlets, he said.

Marlow said Cruz's views often align well with those of the site's editors and readers, but that Breitbart.com been critical of him in the past.

"[Cruz] tends to have a lot of ideas that are supported by a lot of our readers ... but we've been critical of him in the past particularly when he went down to the border with Glenn Beck and brought soccer balls — we were pretty brutal there," Marlow said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Breitbart has published articles about how Cruz is "poorly matched to defeat Hillary." The site also hammered Cruz over his initial support for fast-track authority on the trade deal, a position he later reversed — through an op-ed posted at Breitbart.com. And, to be sure, Breitbart has also showered favorable coverage on the likes of Walker, Ben Carson, Mike Huckabee and, in the past couple of weeks, Donald Trump.

For Breitbart, the attention from candidates like Cruz is nothing but positive.

"There's a huge field in terms of Republican candidates who are vying for to become the nominee and this huge field has generated an intensity of interest," Breitbart News CEO Larry Solov said in an interview. "I think a lot of candidates realize our audience is the one that they will have to be capture in order to win the nomination. That's why they're paying attention."

Ted Cruz feuds with the New York Times – and loves it // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 10, 2015

The campaign gods are smiling down on Ted Cruz, gifting him a feud with conservatives' most despised news outlet at a time when most 2016 campaigns are gasping for Trump-free air.

At issue: The New York Times refuses to grant the Texas senator's memoir, "A Time for Truth," a place on its powerful list of bestselling books, despite his publisher's insistence that his numbers should vault him well ahead of other titles in the top 10.

News of Cruz's exclusion broke this week after HarperCollins, the book's publisher, sent a letter to the Times inquiring about its omission from the list, sources with knowledge of the situation told POLITICO, which first reported the story. The Times responded by telling HarperCollins that the book did not meet their criteria for inclusion.

On Thursday, a Times spokesperson said that the book was excluded because the paper had found its sales to be mostly "strategic bulk purchases" — a common practice among political authors, but a claim hotly disputed by Cruz's campaign.

"The Times is presumably embarrassed by having their obvious partisan bias called out.
But their response — alleging 'strategic bulk purchases' — is a blatant falsehood," Cruz campaign spokesperson Rick Tyler said in a statement Friday. "The evidence is directly to the contrary. In leveling this false charge, the Times has tried to impugn the integrity of Senator Cruz and of his publisher Harper Collins."

"We call on the Times, release your so-called 'evidence.' Demonstrate that your charge isn't simply a naked fabrication, designed to cover up your own partisan agenda," Tyler continued. "And, if you cannot do so, then issue a public apology to Senator Cruz and Harper Collins editor Adam Bellow for making false charges against them."

Tyler's blast came just minutes after HarperCollins announced it had found "no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization" — a statement that all but accused the Times of lying. The publisher also pointed out that 'A Time For Truth' "ranked high on other publishing industry bestseller lists including Nielsen Bookscan (#4) ... The Wall Street Journal (#4) and Barnes and Noble (#7)," all of which "omit bulk orders books from their rankings."

Cruz's camp is clearly relishing the controversy, which has been good for business.

"It's been a good week and a half with wall-to-wall coverage of the book, and yes, this latest unfortunate news courtesy of the New York Times is a chance to get yet more attention and drive readers to Senator Cruz's book," said Keith Urbahn, co-founder of Javelin, a D.C.-based literary agency and communications firm that represented Cruz on the deal and helped with his book rollout. "This controversy is already helping sales."
Several Cruz-linked Twitter accounts, including @TedCruz, also retweeted a Washington Post blog post with the headline, "Ted Cruz hits the jackpot: A book war with the New York Times."

Cruz is somewhat better positioned than many of his fellow 2016 rivals, who have struggled to get attention since real estate mogul Donald Trump entered the race.

Not Cruz. Not only is his book a success, giving him a second round of publicity after his May 23 launch, he also appears to be having little trouble raising funds. His campaign announced this week that he had raised at least $51 million split between the official campaign and four super PACs, putting him in second place in the money race behind former Florida governor Jeb Bush and well ahead of Marco Rubio and Scott Walker.

In that sense, Cruz's feud with the Times is a happy bonus.

Eileen Murphy, the Times spokesperson, said Friday that the paper was standing by her initial claim that the "overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales [of Cruz's book] were limited to strategic bulk purchases." Murphy did not respond to a request for comment regarding the Cruz campaign's statement.

In her initial response, Murphy said the Times had "uniform standards that we apply to our best seller list, which includes an analysis of book sales that goes beyond simply the number of books sold." She later added, "Our goal is that the list reflect authentic best sellers, so we look at and analyze not just numbers, but patterns of sales for every book."

The Cruz campaign called Murphy's initial explanation "cryptic," and her later claims about bulk purchases "false."

"Their decision to blackball Cruz's book suggests that the Times very much does not want people to read the book," the campaign said. "There were no 'strategic bulk purchases.' Cruz spent last week on a nationwide book tour, signing copies of his book at multiple locations. Booksellers at each event had long lines — sometimes over 400 people per event."

"A Time For Truth" was published on June 30 and sold 11,854 copies in its first week, according to Nielsen Bookscan's hardcover sale numbers. That's more than 18 of the 20 titles that will appear on the bestseller list for the week ending July 4, including Aziz Ansari's "Modern Romance," which is #2 on the list, and Ann Coulter's "Adios America," which is #11.

Cruz's memoir has also sold more copies in a single week than Rand Paul's "Taking a Stand," which has been out for more than a month, and more than Marco Rubio's "American Dreams," which has been out for six months.

That may partly be the result of much more aggressive promotion, and partly because Cruz's book is simply more interesting, with revealing anecdotes about his half-sister's drug overdose, his time looking at pornography while clerking on the Supreme Court, and his blistering attacks on his fellow Republicans.

"What will really make this book a long-term success is that Senator Cruz deliberately decided not to craft a boilerplate book of safe bromides, like most politicians do," Urbahn said.

A public brawl with The New York Times won't hurt, either. As the Post's Philip Bump noted, "When Costco axed Dinesh D'Souza's book from its shelves last summer for poor sales, the resulting outcry ensured so much demand that Costco quickly restocked it."

"It's important to look at a book like a campaign, setting the groundwork early and then seizing opportunities," noted Urbahn. "The New York Times, ironically, offered us exactly that."

HarperCollins disputes N.Y. Times on Ted Cruz book: 'No evidence of bulk sales' // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 10, 2015

The publisher HarperCollins is disputing the New York Times' claim that Ted Cruz's new book was disqualified from its bestseller list because its sales had been driven by "strategic bulk purchases."

The On Media blog reported Thursday that the Times was keeping Cruz's "A Time For Truth" off of its forthcoming bestsellers list, despite the fact that the book has sold more copies in its first week than all but two of the Times' bestselling titles. In an email, Times spokesperson Eileen Murphy attributed that decision to an "overwhelming preponderance of evidence... that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases."

But on Friday, HarperCollins issued a statement declaring that it had found "no evidence" of bulk purchases.

"HarperCollins Publishers has investigated the sales pattern for Ted Cruz's book 'A Time For Truth' and has found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization," the publisher said in a statement, first reported by BuzzFeed.

The statement also cited Murphy's quote about "strategic bulk purchases," then went on to note that "A Time For Truth" "ranked high on other publishing industry bestseller lists including Nielsen Bookscan (#4), a subscription service that tracks the vast majority of book sales in America, The Wall Street Journal (#4) and Barnes and Noble (#7). All these outlets omit bulk orders books from their rankings."

Reached by email on Friday, Murphy said the Times would continue to stand by her previous statement.

"Time For Truth" was published on June 30 and sold 11,854 copies in its first week, according to Nielsen Bookscan's hardcover sale numbers -- more than 18 of the 20 titles that will appear on the bestseller list for the week ending July 4, including Aziz Ansari's "Modern Romance," which is #2 on the list, and Ann Coulter's "Adios America," which is #11.

Two of the Republican Party's most controversial figures have struck up an unlikely alliance as they both vie for the 2016 Republican Party nomination.

Despite faring fairly well in the polls, Donald Trump and Ted Cruz are still considered long shots for the GOP vote. Both candidates have made enemies within their own party. In Cruz's case, he angered many of his Senate colleagues when he pushed a fight over Obamcare that led to a 16-day shutdown of the federal government.

Republicans such as 2016 White House rival Jeb Bush have distanced themselves from Trump, who described illegal immigrants from Mexico as "rapists" and criminals when he launched his presidential race last month. Trump promised if elected to erect a "great wall" between the U.S. and Mexico.

In the weeks since, Trump's comments cost him business partners and friends from every direction including ties with Macy's, NBC and NASCAR, in the past two weeks alone. All the while, fellow outsider Cruz has yet to jump ship.

"I'm pleased to welcome [Donald Trump] into the race for the 2016 GOP nomination for President of the United States…" Cruz tweeted after Trump's contentious announcement. On a later interview on "Fox and Friends," Cruz said he liked Trump and described the former "Celebrity Apprentice" host as "terrific."

Throughout the losses a growing number of professional relationships, Trump has maintained a poker face, writing them off as minor and took shots at Democrats and fellow Republicans alike, accusing them of taking his comments out of context.

But Cruz told Fox Business Network: "I am proud to stand with Donald Trump."

Presidential hopeful Cruz blasts N.Y. Times book off bestseller list // Reuters // Fiona Ortiz – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Ted Cruz says his book "A Time for Truth" is a legitimate bestseller and on Friday challenged the New York Times to prove its contention that the tome's high sales were due to bulk buying.

In a statement on his campaign website, the Texas senator said the New York Times should apologize or release evidence of its analysis. He said he was being kept off the bestseller list because the newspaper is politically biased against him.

HarperCollins Publishers said in a statement that it investigated sales of the book and "found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization."

New York Times spokeswoman Danielle Rhoades Ha said the company stands by its statement on Thursday that Cruz's book did not meet the standards for its bestseller list, "which includes an analysis of book sales that goes beyond simply the number of books sold."

"In the case of this book, the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases," the statement said.

The book does not appear at all in the Times' top-20 non-fiction books.

Cruz's campaign denied there were any strategic bulk purchases and said booksellers at events on his campaign tour had long lines for people buying "A Time for Truth: Reigniting the Promise of America" and getting it autographed by the candidate.

HarperCollins said the book ranked high on other bestseller lists that omit bulk orders from their rankings, noting it was No. 4 on Nielsen BookScan's hardover nonfiction list, which is published on the Wall Street Journal and Publishers Weekly websites.

Barnes and Noble's website showed the book at No. 10 on its list of current affairs and politics bestsellers on Friday evening, but it was not in its overall top 100.

HarperCollins Refutes New York Times Claim That Ted Cruz Tried To Game Bestseller List // BuzzFeed // McKay Coppins – July 10, 2015

Publishing giant HarperCollins is publicly pushing back against the New York Times' claim that Ted Cruz's new book, A Time For Truth, was disqualified from its bestseller list because sales were limited to "strategic bulk purchases."

In a statement provided to BuzzFeed News, HarperCollins publicity director Tina Andreadis said the company looked into the matter and “found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization.”

It is common practice for politicians to try to game the Times’ prestigious bestseller list by having their campaigns or political action committees buy up thousands of copies of their books. When Cruz’s book was left off the list this week despite outselling many of the entries that did make it, the paper’s spokesperson justified the omission by telling Politico they found an “overwhelming preponderance of evidence” that the sales numbers were being padded by bulk purchases.

By publicly refuting the Times’ claim , HarperCollins is taking on one of the most influential forces in the publishing industry — an exceedingly rare move for any large publisher.

Here is Andreadis’ complete statement:

HarperCollins Publishers has investigated the sales pattern for Ted Cruz’s book A TIME FOR TRUTH and has found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization.

When questioned about the omission of A TIME FOR TRUTH from its bestseller list, the New York Times told Politico, “In the case of this book, the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases.”

A TIME FOR TRUTH ranked high on other publishing industry bestseller lists including Nielsen Bookscan (#4), a subscription service that tracks the vast majority of book sales in America, The Wall Street Journal (#4) and Barnes and Noble (#7). All these outlets omit bulk orders books from their rankings.

Is Ted Cruz A Bestselling Author Or Isn’t He? // Daily Beast // Malcolm Jones – July 10, 2015

Ted Cruz’s new book, A Time for Truth: Reigniting the Promise of America, is not on the New York Times bestseller list. It is on other lists, such as the Wall Street Journal’s and USA Today’s. Cruz partisans have been quick to assume that the liberal Times is smothering the news that Cruz’s book is selling well.

Trust me, it’s much, much weirder than that.

Nearly every news outlet that maintains a bestseller list uses a different methodology. Some rely on Nielsen BookScan for their sales information. Some collect their own data.

Some, like USA Today, mush everything into one list, so hardcovers and paperbacks and e-books all jostle for the same rankings. Others segregate their lists according to format (one for hardcovers, one for paperback, etc.).

The Times slices and dices its list about as finely as anyone. There’s a hardcover fiction list, an e-book fiction list, a paperback fiction list, a how-to list, and on and on. After J.K. Rowling’s Harry Potter books took over the number one fiction spot for months on end, the Times created a separate list for children’s fiction.

The kids’ book list was in response, it was said at the time, to complaints from publishers that they couldn’t compete with Rowling’s success. As long as she dominated the fiction list, no one else was ever going to have a number one adult bestseller again.

And number-one bestsellers are important to publishers. A number-one bestseller gets pride of place in bookstores, and it gets better positioned on Amazon. Just the name of a book on a bestseller list is that much more free advertising. And down the road, a hardback’s bestselling status means more will be spent to promote the paperback edition when it comes out, and of course the paperback is bedecked with type proclaiming it a Times bestseller. When the author’s agent tries to sell the author’s next book, the bestselling status of the author’s previous book completely changes the conversation.

The Times takes its role in all this very seriously, which is to say, it knows how important the list is to publishers, and it doesn’t like being gamed.

If you’ve got deep pockets and want to make your book a best seller, you can do that. You can buy up books in bulk and make the list. To counter this, the Times weights the results of its tabulations from stores around the country. It also does this to keep, say, New York City or other big book markets from controlling the contents of the lists.

So, for example, if the Times sees that a significant number of the 11,854 copies of Cruz’s book sold so far this week come from one place or a handful of places, the newspaper does not give those sales the same weight it gives sales from other stores and online outlets.

Which is admirable, and also worrisome. Admirable because the Times wants its list to reflect what books readers actually bought, not what was snapped up in bulk by some company in the employ of a conservative interest group

(some other day we'll undertake an examination of the closed circle in which conservative writers publish books with conservative publishing imprints, which are then promoted by conservative Fox News commentators to conservative viewers who loyally buy the books—if you doubt the effectiveness of such a loop, consider that nearly every mainstream publishing conglomerate has an imprint dedicated exclusively to books by and about conservatives). Worrisome because who ultimately decides what constitutes a legitimate sale? And a sale is a sale is sale, or isn't it? Well, no, clearly at the Times it is not.

Of course, however they are compiled, the nation's various bestseller lists do roughly reflect reality. John Grisham and James Patterson and Doris Kearns Goodwin really do sell a lot of books. Day in and day out, the books on various lists are largely the same and in more or less the same order from list to list. But if a publisher or an author or an author's rich associates want to "create" a bestseller, they can do that, too. So take what you see not as hard fact but as an approximation of fact.

Every few years some enterprising reporter exposes all the contradictions and problems associated with bestseller lists. And maybe there's some handwringing, and maybe someone comes along with a new innovation that will set everything right. USA Today's one-size-fits-all list was supposed to resolve disparities and let you see what was really the most popular book in a given week. BookScan was supposed to make everything about sales transparent. The changes get made, and yet essentially everything remains the same, because all the players have too much invested in the status quo. They know it's flawed. And yet …

It's like the joke Woody Allen tells in Annie Hall: "A guy walks into a psychiatrist's office and says, hey doc, my brother's crazy! He thinks he's a chicken. Then the doc says, why don't you turn him in? Then the guy says, I would but I need the eggs."

NTU: Cruz tried to reduce federal spending by $169 billion per year, while Hillary Clinton proposes $226 billion in new spending // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer – July 10, 2015

has supported measures to reduce federal spending by $169.4 billion a year during his time in Congress.

"Cruz's average tallies $10 billion more in spending cuts than his Republican colleagues. For every dollar of new spending, Cruz's agenda would cut $8.47 billion in spending," the press release states.

"Senator Cruz supported significant spending reductions like repeal of the Affordable Care Act and abolishing the IRS and income tax in favor of a sales tax," said Demian Brady, NTUF Director of Research. "Combined with very minimal spending increases, these make for a legislative slate big on savings."

NTUF's BillTally examined and analyzed the cost impact of Cruz's legislation he sponsored during the first session of the 113th Congress and found not only would it reduce federal spending by $169.4 billion each year, but also his repeal of Obamacare would cut federal spending by close to 64 billion dollars per year.

Cruz's plea to abolish the IRS and the federal income tax and replace it with a national sales tax would save 96.9 billion dollars over five years.

Brady added, "NTUF's data continues to provide a clear picture of the fiscal history of Members of Congress, helping to enlighten on the costs of the policies politicians support."

In contrast, the NTUF analysis found Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) pushed more than a one trillion dollar annual spending during his time in the Senate, and Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton proposed 226 billion dollars in new spending.

Cruz's fellow GOP presidential candidate Sen. Marco Rubio (R-FL)80% proposed $330 billion in cuts while Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY)93% proposed on average a $484 billion spending reduction.

Christie's First Television Ad Goes Up for New Hampshire Viewers // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – July 10, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie will be showing his first television ad of the cycle in the same place he spent his first week as a candidate: New Hampshire.

The nearly $500,000 ad purchase will run in the Boston and Manchester, N.H., television markets, as well on cable, satellite and digital, over a four-week period.

With splices of Mr. Christie's announcement speech in New Jersey tracking under footage of people working in plants and hugging on doorsteps, the ad further builds on his campaign's central message: the Republican candidate's persona.

"I am not looking to be the most popular guy, who looks in your eyes everyday and tries to figure out what you want to hear, say it, and then turn around and do something else," Mr. Christie says in the ad.

The ad purchase in New Hampshire is yet another example of Mr. Christie's campaign staking its 2016 hopes on the Granite State.

Chris Christie releases first TV spot // Politico // Ryan Hutchins – July 10, 2015

Governor Chris Christie on Friday released the first television ad of his presidential campaign, drawing on his unscripted announcement speech and his new slogan, "tell it like it is."

The 30-second spot uses a clip from Christie's campaign launch, held last month at his former high school in Livingston, and attempts to sell the candidate himself—rather than an ideology—by declaring that "leadership matters."

"It matters for our country. And American leadership matters for the world," Christie says as the ad. "But if we're going to lead, we have to stop worrying about being loved and start caring about being respected again. I am not looking to be the most popular guy, who looks in your eyes everyday and tries to figure out what you want to hear, say it, and then turn around and do something else. I mean what I say, and I say what I mean. And that's what America needs right now."

The ad was first reported in POLITICO Playbook this morning. It is expected to run for one month on broadcast and cable stations in New Hampshire, where Christie has focused most of his efforts in hopes of turning his candidacy into a viable run for the presidency.

Christie Pushes Tough-Talking Image With Ads in New Hampshire // Bloomberg // Terrence Dopp – July 10, 2015

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie is taking out his first television ads in New Hampshire as he targets the state with the first primary to build momentum in a crowded Republican field.

The $500,000 ad buy, produced by Strategic Media Partners, will air over four weeks across broadcast channels in Boston and Manchester, as well as cable, radio and digital across the Granite State, said Samantha Smith, a spokeswoman for Christie.

Footage was taken from Christie's June 30 presidential announcement in his hometown of Livingston, New Jersey. The two-term governor is pushing his tough-talking image as he fights for one of the 10 slots at the first Republican primary debate in August. He's currently near the bottom of the list of those who will make the cutoff, which will be based on the candidates' national poll rankings.

"If we're going to lead we have to stop worrying about being loved and start caring about being respected again," Christie says in the 30-second spot. "I'm not looking to be the most popular guy who looks in your eyes every day and tries to figure out what you want to hear; say it and turn around and do something else."

Christie is betting that New Hampshire holds the key to jump-starting an electoral effort that hasn't ignited the same kind of popularity that four years ago prompted business and political leaders to urge him to enter the race. He declined in 2012, saying he wasn't ready.

3 Questions African Americans Should Ask Chris Christie // NBC // Jason Johnson – July 10, 2015

As the number of candidates has grown from a group to a sports to team to what now resembles the crowd during the closing credits of SNL, it's getting harder and harder to distinguish which candidates really warrant much scrutiny.

Chris Christie became the 14th Republican candidate to declare and we can expect at least two more (John Kasich and Scott Walker) to announce this month.

If there's anyone in the GOP who should feel accountable to African American primary voters it's Christie. This is a particularly important constituency for him because unlike every other Republican contender, he boasts bringing in about 21 percent of the African American vote in his last re-election in 2014, a jump from only 9 percent in his first race in 2010.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

African Americans, a key constituency for any contender in 2016, have a special set of concerns and asks for anyone running for president that are seldom directly addressed. Throughout the 2016 campaign season NBCBLK will examine the candidates' statements, campaigns, and policies to find out what they have to offer the black community. Hopefully their campaigns will feel compelled to respond.

1. How will you implement criminal justice reform ?

Chris Christie has already been at the forefront of some criminal just reform measures in New Jersey. He fought for expanding drug courts that put offenders into treatment instead of prison (and this was over Democrats who actually wanted to delay the program). Governor Christie also dedicated a large part of his second inaugural address to criminal justice reform and pledged to make that a key part of his second term. However, as president he faces significant obstacles to such reform. African American voters should ask Christie how he would plan to improve or change criminal justice practices in the DOJ or the DEA if he were elected with likely are Republican Congress. This is especially important as Christie has remained silent on cases like the Zimmerman trial, he deferred on the Eric Garner case, and he pretty much gave a "no comment" on Ferguson.

2. What is the Chris Christie version of Washington bipartisanship ?

In his announcement speech yesterday Christie was in full 2012 mode, by chastising both political parties and decrying the lack of leadership in the Obama administration in foreign affairs. But within minutes he was back to talking about how he'd reach across the aisle to work on ideas that he and Democrats could agree upon. All of this sounds nice until you think of "Bridgegate." While the scandal didn't result in the kind of major charges against Christie that some expected African American voters should be wary of any candidate who has a reputation for being particularly punitive to those he disagrees with politically.

Bridgegate not only damages Christie's reputation as a straight shooter, but also labels him as a bully who will punish opponents regardless of how that may impact innocent citizen bystanders. Black folks are often collateral damage in battles between political elites and Christie should explain to voters how he won't let that happen under his presidency.

3. What about the Jobs?

During the last several years of the Great Recession, African American unemployment rates have slowly gone down to about 10 percent. (This is still worse than the 8.7 percent it was before Obama took office.) African American voters should ask Christie how effective he will be at helping to lift black voters out of poverty.

New Jersey has the fourth highest rate of long-term unemployment African Americans in the nation at 48.7 percent. (Mind you, New Jersey also led the nation in White long term unemployed people at 41 percent for 2013-2014, so Christie doesn't seem to be doing a good job of lifting anyone's status in the Garden State.)

An effective long term plan for getting America back to work would go a long way in establishing Christie not only as a legitimate contender for 2016 but also a viable competitor for African American voters.

Chris Christie releases first campaign ad for 2016 nomination: 'I mean what I say, and I say what I mean' // NY Daily News // Celeste Katz – July 10, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie rolled out his first ad of the fight for the 2016 Republican nomination for President on Friday — a mashup of his teleprompter-free kickoff speech in his hometown.

"Leadership matters. It matters for our country. And American leadership matters for the world," Christie says in the 30-second spot, which uses footage from his June 30 launch event.

"But if we're going to lead, we have to stop worrying about being loved and start caring about being respected again."

Team Christie says it is investing nearly $500,000 to air the inaugural spot in early-voting New Hampshire — the focal point of Christie's campaigning — for a month in broadcast TV, cable, radio and digital formats.

That timeline would bring Christie up to the first televised debate between the GOP candidates, which is scheduled for Aug. 6 in the battleground state of Ohio.

The "Leadership" ad captures Christie in one of his favorite campaign modes, one on which he's relied heavily both as governor and White House hopeful: addressing supporters directly on all sides in a town hall-style setup.

Footage and sound from Christie's launch speech is interspersed with images of a variety of people filmed working or gazing into the camera — including a one man who prominently wears both American and Mexican flag patches on his coat.

Christie, who's framing himself as the straight talker in the jammed Republican field with a "Telling It Like It Is" slogan, wraps with a signature line from his kickoff at his alma mater, Livingston High School.

"I am not looking to be the most popular guy, who looks in your eyes everyday and tries to figure out what you want to hear, say it, and then turn around and do something else," Christie says.

"I mean what I say, and I say what I mean. And that's what America needs right now."

Christie was once regarded as a major rising star in the GOP, with a featured speaking spot at the 2012 national convention and a 2014 turn as head of the Republican Governors Association.

But his image and popularity took a turn for the worse as he battled the fallout of the Bridgegate lane closure scandal, and voters in his own state have given him low marks for addressing unemployment and high taxes.

PERRY

Rick Perry's super PAC haul: $16.8 million // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 10, 2015

Three affiliated super PACs supporting Rick Perry's presidential bid have raised nearly $17 million, a PAC official confirmed Friday, while his campaign announced a $1 million fundraising haul.

Jordan Russell, a spokesman for the Opportunity and Freedom PAC, confirmed that the organization and its two affiliated groups, all under the leadership of prominent Mississippi operative Austin Barbour, among others, had raised $16.8 million for the former Texas governor.

"It looks like we're going to have the resources to help Gov. Perry compete in the early states and beyond, so we feel good about it," Russell said.

His official campaign said Friday afternoon that it had raised $1.07 million since announcing last month, but in a statement noted the independent super PAC figure, claiming close to $18 million in pro-Perry money.

Unlike some campaigns, where nearly the entire brain trust is housed under the super PAC, Perry has a robust campaign staff. But Opportunity and Freedom, led by Barbour and several longtime Perry advisers, has already bought up airtime in Iowa to run ads on behalf of the former governor and, as the better-funded arm, looks poised to play an active role in the race.

Perry is a longshot for the GOP nomination after his disastrous 2012 presidential run. Last time, he entered the race as a presumptive front-runner but quickly flamed out amid a series of embarrassing missteps, including major fumbles on the debate stage.

This time around, he lags enough in the polls that it's unlikely he'll qualify for the first debate. But he has spent the past year and a half seeking to rebrand himself, studying up on policy issues and spending significant time in the early states, particularly Iowa.

The super PAC haul, while far behind that of Jeb Bush's and Ted Cruz's, is in line with other candidates' totals.

The news of the super PAC haul was first reported by CNN.

Rick Perry super PACs raise nearly $17M // CNN // Sara Murray – July 10, 2015

A trio of super PACs supporting former Texas Gov. Rick Perry has raised neared $17 million, according to a senior adviser for the groups.

Two pro-Perry groups -- Opportunity and Freedom PAC and Opportunity and Freedom PAC I -- raised $12.8 million in the first half of the year. A third super PAC, which was created Thursday, collected a $4 million check from a single donor, bringing the full tally for the three groups to $16.8 million as of July 10, said Austin Barbour, the senior adviser to all three affiliated entities.

The total falls far short of the $103 million Jeb Bush's super PAC has raised, but it is competitive with others in the GOP field. That's a promising sign for Perry who has faced questions from GOP voters and donors alike about whether he can mount a comeback after his embarrassing 2012 presidential bid.

"Look nobody's going to compete with Jeb Bush, it's impossible. Congratulations to them," Barbour said. But, "we have enough money now to keep us competitive in this process for a long time."

Barbour said their robust fundraising lends his candidate additional credibility. It also gives bundlers an opening to circle back with hesitant donors and pitch them on supporting Perry or writing larger checks.

Wealthy Texas donors helped fuel the fundraising for the pro-Perry groups.

Kelcy Warren, a Dallas billionaire and chief executive of an energy company whose board of directors includes Perry, gave a $6 million contribution. Warren is also the finance chairman for Perry's presidential campaign.

Darwin Deason, another Dallas billionaire who founded an information technology company that was later acquired by Xerox Corporation, gave $5 million.

Brint Ryan, chief executive of tax services firm Ryan LLC, is serving as the finance chairman for all three groups, which have collected donations from dozens of contributors.

Barbour said he and other Perry allies organized three super PACs because high-dollars donors want to have more input in the process this election cycle than they did in 2012. For instance, many of his biggest contributors are eager to tout Perry's record of job creation in Texas.

"If they were going to give a million dollars or $5 million they really want to be able to participate," Barbour said. "They know that the final decisions on strategy and execution still lie with me and our team."

The super PACs still have most of their cash on hand, Barbour said, although they have spent more than $1 million already in paid television and digital advertising in Iowa.

"We made this decision a long time ago that we were going to go early in Iowa," Barbour said. "We feel like we have clean air," giving them an edge to reintroduce voters to the governor before the airwaves become too crowded.

The Perry campaign and super PACs are all betting heavily on a strong showing in Iowa and on the debate stage to carry the candidate further along in the process.

That's why the super PACs have also spent a "significant amount" to reach a large conservative audience nationally to try to boost Perry's polling and ensure he makes the debate stage, Barbour said.

Perry comes in eighth place with 4% support among Republicans in the latest CNN/ORC poll. Averages of recent national polls indicate he will likely qualify for the first debate.

As for the recent Donald Trump mania, Barbour said Perry's exchanges with the brash businessman over immigration policies are a welcome fight.

"If the conversation is about border security, nobody knows it better than Rick Perry," Barbour said.

New Super PAC Ad for Rick Perry Touts His Pro-Life, Gun Rights Record // Breitbart // Sarah Rumpf – July 10, 2015

The Super PAC supporting former Gov. Rick Perry (R-TX) in his bid for the Republican presidential nomination has released a new television ad, titled “Values,” and Breitbart News has an exclusive first look.

The 30-second spot begins mentioning how Rick Perry “learned life’s important values” growing up in the small town of Paint Creek, Texas, and “as Governor, he put those values to work,” supporting pro-life and Second Amendment causes.

As Governor of Texas in 2013, Perry signed into law a ban on abortions after 20 weeks. He backed the bill after former State Sen. Wendy Davis filibustered it by calling the legislature back for a special session to pass the bill. During a previous session, he signed a bill requiring parental consent for abortions.

Regarding gun rights, Perry is well-known as a Second Amendment advocate, and has an A+ rating with the National Rifle Association. The ad touts his support for a “castle law,” protecting the right to defend yourself at your home.

“You can talk about your values, or you can live them,” says the ad’s narrator, as the video shows scenes from Perry’s campaign launch in Addison last month.

“As Governor Perry says, this is a show me don’t tell me election,” said Jordan Russell, spokesman for Opportunity and Freedom PAC. “Governor Perry has the best pro-life record of any governor in Texas history and is an unwavering defender of the people’s right to keep and bear arms. His strong record on these issues is an important part of what makes Rick Perry the right choice for for president, and we want to make sure the people of Iowa know about it."

Russell told Breitbart News that this was a "significant buy," to be run on broadcast for major media markets and statewide cable.

This is the fourth ad that Opportunity and Freedom PAC will run in Iowa. The PAC has not yet released their fundraising numbers for the second quarter, but sources close to the PAC told Breitbart News they will release their numbers next week and are confident they will have the resources to help Perry be competitive in this race.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham: Trump's comments are going to 'kill the party' // Politico // Nick Gass – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump's statements on immigrants are going to kill the Republican Party, fellow candidate Lindsey Graham says.

"Well, I think he said something that has brought people who are frustrated about our immigration system to light, but he also said it in a way that's going to kill my party," Graham said in an interview with CNN on Friday. "I would prefer that Donald Trump bring his economic genius and his talents to the table in a more constructive way," he added, noting the billionaire's charity efforts with military veterans and their families.

Trump's comments, Graham said, reinforce a narrative between the GOP and Hispanics that will "destroy" any chance the party has of winning the 2016 presidential election.
"I think he should do better, because I think he's a better man than that," he said.

Graham is not the only candidate in the crowded Republican field to condemn Trump's comments that many immigrants from Mexico are "rapists" and "criminals." A number of other candidates, especially those ranking low in the national polls, have turned to Trump-bashing as they seek to boost their poll numbers ahead of the first debate on Aug. 6 in Cleveland.

If the first GOP debate were held today, Graham would not be on the stage, and two people who have never held elected office—Trump and Ben Carson—would be in.
And Graham has a beef about that, making sure to tell the network televising the first event just how he felt during an interview on Fox News on Friday, calling the top 10 format "a dumb way" to pare down the crowded GOP field.

It's all about money and celebrity he said, blasting the use of national polling averages to determine the 10 candidates who will appear on the debate stage.

Recent polling has Graham in the low single digits; his Real Clear Politics polling average sits at 1.3 percent. Trump's average is 6.5 percent, though he polled better in recent polls from CNN/ORC (12 percent) and Fox News (11 percent).

Brad Pitt would have a better chance getting in the debate at this point, Graham said.

"Anybody with any celebrity would be in the debate. I think this is a dumb way to weed out the field. I don't mind weeding out the field over time, but a national poll tests celebrity, big states have an advantage versus small states," the South Carolina senator and presidential candidate said. "People who have run before have an advantage over those who haven't."

"It's July, for god sakes. So a national poll is a lousy way, in my view, to determine who should be on the stage, and I quite frankly resent it," he said.

Graham placed the blame on the Republican National Committee and Fox News for the format, declining to name any other names.

"I would find a way for everybody who's filed and has got a viable campaign to be on the stage, and after a couple of debates, you could start weeding people out. It's not about me. It's about destroying the early primary process of Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina," he said. "At the end of the day, you're rewarding money and celebrity over the hard work in the early states."

Graham said he would decide later whether he would participate in the earlier afternoon forum of candidates who don't make the cut.

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum Wants to Be More Than Just a Pro-Life Candidate // National Journal // Emma Roller – July 10, 2015

Rick Santorum is tired of being pigeonholed. At least, that's the message the two-time Republican presidential candidate gave to the attendees at an antiabortion conference on Friday.

Santorum, along with at least three other GOP presidential contenders, addressed the National Right to Life Conference on Friday. In his speech, he said that people who claim "the science is settled" on climate change but don't agree that life begins at conception are hypocrites. (For the record, Santorum called climate change "junk science" in 2011.)

"I do not believe life begins at conception. I know life begins at conception. This is not a matter of debate. It's not a matter of faith," Santorum told the crowd. "Every child at the moment of conception is both living—that embryo is metabolizing—and it is a genetically completely human."

He went on to complain that as soon as he started advocating against abortion, media outlets began labeling him as "ultraconservative," and reporters stopped caring about his stances on the economy or foreign policy.

"Because I led on this, and very few do, you get labeled, and you get put over there at the kids' table," he paused. "By the media."

This is part of a larger strategy for Santorum's campaign to rebrand its candidate as a populist reformer—whom his allies say is the "real Santorum." When Santorum was first elected to the Senate, it was as a candidate who appealed to Pennsylvania's blue-collar workers. But once he entered Congress, he began cementing his position as his party's champion against abortion and gay marriage. In 2003, he famously compared same-sex marriage to "man-on-dog" relationships, and forever earned the ire (and digital backlash) of gay-rights activist Dan Savage.

Santorum has been out of political office for more than eight years, and during that time, public opinion on social issues, particularly gay marriage, has shifted substantially. The more Santorum is painted as a social-issues candidate, the more he risks being depicted as a relic of the past compared with his Republican competitors.

There is some dramatic irony to Santorum's insisting that he is not a social-issues candidate at a gathering of pro-life activists. If he were speaking to the Atlantic Council or the American Enterprise Institute, his actions would reinforce his message. But so long as he continues to play to his base's social activists, all the while insisting that he is more than just a social crusader, his message will continue to get muddled.

Rick Santorum: The Supreme Court Doesn't Have the Final Say on Everything // The Blaze // Fred Lucas – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rick Santorum reminded abortion opponents of two separate Supreme Court cases on partial-birth abortion bans as he talked about the high court's recent decision legalizing gay marriage nationwide.

In 2000, the justice struck down a Nebraska ban on partial birth abortion. Then a U.S. senator from Pennsylvania, Santorum said he fought efforts within the Republican Party to move on.

"We crafted a law and said the Supreme Court was wrong," Santorum said to applause Friday at the National Right to Life Convention in New Orleans.

A federal ban that Santorum led the way on was signed into law by President George W. Bush in 2003 and then upheld by the high court in 2007.

"When did it become the law of the land because the Supreme Court had the final say on everything?" Santorum said.

"The Supreme Court doesn't have the final say on everything. The American people have the final say on everything," he added to a rousing ovation.

Santorum was the runner-up to eventual Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney in 2012, winning 11 states. However, in this election cycle, he is not performing strongly in most polls ahead of the early-voting states.

Santorum told the crowd that 2016 "is not a time for the faint of heart" because the nation is undergoing sweeping social change.

Santorum admitted that in his early years in Congress, he never talked about abortion, until finding out about the so-called partial birth abortion issue in the late 1990s. He became a leader on the issue, sponsoring a bill to overturn President Bill Clinton's veto of the federal ban. After he became a leader on the front lines of the abortion debate, he said, he was labeled by the media.

"My kids thought my first name was 'ultra'," he said, referring to "ultra-conservative" label.

"It's one thing to be pro-life – being a governor and signing bills, being a senator and voting," Santorum said. "If you stand up and fight, if you are identified as a leader on the issue, you pay a price."

HUCKABEE

Mike Huckabee cites infamous 'Daisy' ad for Iran nuclear deal // CNN // Jeremy Diamond – July 10, 2015

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee on Friday repurposed the controversial "Daisy" ad from 1964 that ominously raised the specter of a nuclear bomb explosion to warn about the dangers of the negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program.

The Republican presidential candidate's campaign released his version of the ad on Friday, playing the ad almost in its entirety in a web video. A little girl slowly picks petals off a daisy, counting as she goes, but once she picks all of the petals, a nuclear bomb explodes on screen.

In Huckabee's version, a message about the Iranian nuclear threat rolls on screen following the explosion

"A threat to Israel is a threat to America. Stand with Israel. Reject a nuclear Iran," reads the ad.

Huckabee posted the video as negotiators once again extended a deadline on Friday to continue working toward a final deal that aims to cut off Iran's path to a nuclear bomb through restrictions on its nuclear activity and thorough inspections, in exchange for relief from international economic sanctions.

Huckabee's ad is drawn from a campaign spot the Democratic National Committee ran in support of President Lyndon B. Johnson's 1964 presidential campaign. The ad only ran once because it was so controversial and it was widely panned as a prime example of fear-mongering. But many credit the ad with helping Johnson win that election.

Even Huckabee's campaign acknowledged in a press release that the ad is "controversial," but it noted that "the video highlights the threat posed by a nuclear Iran."

The video also urges supporters to sign Huckabee's letter to Secretary of State John Kerry, urging him to "reject a deal with Iran that will spark a nuclear arms race in the Middle East, threaten Israel's existence and unleash a wave of terrorism around the world."

Kerry, President Barack Obama and other U.S. officials have insisted this week that the U.S. will "walk away" from the negotiating table if Iran cannot meet the U.S.'s demands for a good deal that would cut off Iran's pathways to a nuclear bomb.

Huckabee: Trump can say what he thinks // Washington Examiner // Emilie Padgett – July 10, 2015

At least one GOP candidate has no qualms about Donald Trump airing his opinions.

Mike Huckabee, a fellow Republican 2016 presidential candidate, made clear on Friday that Trump should be able to say whatever he wants, despite the backlash against Trump for his controversial comments about Hispanic immigrants during his campaign kickoff speech.

Huckabee called the real estate mogul "unique," but when asked whether he was "hurting" the Republican name, he said, "I don't think so." The Arkansas governor said the attention Trump has received could be a good thing.

"He's capturing a lot of this space. My gosh, I wish I was getting as much attention as he is, because anybody getting that much attention certainly is going to soar in the polls," Huckabee said on Fox News Radio.

According to a recent poll taken by Economist/YouGov, Trump is leading the GOP field. Fifteen percent of respondents preferred Trump, which puts him four percentage points ahead of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Rand Paul, who are tied for second.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huckabee added that no one need worry about what Trump will say as the race for the White House continues.

"I don't think that people ought to wring their hands that Donald Trump is in there," he said. "He'll say things differently than most of us, he'll say things that maybe some of us wouldn't say, but he has as much right to be on the stage and speak his message as any of us."

The former Arkansas governor said that allowing candidates to speak their minds enables voters to reach their own conclusions, saying, "That's how the process works." Huckabee emphasized that whether or not he agreed with Trump's rhetoric, getting the billionaire to change his ways would be difficult.

"This notion that we need to ask him to tone it down, well, first of all, he's Donald Trump. He'll say what he wishes," Huckabee said. "And second of all, I think it's important for people to say what they really think. The voters then get a chance to decide. 'Is that who I want to support?'"

Despite the attention, the Economist/YouGov poll found that registered Republican voters believe Trump has a small chance of keeping his top spot as the race continues.

"I hope when [the voters] hear me say what I want to say, they'll like it. They'll want to support me," Huckabee said.

Huckabee has been ranking fifth in most national polls. That support should qualify both candidates for a place among the 10 allowed to participate in the first Republican debate next month.

CARSON

N.H. fans feel the passion for Ben Carson // Boston Globe // Akilah Johnson – July 11, 2015

There's just something about Dr. Ben Carson, some Republican voters here say.

They line up to buy copies of his books. They chase him down streets for photos. Sometimes, they just continue to stare with awe after he speaks.

"I'm just kind of overwhelmed," said Peter Rice, a retired volunteer firefighter, his newly acquired "I'm with Ben" button in hand. "This guy is a breath of fresh air."

There's liking a candidate — and then there's the particular passion that Carson seems to incite, despite the sometimes unusual statements that make him stand out among 2016's Republican White House hopefuls.

So what is it about the 63-year-old political neophyte, who often refers to himself in the third person as "Carson" during stump speeches, advocates for tax rates based on tithing, and compares the life-or-death plight of Revolutionary figures to today's politics?

He speaks with the aplomb of a superstar neurosurgeon and a highbrow history buff — yet also the raw candor overheard in a coffee klatch. While describing detractors' efforts to bring him down — including a reference to a years-old paternity suit — Carson revealed to a packed town hall Tuesday that, "I knew something they didn't know. I knew that the only woman I'd ever slept with in my life was my wife."

Supporters gush over what they call his "compelling personal story" and "common sense." He is the only African-American candidate – Democrat or Republican – and his resume is unlike the others. It includes his tenure as director of neurosurgery at John Hopkins University but no elected offices or previous flirtations with running for president.

'So far, he hits the nerve in my body that says treat people fairly, be respectable, do the right thing, love your country.'

There are pundits who say Carson's brand of religious conservatism will not win in New Hampshire, which polls show is one of the least religious states in the country.

A recent poll by the University of New Hampshire showed Carson barely registered when voters were asked who had the best chance of winning, which candidate best represented Republicans like themselves, and who would be the strongest leader.

Still, the university poll did show Carson had a high net favorability ranking, coming in second after US Senator Marco Rubio of Florida. And according to national polls, he would make the 10-candidate cut to be onstage if the first televised national debate were held today.

So the retired doctor and his supporters aren't worried about the naysayers.

"I'm in love with him," said Dianne Durkin, president and founder of an employment loyalty company. "His entire thing about . . . leadership is spot on."

Ben Carson greeted passersby as he campaigned in Portsmouth, N.H. earlier this week.

"So far, he hits the nerve in my body that says treat people fairly, be respectable, do the right thing, love your country," said Doug Bates, president of the Portsmouth Chamber of Commerce.

Bates estimates he has heard eight candidates speak but only wanted his picture taken with one – Carson.

In a speech Tuesday morning to about 50 business leaders at Pease International Tradeport, Carson called for "stopping all this silly divisiveness" and class, race, gender, and age "warfare" — all distractions, he said, from the "radical Islamic jihadists" targeting America.

"We are falling for garbage. We are allowing ourselves to be colluded. You can't just go through life worried about who's on 'Dancing with the Stars,' " Carson said. "What are you willing to fight for? What are you willing to die for? "

Carson spent three days campaigning in New Hampshire, with its first-in-the-nation primary.

Last month, Carson grabbed national attention by calling out some of the other candidates who, he said, were slow to criticize the massacre at the Charleston, S.C., church as rooted in racism.

"But there are people who are claiming that they can lead this country who dare not call this tragedy an act of racism, a hate crime, for fear of offending a particular segment of the electorate," he wrote in an op-ed piece.

It was just two years ago that Carson burst into the political arena at the National Prayer Breakfast. He used humor and his personal story of growing up in an impoverished Detroit home to give a conservative critique on the country's state of affairs as President Obama sat nearby.

Some of his most scathing remarks focused on the Affordable Care Act, which he wants to replace with a health care system that gives people transferable health savings accounts.

Carson's single mother was determined her two sons would rise above their station in life, he said. She refused to accept public assistance and required regular book reports when he began doing poorly in school, even though she couldn't read them.

He would earn a scholarship to Yale University, where he met his wife, Candy, and continue to the University of Michigan's medical school.

Echoes of that speech come through when Carson addresses a crowd from the campaign trail — but not when he engages in retail politics. As he shook hands and greeted voters one-on-one along the streets of downtown Portsmouth with his wife of 40 years, she was talkative and personable while he was awkward and reserved.

Onstage, though, he seems to capture voters. In Bedford, after one of the must-stop "Politics & Eggs" forums, a woman murmured, "Love his message. He says it just right." At a town hall in Barrington, he concluded his speech by invoking Nathan Hale, famous for saying "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

"The baton of freedom is in the hands of we the people," Carson told the crowd of about 150.

It was a speech that might have earned Donna Callmeyer's support. The 72-year-old Milford resident said she, like so many Republicans, was looking "for one of the bazillion candidates that we can support."

Carson's intellect "totally impressed," her, as did "the fact that he answers questions so thoroughly," she said.

"He wasn't, like, in your face about it," interjected her 14-year-old granddaughter Asia Hanson.

"I won't walk away wondering what he thinks about immigration or the economy," Callmeyer continued. "I felt a genuine honesty. This is the first candidate I'm excited about."

Carson: 'Baby killers' capitalize 'on people's lack of knowledge' // Washington Examiner // Ariel Cohen – July 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ben Carson warned against the growing power of the federal government and "baby killers" denying the humanity of fetuses during his keynote speech at the 2015 National Right to Life Conference in New Orleans.

"When I look there in particular out to the next generations. As we destroy them economically as we destroy them morally as we weaken our defenses as we do all the things that are necessary to bring down our nation," Carson said.

Carson's comments about government overreach came in reaction to the Supreme Court's recent decision upholding Obamacare subsidies for federal exchange customers. Carson said "the Affordable Care Act is the government saying we don't care what we the people think."

But Carson, a famed pediatric neurosurgeon, reserved his harshest criticism for people who support legal abortion. He said there are people who go to "great lengths to save spiders" but not fetuses between six and 10 weeks old.

"The baby killers, that's what they do, manipulate you into thinking this is not a human being," Carson said, adding they "capitalize on people's lack of knowledge." He added that technology was making more people pro-life, because ultrasounds showed them the truth about fetal development.

Many people in attendance at the National Right to Life Conference were evangelicals, a large bloc of voters to which Carson appeals. Carson called on them to speak up for their values.

"I think it's us the American people who will make the difference," Carson said. "It was Thomas Jefferson said this would happen. That we would become relaxed, and that the government would grow and it would infiltrate every aspect of our lives. But just before we turn into another form of government he said the people would waken and reassert themselves. I think now is the time we must do that if we are to save our nation."

In the last election, 30 million evangelicals did not vote, Carson claimed. He urged attendees to encourage their friends to go to the poll, saying "our strength is in unity and belief system."

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal's obsession with "colorblindness" is everything wrong wit h the GOP's racial politics // Salon // Eesha Pandit – July 10, 2015

A few years ago, the members of the Republican National Committee gathered for a retreat after the 2012 election, in which the Democrats held onto the White House and gained seats in both chambers of Congress. At that meeting in the winter of 2012, Bobby Jindal offered up some fiery words about what his party needed to do to win, including a rejection of its obsession with "identity politics," which he deemed "corrosive to the great American melting pot."

"We must reject the notion that demography is destiny, the pathetic and simplistic notion that skin pigmentation dictates voter behavior," Jindal said to applause.

To milder applause that night, Jindal called on Republicans to "stop being the stupid party" and to "stop insulting the intelligence of voters." And yet, just a few years hence we find Piyush "Bobby" Jindal, a Rhodes scholar who once led his state's university system, engaging in the most regressive of politics as he begins his bid for the presidency.

Just days after the U.S. Supreme Court rejected bans on gay marriage, Jindal's spokesman Mike Reed said, "We believe the U.S. Constitution, Louisiana Constitution, Louisiana's Preservation of Religious Freedom Act, as well as our Executive Order prevents government from compelling individuals to violate sincerely held religious beliefs. We will continue to fight to protect religious liberty." In practice, this means that the governor's administration issued an executive order to protect clerks and state employees who have moral objections to gay marriage and don't feel comfortable handing out licenses to same-sex couples.

As Jindal runs for president in the Republican primary, he is resorting to those very same regressive and divisive tactics that only a few short years ago he inveighed against — so much so, in fact, that many observers were taken in by a satirical article that quoted Jindal as saying, "the Confederate Flag is part of my heritage." (In fact, the governor has skirted the issue of the flag altogether, telling reporters that "now's the time for mourning.") Given Jindal's penchant for refusing to identify as an Indian American, saying that he's "just American," while hanging a portrait of himself in his office looking remarkably white, and raging against the need for hyphenated identities, it wasn't a stretch to imagine Gov. Jindal actually claiming the Confederate flag.

(And that's before we even consider his new campaign slogan — "Tanned. Rested. Ready." — which has been met with hostility in recent days by many in the Indian American community.)

In an Op-Ed in February, Gov. Jindal called for "The End of Race," going "all-in" on the melting pot idea of America and beseeching us all to give up on our racial identities for the sake of a singular American one. This is a very convenient solution for a party that refuses to address racial inequity and injustice, which are, in fact, bedrock values in America. We haven't ended up with a racialized system where black and brown residents and citizens of the U.S. suffer greater levels of violence, discrimination and institutionalized inequity simply by chance. Our country was founded on, and is grounded in, the belief of a racialized American exceptionalism. It's a deeply rooted racism that allowed the founders to displace and murder so many of the Native and First Nations people here before them, and to uphold and entrench a system of chattel slavery while talking about American freedom and independence. Today, Jindal's statements about colorblindness are a disavowal of that legacy and its ongoing aftermath. We are a country in which your race, and gender, are key determinants in whether you're paid fairly, whether you are likely to be unjustly incarcerated, whether you are likely to be killed by police officers, whether your children will get a good education, whether you will get care when you get sick, whether your babies will be born healthy, and how long you will live.

We do not live in a "colorblind" country, no matter how much Gov. Jindal wishes it were so, nor how much many of us would like to. We live in a hyper-racialized one. Calling for "colorblindness" is a ridiculous solution to a centuries-old racial hierarchy that has devastating results for communities of color. Colorblindness is anti-blackness. Colorblindness is racism. The solutions we need involve looking that truth in the eye and changing racist systems and structures, not turning away and deriding the question itself.

TRUMP

Event for Donald T rump in Phoenix Will Draw Thousands // NYT // Nicholas Fandos – July 10, 2015

Donald J. Trump, the real estate mogul who has tied Republicans in knots in recent weeks with his comments on immigration, will roll into Phoenix on Saturday to address the issue again, just after the head of the Republican Party supposedly asked him to tone down his words on the issue.

The planned speech is already attracting a storm of attention. Even as city leaders have asked Mr. Trump "to stage his hate-filled circus" elsewhere, ticket requests have been so high the campaign has moved the speech from the swank Arizona Biltmore hotel to the convention center downtown.

"Mr. Trump certainly has a First Amendment right to bluster as much as he wants, and even to pander to our worst instincts in a sad attempt to win votes at the expense of hard-working, honorable, law-abiding Latinos," Daniel Valenzuela, a Democratic councilman and the city's vice mayor, said on Thursday. "However, we should draw the line at allowing him to use the Phoenix Convention Center — a public building funded by all of our taxpayers' dollars."

Mayor Greg Stanton, also a Democrat, issued a similar statement condemning Mr. Trump and his remarks, but assured that the city would not try to prevent the candidate from speaking.

Mr. Trump's spokeswoman, Hope Hicks, said on Friday that 4,500 tickets had already been reserved for the speech, 3,500 more than initially expected.

Mr. Trump will appear onstage with Joe Arpaio, the long-serving sheriff of surrounding Maricopa County, whose tactics to track down and deport illegal immigrants have drawn national attention and a federal conviction for racial profiling in 2013.

Mr. Trump has attracted sharp criticism from business and political leaders since asserting in his campaign announcement that those crossing the United States-Mexico border illegally include rapists and criminals. The remarks led several businesses, including Macy's, Univision and NBC, to cut their ties with the developer.

Republicans will be watching the weekend swing through the desert closely to see if Mr. Trump tempers his language on the issue. This week, Reince Priebus, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, was said to have urged Mr. Trump in a phone call on Wednesday to soften his tone on immigration.

Mr. Trump is expected to start the day on Saturday in Las Vegas, where he will speak at FreedomFest, an annual libertarian-leaning gathering that bills itself as the "world's largest gathering of free minds." Ms. Hicks said he will also hold a press conference after the event.

Donald Trump Lied to Us // Politico // Antonio Rijerino – July 10, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As I protested Thursday afternoon in front of the Old Post Office Pavilion on Pennsylvania Ave in Washington D.C.—the building Donald Trump is turning into a hotel a few blocks away from another historical building he wants to take over, the White House—I thought about a meeting I had with Trump at his headquarters in New York two years ago to discuss my organization's programs, including the Hispanic Heritage Awards.

Once the meeting was set, I called immigration activists Estuardo Rodriguez and Gaby Pacheco to gather some young DREAMers to crash the meeting and try and change The Donald's mind on immigration reform and the DREAM Act. I didn't mention the tactic to his assistant coordinating the meeting, and figured I'd simply sneak the DREAMers in as my associates. We were met with bewildered and not-so-happy faces at the top floor of Trump Tower, but to his credit, Trump waved off his concerned staff and graciously got up from his desk, welcomed us individually, and proceeded to have a civil dialogue about immigration reform and the important role immigrants have historically played in the United States.

For over an hour, Trump listened intently, asked thoughtful questions, and gave us examples of Latino employees he held in high regard. He then asked each of the DREAMers to describe their journeys, which were compelling and mirrored every value each American shares: education, work ethic, community, faith and family. After I summed up the conversation with "immigrants are a value proposition to America," he stood up, waved his hands in dramatic Donald fashion and exclaimed, "You've convinced me!"

It was a great moment, but that's what entertainers do. They know their audience and give them what they want.

And now, this shameless opportunist is giving a very different audience what they want to hear—hate speech. An audience that has made him a cultural icon, a viable candidate for president and what is most worrisome, an audience that is responding favorably to his message. The no-filter, in-your-face, celebrity billionaire is now in second place behind Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker in Iowa according to a Quinnipiac University survey and in New Hampshire according to a CNN-WMUR poll. Apology from Trump? No way.

Yesterday, in defense of his now-infamous statement on Mexicans, Trump said he was simply "defending the people of the United States." I applaud Univision for being the first to send a message to Trump by breaking off their relationship with the Miss Universe Organization. Then NBC, Macy's, NASCAR and others including this afternoon my friend Chef Jose Andres sent a message. But the loudest message is being sent by many Americans who have supported Trump's xenophobic diatribe. And that's my biggest concern - he continues to pander to an audience that can potentially take his hateful words and turn them into hateful action.

"When Mexico sends its people, they're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems. They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime. They're rapists." That was Trump talking about Mexicans (let's face it, Latinos) taking over the country.

"You are raping our women and taking over the country." That was Dylann Storm Roof, the 21 year-old racist who murdered nine worshippers in cold blood at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church. Sound familiar?

Hate speech is the gateway to hate action and at some point in his life, Roof heard hate talk. Did he take it seriously? Sounds like he did. His words nourish myths of brown invaders crossing the border with hopes of ruining America like an updated Orson Wells prank. Or in Roof's case, Black villains. This isn't simply a case of the PC police attacking a spirited American as Trump-backers Sen. Ted Cruz , R-Texas, and, yes, Rep. Steve King of Iowa say. (Let's not forget that King was the reigning champion of ludicrous remarks about immigrants way before Trump when in 2013 he blustered, "They weigh 130 pounds and with calves the size of cantaloupes because they're hauling 75 pounds of marijuana across the desert." King is still a Congressman representing a district in America where the majority supports his stances about immigrants.)

Attacks against Hispanics have more than tripled in a year, according to an official report released by the Bureau of Justice Statistics, The Hate Crime Victimization report. The Census-driven study shows an alarming rise in violent anti-Hispanic crime with anti-Hispanic crimes more likely in regions with higher immigration populations and new arrivals. Trump's words are dangerous not simply offensive and should be treated that way.

Trump: I'm still a birther // Politico // Nick Gass – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump is still not sure whether President Barack Obama was born in the United States.

In an interview with CNN's Anderson Cooper that aired Thursday night, the Republican presidential candidate said he was not that interested in talking about the issue, compared to other ones.

"Honestly, I don't want to get into it," Trump said.

Asked whether he thought Obama was born in the U.S., Trump responded: "I don't know. I really don't know. I don't know why he wouldn't release his records."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the interview, Trump also claimed that Hillary Clinton and John McCain were both birthers, and mentioned how he got Obama to release "something."

Obama released his long-form birth certificate in April 2011 after speculation from Trump and others that he might have been born elsewhere.

"Do you know that Hillary Clinton was a birther? She wanted those records and fought like hell. People forgot. You know that John McCain was a birther, wanted those records. They couldn't get the records. Hillary failed. John McCain failed," he said.

"Trump was able to get something. I don't know what the hell it was, but it doesn't matter. Because I'm off that subject. I'm about jobs, I'm about the military, I'm about doing the right thing for this country," he added.

Meanwhile, Trump signaled that his beef with the GOP establishment is far from over.
In an interview with Fox News' Sean Hannity on Thursday night, he speculated that Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus might have leaked details of their call to The Washington Post.

"I just don't know how the story got out. Nobody called us for verification, and honestly, I can't blame him, unless he gave out the story, which is possible. Probably, he did," Trump said.

Trump also again declined to rule out a third-party bid on Thursday, telling the Post that he "would have to see who the nominee is" should he fail in his quest for the Republican nomination.

Donald Trump's immigration stance dividing GOP in Arizona // AP // Bob Christie - July 11, 2015

PHOENIX (AP) - Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump is drawing larger crowds as he continues to criticize immigration policies in stark language that has revealed a deep divide between immigration hawks and moderates who are trying to avoid alienating Hispanic voters.

On Saturday, Trump was scheduled to campaign in Nevada and then in Arizona, a hub of immigrant and drug smuggling where the real estate developer and reality TV star has developed a large following. A rally in Phoenix was first planned at a posh resort that could handle about 1,000 guests, but organizers moved it to the city's convention center.

Trump's descriptions of Mexican immigrants bringing drugs and crime to the U.S. and being rapists have been roundly denounced as offensive. But his message about the broken border has resonated with many in the GOP, especially after an immigrant who was deported multiple times was accused of killing a woman on a San Francisco pier.

In Los Angeles for a rally Friday evening, Trump brought together people who said their relatives had been killed by immigrants in the U.S. illegally. "The illegals come in and the illegals killed their children," he said. "And we better get smart in the United States."

Arizona's major Chamber of Commerce group, both U.S. senators and a host of other GOP backers heaped their ire on Trump as the visit to Phoenix drew near. Republican Gov. Doug Ducey, who met presidential hopefuls Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker when they were in the state, is snubbing Trump. Protesters like the ones who greeted Trump in Los Angeles were expected.

Maricopa County's tough-on-immigration sheriff, Joe Arpaio, is set to speak before Trump at the convention center event.

Sen. Jeff Flake, who with Sen. John McCain sponsored a 2013 comprehensive immigration reform bill that stalled when it reached the House, said Trump's views "are coarse, ill-informed and inaccurate, and they are not representative of the Republican Party. As an elected Republican official, I'm disappointed the county party would host a speaker that so damages the party's image."

McCain, in a statement issued Friday, said, "If the Republican nominee for president does not support comprehensive immigration reform and border security policy, we have no chance of defeating Hillary Clinton and winning the White House in 2016."

But A.J. LaFaro, former head of the Maricopa County Republican Party, rejected those views. "With regards to McCain, Flake and the chambers, I don't respect any of those people anyway, so why would I care?" Lafaro said. "They're not representative of my conservative Christian values. I understand that Mr. Trump is saying what a lot of people here in the United States, I would like to think a majority of the people here in the Unites States, are thinking."

Trump's comments after a June 16 campaign kickoff speech helped revive immigration as a campaign issue but also prompted a series of cancellations from companies that do business with him or his companies.

Trump begins Saturday speaking in Las Vegas at the libertarian-minded gathering Freedom Fest. Nevada is 27 percent Hispanic and a key state for Republican candidates. His appearance at the conference, which bills itself as an egalitarian event for free-thinkers to discuss and celebrate liberty, was a recent addition to a lineup that includes Rubio on Friday night.

In Phoenix Speech, Donald Trump Won't Back Down On Immigration Comments // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – July 10, 2015

On the eve of a Phoenix rally that he predicts will draw 5,000 people to hear him speak about illegal immigration, Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump told Bloomberg's "With All Due Respect" that he has no intention of backing off the stands that have drawn him rebukes from some top-ranking political figures. "We have to stop illegal immigration," the billionaire businessman told interviewer Mark Halperin on Friday. "The country is being decimated by it.

Speaking about the wave of criticism he has received this week, he did not back down. "All I can do is talk the truth," Trump said. He declined to say that he has made any mistakes, or that anything had hurt his feelings. "No," Trump said, "because I'm a big boy."

Shortly after Trump made his comments, the senior senator of the state that he will be visiting for his Saturday rally issued a statement that, without naming the real estate mogul, clearly took issue with his rhetoric. "The circus currently surrounding the debate over illegal immigration sows division within our country and damages the Republican Party," said Arizona Senator John McCain, the Republican Party's 2008 presidential nominee. "If the Republican nominee for president does not support comprehensive immigration reform and border security policy, we have no chance of defeating Hillary Clinton and winning the White House in 2016."

Donald Trump on Campaign: It Really Is Intense

In his interview with Halperin, Trump acknowledged that the intensity of the presidential campaign had surprised him. When asked to name competitors in the Republican field whom he respects, he pointed to Texas Senator Ted Cruz and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, who have come out in defense of his comments.

At one point, Trump said that he felt the week, in which he has been a major focus of national political coverage, had improved his chances of winning, though later stated that he wasn't entirely sure.

He made much of an Economist/YouGov poll that placed him Thursday in the lead of the presidential field.

Trump has received a spate of negative attention since his remarks on immigrants coming from Mexico at his official presidential campaign announcement on June 16th. Businesses including Univision, NBC, Macy's, plus a number of golf tournaments and celebrity chefs have moved to distance themselves from him. The Washington Post reported Wednesday that Reince Priebus, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, called Trump that day to encourage him to tamp down inflammatory comments on immigration. Trump has characterized the call differently.

He said, "The politicians will never take us to the promised land," whereas he alone has the capacity to win the general election. "I am the only one that can beat Hillary Clinton," he said, "I will win the Hispanic vote."

He said that he will speak without a prepared text in his Arizona speech Saturday—"I have a very great memory"—and stressed how high the attendance will be in Phoenix, and at an event Friday evening in California.

"I believe in winning," Trump said.

Trump's Arizona Speech on Illegal Immigration Could Attract Thousands // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump is still talking immigration. And, unlike some in the Republican establishment, Arizona supporters seem to love it.

A speech "on illegal immigration and numerous other topics" by the real estate mogul and Republican presidential candidate had to be moved from a hotel to the Phoenix convention center "to accommodate the thousands of people expected to attend" the Saturday event.

The rally, which will also feature the city's anti-immigration Sheriff Joe Arpaio, already had 3,500 committed attendees Thursday evening when the campaign announced the venue change, according to the Arizona Republic newspaper. Arpaio has faced condemnation for his hard-line rhetoric on immigration and has been found by a federal judge to have violated the civil rights of Latinos.

Trump has faced weeks of fallout since he said in his presidential campaign announcement that some Mexican immigrants are "rapists." He has repeatedly doubled down on the assertion since then—and seen his polling numbers rise to top positions—even as he has lost business contracts and faced denunciations from both Democrats and Republicans.

The possibility of a Republican presidential candidate continuing to attack immigrants and stoking backlash among the large group of Latino voters angered Arizona Senator Jeff Flake, who said Trump's views don't reflect those of his party, according to the Washington Post. An immigration-reform supporter, Flake also asked the Republican Party of Maricopa County, which includes Phoenix, to withdraw its sponsorship of Trump's event, the Post said, but the party told the paper it is "thrilled" about the speech.

Arizona, a border state with a large immigrant population, has become an evolving case study on the subject. Arpaio's actions, along with those of former Governor Jan Brewer, who pushed through a tough anti-immigration law in 2010 only to have it struck down by the Supreme Court, have garnered nationwide attention. At the same time, the state's senators, Flake and John McCain, have supported immigration reform as Republican leaders worry about alienating Latino voters whom they hope to court, especially in 2016.

Trump's rhetoric was "offensive to not only Hispanic citizenry but other citizenry," McCain told MSNBC Thursday. "I guarantee you the overwhelming majority do not agree with his attitude that he has displayed towards our Hispanic citizens. We love them."

A spokesman for McCain also told Bloomberg that the senator and former Republican presidential nominee agreed with Flake's stance on the rally.

Don't Cry for the Trump Brand // Bloomberg // Caleb Melby – July 10, 2015

Judging by discounts on Donald Trump-labeled mattresses on Amazon.com, the billionaire's brand is hurting. But his overseas business partners don't seem to have noticed.

Trump's Macy's deal, and others, are gone after his incendiary remarks about Mexican immigrants. Still, selling shirts and ties was "a small business in terms of dollar volume," the real-estate mogul, reality TV star and Republican presidential contender said in a press release last week. His partners in international property licensing deals, a more lucrative business line, haven't joined in on the dog pile.

"So far as the Trump-Panchshil association is concerned, this stands unaffected and we will continue our association with the Trump Organization," Surbhi Gupta, a spokeswoman for Panchshil Realty, Trump's development partner in two condominium towers in Pune, India, said in an e-mail. The company declined to comment on Trump's remarks, "since we are unaware of the ground situation there, from a social and political context," the e-mail said.

Developers in the Philippines, Turkey, Panama, Canada, India, and Uruguay pay Trump millions in licensing fees to put his name on buildings he neither built nor owns, with an aim to sell condominiums and hotel rooms at higher prices. These deals provide nearly risk-less revenue streams for Trump, which, along with income from properties he owns, helps pay down existing debts and fund new projects.

"Mr. Trump is successful and wealthy and one of the great things about the empire he's built is that it's diverse—both geographically and across numerous business lines," said Alan Garten, general counsel for Trump. "It can withstand situations like this."

Construction cranes stand above Trump Towers Istanbul in Istanbul, Turkey.

In the United States, Trump's presidential campaign has so far prompted a stampede of disassociation: ESPN, NBCUniversal, NASCAR, Univision Holdings Inc. and Serta Inc. have cut ties with Trump after he described Mexican immigrants as criminals and rapists. A television company controlled by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim, the world's second richest man, announced Monday it would cancel a project with Trump. Chef José Andrés said Wednesday that he'd be backing out of a deal to open the flagship restaurant at an upcoming Trump hotel in Washington. And even the Federal Aviation Administration got in on the act, announcing Thursday that its renaming three aerial navigation posts that had Trump-related monickers.

That Trump's remarks aren't registering outside of North America doesn't surprise Nick Andrews, a London-based senior partner and crisis management expert at public relations firm Fleishman-Hillard Inc.

"He's better-known as a celebrity than as a businessman outside of the U.S.," Andrews said. "And outrageous things are exactly what celebrities often say. Most people don't follow U.S. politics that closely anyway."

The billionaire told Bloomberg his net worth was $10 billion on June 3. A document disclosed to reporters on June 16 put the number at $8.7 billion. The biggest line item, in his own estimation, is $3.3 billion for “real estate licensing deals, brand and branded developments.”

A Bloomberg assessment found Trump’s largest assets, including the commercial spaces at Trump Tower on Fifth Avenue in New York, the leaseholds to 40 Wall Street and Manhattan’s Niketown, a partnership with Vornado Realty Trust in two office buildings, and his collection of golf courses and resorts, to be worth at least $2.4 billion.

The Trump fallout closely resembles one experienced by cooking personality Paula Deen, said Melissa Agnes, cofounder and crisis management consultant at Agnes & Day. Deen’s contract with The Food Network wasn’t renewed in 2013 after revelations that she’d used racial slurs.

“She’ll never be back to the same degree, but she did come back in some form,” Day said. “Donald Trump has proven to be extremely resilient over the years.”

Donald Trump moves immigration rally to larger venue // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump's divisive comments about immigration have drawn a crowd, one bigger than even the blustery billionaire expected.

Trump announced late Thursday that his weekend rally in Phoenix, Arizona had been moved to the Phoenix Convention Center.

"Due to the overwhelming response for Saturday's Rally in Phoenix, Arizona the venue has been changed to accommodate the thousands of people expected to attend and the event will now take place at the Phoenix Convention Center," Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks said in a statement.

The former reality TV star's theatrics have helped vault him near the front of the pack of a wide field of big name Republican candidates. But they have also cost him a seemingly endless string of business relationships, as major brands like Macy's, NBC and others have broken off ties with him.

Speaking with CNN Wednesday, Trump could not say whether any illegal immigrants were working on his new Trump Hotel being constructed just blocks from The White House. The Washington Post reported that many illegal immigrants, as well as legal ones, were working on the project.

Arizona has been a hotbed for conservative anger over illegal immigration for years, making political stars out of figures like Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio.

The Republican Party of Maricopa County and Arpaio are hosting Trump on Saturday. But the state's Republican establishment is largely snubbing him.

Sen. John McCain, the party's 2008 nominee, Sen. Jeff Flake and Gov. Doug Ducey are all skipping Trump's rally. Flake told The Arizona Republic that Trump's views are "coarse, ill-informed, inaccurate, and they are not representative of The Republican Party."

The Republican Party, meanwhile, has struggled with the issue. Trump and Republican Party Chairman Reince Priebus spoke on the phone Wednesday and walked away with very different versions of what was actually said.

D.C.-Area Lawmakers Call For Boycott Of Donald Trump’s Businesses // HuffPo // Christine Conetta – July 10, 2015

Lawmakers and dozens of protesters came to the site of the future Trump International Hotel in the nation's capital Thursday to protest racist comments about the Latino community made by GOP presidential candidate and businessman Donald Trump and to call for a boycott of his businesses and products.

“He has put everyone into the category of rapists and drug dealers,” Maryland state Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D) said. “A position of hatred and xenophobia being expressed by a presidential candidate who wishes to lead this great nation in the future. How can that be tolerated?”

Politicians were wearing buttons that read "Dump Trump." Protesters showed up with signs that read “Trump is morally bankrupt,” and “Stand with immigrant workers.” They chanted, "We are in the fight.”

The backlash against the real estate mogul began after his presidential announcement speech last month, when Trump said Mexican immigration was bringing drugs, crime and "rapists" into the U.S.

A slew of companies, including Macy's and NBC, cut corporate ties with Trump after the comments. Most recently, Spanish-born celebrity chef José Andrés announced he will no longer open a flagship restaurant in Trump's Washington hotel.

Some D.C.-area lawmakers believe that boycotting businesses and products tied to Trump is the best way to fight back.

"We have huge economic power. Don't go to his hotels. Don't go to his restaurants. Boycott everything that's even closely related to Trump," Gutierrez said.

She even called on the Latino construction workers who are currently renovating the space to find another job, saying they don't need money that's "tainted" with hatred.

Another Democratic Maryland state delegate, Joseline Peña-Melnyk, echoed her fellow politician's sentiments.

"A lot of the people who work on this building are Latinos," she said. "He should not be the benefit of our hard work."

D.C. Shadow Sen. Paul Strauss (D), who also spoke at the protest, called on the federal government to stop the renovation of the Old Post Office Pavilion on Pennsylvania Avenue, the site of the future hotel.

"This is not a hotel that Mr. Trump built, bought or land that he owns. This is public space, federal land that belongs to the people of the United States of America," Strauss said. "We would like the Department of the Interior, who controls this scaffolding and who controls this space, to remove this logo, so long as it continues to be a symbol of hate speech."

Meanwhile, across the street from the protest, a small group gathered in support of Trump.

Alvin Whittaker, one of those present, admitted Trump "should've chosen his words differently," but doesn't think the comments will have "that much of an effect" in the long run.

Strauss disagrees and said he thinks continuing construction on the hotel is an insult to the diverse community that makes up the nation's capital.

"It's not just wrong and offensive, it's not something that we the taxpayers should be subsidizing in public space," Strauss said.

Donald Trump: Narcissist in Chief // HuffPo // Jim Wallis – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump is a real estate mogul for whom the word "egomaniac" is an understatement. But when America's narcissist in chief says he also wants to become commander in chief, the country pays attention. And that's what Trump wanted to have happen. Here is what Trump said in his announcement that he is running to add the presidency to his list of successes:

"When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best. ...They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people."

When challenged on the inaccuracy, outrageousness and viciousness of his remarks, "The Donald" characteristically doubled down and claimed to be the nation's only truth-teller, then attacked everyone who dared to challenge him.

Nice of Trump to assume, I thought, that some of the 11 million undocumented immigrants who live such vulnerable lives in this country might be good people. But obviously Trump doesn't know any of them.

Jesus talks about immigrants when he refers to welcoming "the stranger," and says that how we treat them is how we treat him (Matthew 25:31-46). But everything about Donald Trump's life indicates that Jesus is a stranger to him, too. (Parenthetically, could somebody ask why Liberty University, a Christian school, asked this lover of money, luxury, and power -- and hardly an exemplar of sexual morality -- to deliver a convocation address in 2012? I still can't understand that.)

In a long and remarkable interview with Trump on Wednesday, NBC's Katy Tur pointed out some real truths -- including that undocumented immigrants in America actually have much lower crime rates that our natural born American citizens. Trump just insulted her, telling the journalist that she was "naïve" and didn't know what she was talking about.

It was hard to keep count of the number of individual people Trump attacked during this insane interview, including the other Republican presidential candidates, conservative columnists who were embarrassed or dared to raise questions about the facts of all his "truth-telling," or the businesses that are severing ties with Trump one after another for his idiotic, vicious and divisive comments. Trump called all of his opponents "stupid" and kept saying that nobody else can compare to his astounding "success."

Trump's ethics are very clear here -- or rather, his non-ethics. Trump's pride in his own success literally "trumps" everything else -- shutting out reason, respect, experience, maturity, truth, civility and certainly any sense of human compassion or empathy.

While it is unlikely that Donald's favorite word ("TRUMP") will ultimately be painted on the side of Air Force One, there are some important political questions to raise about the "success" Trump is having in the Republican and primary state polls -- second only to Jeb Bush at the latest reading.

Why did it take weeks for the other Republican presidential candidates to distance themselves from -- much less denounce -- Trump's ugly words about Mexicans? Late and tepid at first, Republican pushback is slowly growing stronger from some, while others like Ted Cruz are "saluting" Trump for focusing on "illegal immigration" and smiling over his "colorful language."

Republican courage and conviction in response to Trump's clearly racial comments has been sadly lacking, as has the party's alleged concern to become a bigger tent that can reach out to racial minorities and American Hispanics in particular. Why?

Because Donald Trump is a salesman. And that's really all he is. And the only product Trump really sells is the only thing he really believes in -- himself. He's made another calculation, another deal, that he can have success with a certain political segment of America. I think Trump has decided to reach down, and I do mean down, to the hard core of the Republican base, which is white, angry, and very right-wing -- a constituency that is especially active and indeed overrepresented in the primary phase of every presidential campaign.

Trump reached out to that same group in the last presidential election campaign when he decided to lead the "birther" movement challenging whether Barack Obama was an American or was really an "other" and not one of "us." That racial appeal against a black president was the very worst of American sentiments -- and is consistent with Trump's latest attack on immigrants from Mexico and other "foreign" people not like "us."

Trump certainly acts and sounds like a racial bigot. But whether he really is or not, there is a much deeper issue here -- Donald Trump is a salesman who sees that racial bigotry still works with a core base of the Republican Party.

Ever since the Democrats lost the south to the Republicans because of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Republican Party, which dominates the entire south, has faced a very deep ethical crisis and has some difficult choices to make. That hardcore white southern base of the Republican Party wants to be a white party, and the leadership of the Republican Party still panders to it. What's also clear is that Republican presidential candidates are afraid of that hardcore right-wing white base of their party--especially in the primary season.

That is exactly what happened to immigration reform, which passed in a bi-partisan way in the Senate in 2013 but was vetoed in the House of Representatives by the many Republican districts that have now been "white-washed" -- meaning designed to have no significant minority voters.

When members of the House Republican leadership met with several evangelical and Catholic leaders in 2014, they promised to our faces that they would bring serious immigration reform to the House floor for a vote. They failed to live up to that promise, deciding instead to cave to their white-washed right wing base. Some Republican members admitted to us that many of their constituents were expressing clear racial biases.

I believe Donald Trump is deliberately and directly appealing to that white racist core of the Republican Party, and that's why he is currently number two in the Republican polls. He is selling racism and he is winning.

I know and trust Republicans and conservative friends who reject such racism -- want to purge it from their party -- and long for a wider, more diverse Republican Party for the future. Indeed, the Republican votes, and even impassioned speeches, to take down the Confederate flag in South Carolina show a tale of two Republican parties -- and that is a hopeful contrast to the racist elements of the party to which Trump is selling himself.

It is time for them to stand up to Donald Trump and what he is selling.

They not only have my challenge -- they have my prayers.
Donald Trump Could Seriously Damage The Real Republican Efforts To Reach Latinos // BuzzFeed // Adrian Carrasquillo – July 10, 2015

No Democrats are quoted in this story.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's not that they don't want to be. There is no topic that fills them more with unbridled glee, outrage, or fake outrage than Donald Trump. His antics help Democrats who want the GOP to be seen as xenophobic and unable to discuss issues that deal with Hispanics, like immigration, in a respectful, measured manner.

But for those who have worked to improve the GOP brand with Hispanics, the last month of the Trump comedy spectacular, in which he has called Mexicans criminals and rapists and doubled down on those comments, has been deeply unsettling. More importantly, they worry it risks further damaging the party with Latinos and eroding gains they've already made — even as candidates like Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio put them in a potentially even better place.

Republicans have made real and concerted efforts, over a period of time, to engage Hispanics after 2012. The Republican National Committee's Growth and Opportunity project has been well-funded, successful in key 2014 races, and is ramping up for the presidential cycle, with the largest chunk of spending going toward Hispanic outreach.

Latinos on the left worry about the LIBRE Initiative, a Koch-funded project that's doing real on-the-ground work in Hispanic churches and communities, all while espousing conservative principles in literature and on Latino media. GROW Elect, an effort started in California and expanding to Southwest states, helped dozens of Latino Republicans get elected in 2014, often in Hispanic districts.

The goal with these projects is clear: showing that the Republican Party is not the enemy. And Trump, these Republicans worry, is ruining that.

"The greatest harm is to Trump himself — he says he can win the Latino vote, he's kidding himself," said Ruben Barrales, who leads GROW Elect and is the son of Mexican immigrants. "Now young Hispanics will be smashing Donald Trump piñatas at their birthday parties in celebration. He fails to recognize the harm on the Trump brand. But it's damaging not just to Republican Latino efforts, but to Republican efforts as a whole."

Barrales pointed to the campaign for California's Proposition 187, which took aim at undocumented immigrants and featured harsh ads about Latinos, as a moment when Latinos decided the GOP was against them.

Trump hasn't just dominated the mainstream media, but has been viewing nightly on Univision and Telemundo, the Spanish-language giants that reach Hispanic homes across the country.

"Trump has turned out to be Sheriff Joe Arpaio's replacement as the principal villain in what has practically become a new nightly telenovela on Univision and Telemundo," said MRC Latino's director, Ken Oliver-Méndez, whose organization monitors Spanish-language media's inclusion of conservative viewpoints.

Since his announcement, Oliver-Méndez said, Trump has been mentioned at least once or twice in practically every newscast with very few exceptions on the three major networks MRC Latino monitors: Univision, Telemundo, and MundoFox.

"It's a distraction, a major distraction," said LIBRE's executive director, Daniel Garza. "It's not the narrative you want driving the national news." But he said Trump has created a realignment within the immigration debate, where the bombastic businessman represents the extreme fringe and other presidential candidates are able to emerge as the adults in the room.

Still, Republicans have not just had to comment on Trump, but some have had to do so repeatedly. When Trump retweeted a comment by someone saying that Jeb Bush has to like the "Mexican illegals" because of his wife, Bush was forced to say, "You can love the Mexican culture, you can love your Mexican-American wife and also believe that we need to control the border."

Izzy Santa, former director of Hispanic media at the RNC, said Trump is the only person who disregards that tone, and rhetoric matters.

"Trump's comments hurt the Republican field for the next cycle because it portrays Republicans as out of touch when it comes to understanding Hispanic culture and the immigration debate," she said.

Republican officials have also pushed back against Trump. RNC Chair Reince Priebus reportedly called Trump and told him to "tone it down." House Speaker John Boehner condemned the use of immigration as a "political football."

Still, people maintain all's not lost. A prominent Hispanic operative advising a Republican campaign called Trump irrelevant and said he doesn't reflect the views of the party.

A Latino at a different campaign said the good news for Republicans is that it's 2015, not 2016. The operative said candidates who have had to engage Latinos in the past, like Marco Rubio, Jeb Bush, Rick Perry, and Chris Christie, know that they have to speak to Hispanic voters, who will be paying attention to how they respond to Trump and the immigration issue. "I think it's a defining moment for the Republican candidates on where they stand in regards to these comments," the strategist said, adding that Ted Cruz's embrace of Trump "has disqualified him as a serious general election candidate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump, relishing his role as presidential troll, has made it clear that he isn't going anywhere.

On Saturday, Trump will hold a "Stand Up To Illegal Immigration" joint event with Arpaio in Arizona. The question now for GOP presidential candidates is even if they come out stronger to repudiate him, how can they stop Trump from being Trump, all the while representing their party?

Barrales said just as Republicans were leaders most recently in South Carolina to help take down the Confederate flag, they need to be here with Trump as well.

One prominent Latino operative who advises campaigns laid out the stakes, saying continued comments and a focus on Trump only endangers the work Republicans have been putting in for the last few years.

"Trump's divisive rhetoric and harsh tone is undermining those efforts and could potentially block Republican's path to the White House in 2016," the operative said.

Donald Trump Wanted T o Make Charlie Rangel HUD Secretary In 1999 // BuzzFeed // Christopher Massie – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump said in November 1999 that, if elected president, he wanted to make Charles Rangel, the Democratic Congressman from New York, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

At the time, real estate magnate was considering running for president as a member of the Reform Party. Asked by CNN anchor Wolf Blitzer if he'd "given some thought to a potential Trump Cabinet," Trump mentioned Rangel as his top choice to lead HUD.
"Well, let's go — like HUD," Trump said. "I think Charlie Rangel is a terrific guy. He's a congressman from New York. He has been a powerful guy. Now the Democrats are not in power, but I think he'd be terrific at HUD."

Rangel has been a member of the House since 1971 and is still in office. His website touts his record promoting affordable housing in New York's 13th Congressional District.

Other Trump Cabinet picks would have included Colin Powell as secretary of state and General Electric CEO Jack Welch as treasury secretary. Trump said that John McCain would be "a very interesting candidate" for secretary of defense.

In the interview, Trump also predicted that, if he won the Reform Party's nomination, he would "take more votes away from the Democrats" than the Republicans in the general election. He ended up withdrawing from the race in February 2000.

T rump's Got the GOP by the Balls // Daily Beast // Michael Tomasky – July 10, 2015

Deflating as it is, the likely Donald Trump scenario is this: He burns hot for a little while longer; he says something really out there in the first debate that roils up the base but makes Reince Priebus and Karl Rove break out in canker sores; but by the time of the baseball playoffs maybe, his act gets old, and somebody else becomes the Herman Cain of October. Then, next year, the primaries will start, and he'll have to get votes. He's not going to be all that competitive in Iowa, so it's New Hampshire where he'll need to deliver something. And if he doesn't, he'll just go away.

That's the pattern anyway. I seem to recall that at this point in 2011, Michele Bachmann had a pretty good head of steam going. So maybe we shouldn't get too overheated about him.

But Trump is different from Bachmann, and even from fellow entrepreneur Cain, in one major respect: He doesn't give a crap about the Republican Party. He cares about Trump. And don't forget he has the power singlehandedly to make Hillary Clinton president. He knows it, and you better believe Priebus knows it, and it is this fact that establishes a power dynamic between Trump and the GOP in which Trump totally has the upper hand and can make mischief in the party for months.

How does he have the power to elect Clinton all by himself? By running as an independent. Two factors usually prevent candidates who lose nominations from running as independents. One, they lack the enormous amount of money needed to pursue that path (pay the lawyers to get them on 50 state ballots, etc.). Two, they have a sense of proportion and decency, and they figure that if primary voters rejected them, it's time to go home.

Well, Trump has the dough and lacks the decency. In an interview this week with Byron York, he left the door open a crack to such a candidacy. And that would be all it would take. Given his fame and name recognition, he'd likely hit the polling threshold needed to qualify for the fall debates. And with that kind of exposure, he'd do well—enough. All he needs to get is 5 percent of the vote in Florida, Ohio, Virginia, and Colorado, and the Republican, whoever it is, is sizzled. Another electoral landslide.

How does he have the power to elect Clinton all by himself? By running as an independent.
The question is would he, and the answer is who knows? To York, he expressed awareness of the obvious drawbacks, pointing to the spoiler role he says Ross Perot played in 1992: "I think every single vote that went to Ross Perot came from [George H.W.] Bush…Virtually every one of his 19 percentage points came from the Republicans. If Ross Perot didn't run, you have never heard of Bill Clinton." He is—shocker—wrong about this, but what matters for present purposes is that he believes it, so maybe that means he wouldn't follow through.

But he is an unpredictable fellow. Suppose Priebus and the GOP piss him off in some way, and he thinks the hell with these losers. Suppose he decides—and don't doubt the importance of this—that an independent run would be good for the Trump brand in the long run. And suppose he doesn't actually mind so much the idea of Hillary Clinton being president. We already know he retains a soft spot for old Bill. And he donated to Hillary Clinton's senatorial campaign.

All that's speculative. But even in the here and now this dynamic has consequences. It means the GOP can't afford to offend Trump. This is why Priebus's spokesman characterized the chairman's Wednesday evening phone chat with Trump as "very respectful."

And it's why the other candidates' criticisms of him have been a little, ah, restrained. Politicians aren't always real smart about any number of things, but one thing in my experience that they almost always have a very keen sense of is risk. Members of Congress, for example, generally know exactly what percentage of their electorate they're going to sacrifice by casting X vote. Jeb Bush's Trump criticisms are muted because he has a lot to lose by offending Trump and his supporters. Chris Christie, who's little more than an asterisk in the polls, has less to lose, so he's willing to be a bit more blunt. Same goes for Rick Perry.

We'll see if Trump has developed that politician's sense of risk. If he goes too far, one or certainly two more equivalents of "Mexican rapists," it'll be open season on him. He's at a point of maximum leverage right now, and if he wants to stay there, he's got to tuck it in about 10 or 15 percent and start employing the kind of racialized euphemisms that are not only tolerated but celebrated within the Republican Party—build the damn fence, no amnesty, Al Qaeda is storming the mainland through Obama's porous border, etc. That way, he'll hang around. And he'll build enough of a following that the threat of a viable independent candidacy remains a real one. And that is Trump's trump card. And it makes Reince Priebus a very nervous man.

Donald Trump, immigration and the GOP // Chicago Tribune // Editorial Board – July 10, 2015

Many of the candidates have been wary of staking out a position on an issue that has divided Americans for decades. Too bad.

The trick for Republicans is to appeal to their conservative base in the primary season without alienating the Latinos who are increasingly important in November. In 2012, Barack Obama got more than 70 percent of the Latino vote.

The takeaway from that election, supposedly, was that Republicans needed to get serious about immigration reform, including addressing the status of the 11 million — no, it's not 34 million, Mr. Trump — who are in the country illegally.

But here we are at the dawn of another presidential election cycle with no solution in sight, and a lot of ducking and weaving from candidates who don't want to take a position now that could hurt them later.

There's no ambiguity in Trump's stance, and so far it hasn't hurt him in the polls. (His business dealings are another matter.) On Thursday, for example, an Economist/YouGov poll had Trump first among 16 candidates, with 15 percent of the GOP vote nationwide.

That emboldened the hardliners to chime in when Trump blamed lax border security for the murder of a San Francisco woman. The man accused of shooting her had slipped into the country from Mexico and had been sent back five times.

To Trump, that's more evidence that the U.S. is a "dumping ground" for Mexico's most violent criminals. He's promised to build an "impenetrable" wall along the border, and send Mexico the bill.

The candidates have been careful to distance themselves from Trump's inflammatory remarks — "They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists"— while calling for more border security or stricter enforcement of existing laws.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some have focused on the role of "sanctuary cities," such as San Francisco (and Chicago), where local law enforcement officials do not routinely detain undocumented immigrants for the feds. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry both called for withholding federal funding from cities with sanctuary policies.

You don't have to agree with Trump to welcome a discussion that will help sort the throw-them-all-out candidates from the ones who recognize that a broader fix is in order.

The last thing Republicans need is a replay of the 2012 primaries, in which one candidate (Herman Cain) called for a 20-foot electrified border fence and another (Perry) was scorned for suggesting that kids who were brought to the U.S. by their parents ought to be allowed to stay and go to college.

Mitt Romney, the eventual nominee, favored a policy harsh enough to encourage undocumented immigrants to "self-deport." Look what that got him.

You need a score card to keep up with the shifting positions of this year's candidates.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio was one of the authors of an excellent bipartisan measure that passed the Senate in 2013. The bill balanced border security with a more flexible visa system and a path to earned citizenship for most undocumented immigrants. But Rubio backed away from that approach, which got nowhere in the House.

Bush proposed a legal status short of earned citizenship as part of a comprehensive fix in his 2013 book, "Immigration Wars: Forging an American Solution." Before and after that, he favored a path to citizenship.

It's frankly hard to tell where either of them stands at the moment, though we'd argue that they've both been in the ballpark most of the time. We'd also argue that flexibility isn't such a bad thing if it gets us to a solution.

Compromise is one thing. Waffling is another. How are voters supposed to tell the difference?

Republicans have to find a way forward on immigration reform. The candidate who can make that happen is the one who's willing to grab the megaphone from Trump, and lead.

Trump ups the ante on immigration, unfazed by criticism and protests // LA Times // Katie Linthicum, Richard Winton and Kurtis Lee – July 10, 2015

Donald Trump brought his Republican presidential campaign to Los Angeles on Friday, unrepentant over his inflammatory comments about Latino immigrants that have drawn national ire and pushback from businesses, celebrities and fellow party members.

In two appearances Friday, Trump drew praise from fellow opponents of illegal immigration and criticism from protesters angered by his comments that Mexican immigrants were drug dealers and rapists.

The business mogul seemed unfazed, even predicting he would win the Latino vote.

“When it’s all said and done, I will win the Hispanic vote,” Trump said at his first campaign stop at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel. “I will win the Hispanic vote because I’m going to create jobs. I’m going to take them away from China.”

Trump appeared with several opponents of illegal immigration, including those whose family members were killed in accidents and crimes by assailants alleged to be in the country illegally. One of them was Brenda Sparks, who said her son was killed in a traffic collision with an immigrant in the country illegally.

She praised Trump for having “the guts to say what millions are thinking.”

"My taxpayer dollars are paying for all these illegals and their children,” Sparks said. “I’ve lost my child; how much more do I have to give?”

Don Rosenberg, whose son was killed in 2010 by an immigrant from Honduras who came to the country illegally but had been given temporary legal status, said his appearance at the event was not an endorsement of Trump's campaign. But he said he appreciated the candidate putting immigration at the center of the 2016 presidential race.

"I think that what he said he could have articulated better, but the general premise of what he said is true," Rosenberg said. "I’m happy that he brought the subject up because it needs to be talked about. Every crime an immigrant commits is an additional crime. Every crime they commit is a crime they wouldn't have committed otherwise."

Trump drew a decidedly different reaction in Brentwood, where he addressed a group of entertainment industry conservatives at the Luxe Sunset Boulevard Hotel.

Hours before Trump's arrival, protesters began packing the corner of Sunset Boulevard and Church Lane, holding American flags and "Dump Donald Trump" signs. They yelled anti-Trump chants through megaphones in Spanish and English as some drivers of passing cars honked in support.

By 7 p.m., the crowd had swelled to more than 120. Organizers with the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles brought Trump pinatas stuffed with trash -- symbolizing, they said, the mogul's incendiary rhetoric.

Hilda Ramirez, a West Los Angeles resident, said Trump should keep his mouth shut. "When you open your mouth, a mess spills out.... You talk nothing but trash. Don't back Donald Trump!" she yelled through a megaphone.

Joshua Gonzalez, a 21-year-old Calabasas resident holding a sign depicting Trump in a pink wig, said he came to the protest to send a message that Californians won't put up with "his out-of-control antics."

He said Trump was hurting the Republican Party, which might otherwise appeal to conservative Latinos who believe in education and hard work.

"Donald Trump creates division among the races in California and across the nation," Gonzalez said. "He is trying to exploit divisions."

But about 20 feet away, about 40 Trump supporters gathered, many wearing red, white and blue and carrying signs reading, "Trump Tells the Truth." A man in a megaphone yelled, "Viva Donald Trump!"

At times protesters and supporters got in each other's faces. One man jabbed his "Trump for President" sign at protesters as a woman yelled back, "Racist!" and "Trump isn't welcome here!" Protest organizers and a security officer tried to keep the sides apart.

By 7:55 p.m., the protesters had disbanded -- missing Trump by a few minutes, as he was driven to the hotel entrance in a black SUV with two bodyguards. He was to speak to the Friends of Abe group, founded a decade ago by Hollywood actors including Gary Sinise and Clint Eastwood, which holds monthly gatherings with Republican speakers.

This election cycle the group has hosted several GOP presidential hopefuls such as Ben Carson, Carly Fiorina and Mike Huckabee. The events are private and not publicly advertised.

Even amid criticism from some party leaders and companies, such as NBC Universal and Macy's, that have cut business ties with him, Trump has escalated his anti-immigrant rhetoric since his campaign announcement last month.

In recent days, Trump has focused his criticism on San Francisco's sanctuary policies, under which a Mexican immigrant in the country illegally was released and subsequently charged with murder in a high-profile shooting July 1.

Immigration agents had asked the San Francisco Sheriff's Department to hold Juan Francisco Lopez Sanchez, but the county's policies prohibit law enforcement officers from transferring immigrants to federal authorities without a criminal warrant.

On Friday, Trump repeated his accusation that Mexico is sending "criminals" to the United States and pledged to build a wall along the southern U.S. border to keep them out.

"People came into the country illegally and killed their children," Trump said, referring to the families who stood alongside him at the Beverly Hills event. "The illegals come in and the illegals kill their children."

He acknowledged he has become a lightning rod, saying the head of the Republican National Committee called him recently and ask him to "tone it down."

"I don't want to tone down important issues," Trump said. "I'm so proud of myself for bringing this issue to bear, to the forefront.

"I must be doing something right," he added. "I'm No. 1 in the polls."

Indeed, several recent polls have showed Trump among the top GOP candidates. This week his campaign announced that an event Saturday in Phoenix with controversial Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio was being moved to a bigger location to accommodate more people.

But not all Republicans have embraced Trump's appearance. U.S. Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Arizona) called on the Maricopa County Republican Party not to host Trump.

"Donald Trump's views are coarse, ill-informed and inaccurate, and they are not representative of the Republican Party," Flake said in a statement. "As an elected Republican official, I'm disappointed the county party would host a speaker that so damages the party's image."

Still, some leaders of the local GOP have said they will welcome the real-estate mogul.

"In Maricopa County we believe deeply in Reagan's 11th commandment that 'Thou shall not speak ill of any other Republican,'" the party said in a statement. "It is disappointing when our Republican leaders do not share that same commitment to party unity and teamwork."

Did Scott Walker's Twitter Account Get Ahead of His Campaign? // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 10, 2015

In what appears to be either a premature presidential announcement or a tease of one to get attention, the Twitter account of Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin sent word on Friday afternoon that he was seeking the 2016 Republican nomination for president.

Mr. Walker, who has been all but officially running for president for months, is scheduled make "an announcement" on Monday afternoon in Wisconsin about whether he will seek the White House. Friday's tweet said, "Scott is in. Are you? Join our team today" with a photo of Mr. Walker the features the words "SCOTT WALKER IS RUNNING FOR PRESIDENT." Mr. Walker usually signs his personal tweets with his initials, but "SKW" is not on this one.

Asked if the tweet constituted an official announcement, a spokeswoman for Mr. Walker replied by e-mail, "Stay tuned for Governor Walker's announcement on Monday at 5pm CT."

Is Scott Walker's Crossover Appeal Real? Turnout Data Raises Questions // WSJ // Dante Chinni – July 10, 2015

A major part of Republican Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's appeal, he reminds supporters in every stump speech, is his proven ability to win the governor's mansion in a highly-contested, Democratic-leaning state.

But with Mr. Walker set to launch his presidential candidacy on Monday, a closer look at the numbers shows a more complicated picture.

Results from four recent elections in Wisconsin suggest that while Mr. Walker can win in a low-turnout, off-year election, he could have more trouble in a presidential year, when more voters — especially more minority and young voters — come to the polls.

Since 2010, Mr. Walker has won three statewide elections, including the June 2012 recall, in a state that has not voted for a Republican presidential candidate since Ronald Reagan in 1984. On the surface, that is an impressive accomplishment that Mr. Walker's supporters say points to his ability to bring traditionally Democratic states into the Republican column in 2016. In fact, Mr. Walker's performance in the state looks a great deal like Democratic President Barack Obama's.
But those percentages only tell part of the story. Mr. Walker has never been tested by an electorate as large and diverse as that which turns out for presidential elections.

Compare the turnout in the races Mr. Walker won to the last two presidential races in the state.

Those are big differences. The drop between 2012's presidential race and the 2014 gubernatorial was more than

600,000 votes – about 20%.

And there is more to the difference than simply the number of voters. Years of voter turnout data show Democrats are simply less likely than Republicans to vote in non-presidential elections, and that has been a big advantage for Mr. Walker. Look at Milwaukee County, the state's biggest Democratic stronghold.

In Milwaukee since 2008, the average decline in turnout from presidential to non-presidential years has been more than 115,000 votes – 24%. In the state's biggest GOP stronghold, Waukesha County, the falloff has been far less dramatic – only about 37,000 votes, or 16%.

That trend carries across the state. The counties that went for Mr. Obama in 2012 saw a drop of about 23% in the number of votes cast in the 2014 governor's race. The counties that voted for Republican Mitt Romney in 2012 saw a drop-off of just under 20%.

In total, the 35 Wisconsin counties that voted for Mr. Obama in 2012 accounted for 57% of the vote drop-off between the presidential election and the 2014 gubernatorial campaign. And Mr. Walker won 20 of those counties in 2014.

Taken together, these numbers suggest Mr. Walker's appeal to Democratic voters may be overstated, and that his ability to win in a Democratic-leaning state may be more the result of his timing than his ability to reach swing voters. His biggest advantage may have been that he was facing a smaller electorate.

Should he get the Republican nod in 2016, Mr. Walker would not have that off-year election advantage. He would be going against the bigger presidential voter pool, and his strength in Wisconsin and elsewhere could be very different.

Scott Walker tweets his presidential run // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 10, 2015

Scott Walker is running for president, he announced in what appeared to be an unintentional tweet on Friday.

The Wisconsin governor isn't expected to formally announce until Monday, but on Friday afternoon, the Republican appeared to tweet a black-and-white image of himself waving onstage that read, "Scott Walker is running for president."

The tweet was not available on his timeline later in the afternoon, but was still viewable under his account.

"Stay tuned for Governor Walker's announcement on Monday at 5pm CT," spokeswoman AshLee Strong said in an email, when asked for comment.

Late Friday, a Twitter spokesperson said, "We're looking into today's issue, and we've determined the Walker team was not at fault."

If the tweet was unintentional, Walker wouldn't be the first candidate to scoop himself on his own announcement: Earlier this year, a video of Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson saying that he was announcing his candidacy aired the night before his announcement — something he wasn't planning on, he said at the time.

Scott Walker's timely abortion victory // Politico // Kyle Cheney – July 10, 2015

Wisconsin Republicans gift-wrapped an Iowa talking point for Gov. Scott Walker this week, sending abortion restrictions to his desk just days ahead of his presidential announcement.

The legislation, which would ban nearly all abortions after 20 weeks, cleared the state Assembly Thursday on a party-line vote, four days before the governor intends to launch his presidential bid. Walker has indicated that he'll sign the measure.

Walker's win on the issue comes as he's introducing himself to Iowa Republicans, who tend to favor social conservative candidates in their first-in-the-nation caucuses. It also comes amid questions Walker has faced on the right about his commitment to conservative causes, like opposing same-sex marriage and limiting abortions.

Prominent anti-abortion advocates and social conservatives signaled that Walker's signature on the measure, which could come as early as Friday, would be a welcome gesture to kick off his campaign.

"Those things will basically give him that Good Housekeeping Seal, so to speak," said Bob Vander Plaats, president of the Family Leader, an influential conservative group in Iowa.

"I think it's great timing to benefit him," added Marilyn Musgrave, a former congresswoman and a leader of the conservative Susan B. Anthony List.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Twenty-week abortion bans have been enacted in 11 states, according to the Guttmacher Institute, though in at least two — Arizona and Idaho — they've been struck down by courts. Proponents contend the bans are meant to prevent abortions after the point at which an unborn baby can feel pain.

Abortion rights advocates – backed up by the American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists – contend that the science on pain doesn't justify the 20-week cutoff. The bill awaiting Walker's signature makes no exception for babies conceived by rape or incest, but it does allow doctors to act — while attempting to save the life of the baby — if any immediate health risks to the mother arise.

Republican leaders in Madison insisted the bill's timetable had nothing to do with Walker's ambitions. Yet, after Walker first publicly supported a 20-week ban in March, the legislature raced the bill to the governor's desk using a series of procedural shortcuts, from an expedited hearing process to an "extraordinary" July session of the Assembly to ensure the bill got to Walker ahead of his July 13 announcement.

State Sen. Mary Lazich, a Republican who said she used to carpool with Walker in the 1990s when Walker was in the Assembly, told POLITICO she led the drive for the measure – knowing that Walker would support it but without explicitly coordinating with his office, though she said it did occasionally come up in conversation.

"We're on the same wavelength, the same plane," she said.

State Rep. Jesse Kremer, who sponsored an identical bill in the Assembly, acknowledged that legislative leaders may have sped up the timetable, though he said he wasn't privy to any machinations on Walker's behalf. He added, however, that Walker's sudden interest in the legislation seemed like a shift.

"A year ago, he actually wasn't really interested in something like this and he changed his mind," Kremer said. "We probably wouldn't have brought it up if we knew he wouldn't [sign it]."

Walker has repeatedly pointed to his efforts to crack down on abortion — from defunding Planned Parenthood to requiring women to receive ultrasounds before undergoing the procedure to toughening requirements for doctors who perform abortions — as he inches closer to a presidential bid. But conservatives were angered last year when, in the midst of a tight re-election fight, Walker aired an ad calling a woman's decision on abortion "agonizing. And he borrowed language from abortion rights advocates in his message: "The bill leaves the final decision to a woman and her doctor."

"I didn't like the ad. You're using the other side's garbage and it's not helpful," said Penny Nance, president of Concerned Women for America, a conservative policy group.
Yet Nance said Walker's position on abortion was never in doubt. Though she and other conservatives still have issues with some of Walker's advisers who don't hail from the most conservative corners of the party, she says the governor has taken more steps to curb abortion than just about anyone else in the GOP field. The 20-week ban, Nance said, would just be additional confirmation.

"We're thrilled and happy that he's going to do this," she said. "This is policy whose time has come."

Oops: Scott Walker Scoops Himself Via Twitter // Bloomberg // John McCormick – July 10, 2015

The word broke late Friday afternoon on Scott Walker's official Twitter account: "Scott is in. Are you? Join our team today," along with picture captioned, "Scott Walker is running for president."

While the news wasn't particularly surprising — the Wisconsin governor has begun raising money through an exploratory presidential campaign committee and has conducted an elaborate pre-announcement vamping via social media — it did seem strange that he would deliver such momentous news late on a Friday afternoon, just two days before the Republican hopeful is scheduled to make a formal announcement in Wisconsin Monday.

Via e-mail, AshLee Strong, a spokeswoman for Walker's political operation, declined to say if the tweet, an be viewed in a web browse but it doesn't appear on his account's Twitter feed was intentional or accidental. "Stay tuned for Governor Walker's announcement Monday," she said.

Several hours later, Twitter released a statement: "We're looking into today's issue and we've determined that the Walker team is not at fault," it said.

"Scott is in. Are you? Join our team today," Walker said in a tweet accompanied by an image of him waving with the headline: "Scott Walker is running for president. Join the team."

The tweet was later deleted.

There was some question over whether Walker's tweet was inadvertently sent. A Twitter representative said in an emailed statement, "We're looking into today's issue, and we've determined the Walker team was not at fault."

Walker, a two-term governor of Wisconsin, is to announce his bid for the Republican presidential nomination on Monday in Waukesha, Wisconsin.

The Walker team did not immediately respond to a request for comment. But Walker's communications director, Kirsten Kukowski, tweeted what appeared to be a response to media questions about the Walker tweet.

"Happy Friday everyone, stay tuned for @ScottWalker's announcement at 5 p.m. CT Monday in Waukesha, WI," she said.

Scott Walker spars with GOP ahead of 2016 launch // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 10, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker's famous brawls with Democrats and labor unions put him on the political map.

But squabbles with fellow Republicans here at the Wisconsin Statehouse are tripping him up as he prepares to formally enter the 2016 presidential race on Monday.

Republicans in Madison have worked overtime in recent weeks to find an elusive deal for the state's two-year, $73 billion budget. Just a few months ago, Walker optimistically said he would announce his White House plans after he finished all-important budget negotiations. But fights among Republicans over road funding, cuts in higher education spending and a new arena for the Milwaukee Bucks delayed talks to a point where Walker had to tamp down that expectation a few weeks ago.

With just five days left before the Walker announcement, the legislature inched toward a deal on Wednesday when the Senate narrowly backed the measure, sending it to the state Assembly for final approval.

And in a rare move that has his fiscal conservative backers frustrated, Walker has been pushing hard to find $250 million for a new arena to keep the Milwaukee Bucks from moving. That effort to include the Bucks deal as part of the bigger budget was scrapped amid concerns that GOP leaders in the legislature would not be able to find enough support from their rank-and-file.

For any governor running for president, it's a vexing problem. Walker's brand, like the other governors seeking the White House, is built on the promise that running their home state effectively makes them fit to lead the nation in a way that no senator ever could. But the national focus on Walker, who is scheduled to formally announce his White House bid Monday in the Milwaukee suburb of Waukesha, has shifted recently from what he accomplished between 2011 and 2014 to the intraparty struggles he has faced more recently.

Charles Franklin, a veteran Wisconsin pollster and director of the Marquette Law School Poll, said Walker might be a victim of his own success after clearing a litany of top conservative goals from the shelf in Wisconsin. The list includes starting a statewide school voucher program, privatizing the state's economic development arm (albeit one plagued questionable decisions currently) and making Wisconsin a concealed carry state.

"If you listed all of the things that have passed during Walker's tenure it's a long and impressive list," Franklin said. "The big and bold thing was Act 10 (labor measures from 2011), but to me all of the small ball things matter."

Walker still sits atop most polls of Iowa Republican caucus-goers, but that early lead has dwindled somewhat. The Koch brothers, who were among many billionaire donors to Walker's 2012 recall battle, meanwhile have indicated they will likely wait before throwing their resources behind a single candidate (if they select one at all, this cycle.)

Walker's meeting with state lawmakers this year hasn't carried the gravitas of the 2011 national labor fight. But he has pushed for some equally heavy conservative policies, many top priorities for the funders who could carry him through a very crowded Republican field.

In March, Walker signed a controversial "right to work" ban on mandatory union fees. In May, he announced he wanted to repeal the state's "prevailing wage," which establishes a minimum wage for construction workers on publicly financed projects. And a few days later, Walker said he would sign a new 20-week ban on abortions, even in cases of rape or incest.

Democrats are quick to point out that during the 2014 election, which Walker won by roughly 6 points, the governor made no mention of his support for any of the explosive issues and was often obtuse, as in an ad where he said that abortion should be a decision between a "woman and her doctor."

Walker's office points to myriad accomplishments he's had, both at the start of his first term and in his latest budget proposal offered this year. Spokeswoman Laurel Patrick pointed out a two-year freeze in student tuition at public universities, drug-testing for welfare recipients and other items this year.

"Since taking office, Governor Walker has bucked the status quo in Wisconsin. His bold, common-sense reforms are about empowering taxpayers and putting them in control. Giving Wisconsinites the freedom to control their own lives creates prosperity for our people, as well as our state," Patrick wrote in an email.

Behind the scenes at the Wisconsin Capitol, Walker has come under fire for spending too much time on the campaign trail, while major decisions linger.

Walker's focus on the campaign trail, including high-profile trips abroad to Canada and Israel dubbed "trade missions," has left the state unattended, said the Wisconsin Assembly Democratic Leader Peter Barca, who has scrapped regularly with Walker throughout his five year's in the governor's office.

"You just add up the time he's been away over the course of the past couple of months, on trade deals, not even to mention his political visits. I bet you he's been in 15-20 states in the last month alone," Barca said. "He's just obviously is not putting much attention here."

It's a different governor, Barca said, than the man who pushed through "Act 10" and the major overhaul in labor laws that would eventually make him a national hero among conservatives and Republican donors.

"He was very much hands on, he was here all the time and working it hard and talking to anyone he thought could help him have success," Barca said. "Wisconsin's in the rearview mirror, and it's getting more and more distant by the day."

Twitter: Scott Walker Presidential Announcement Tweet Wasn't His Fault // BuzzFeed // Katherine Miller – July 10, 2015

On Friday, a photo with the words “Scott Walker Is Running For President” was tweeted from Walker’s account.
On Friday, a photo with the words "Scott Walker Is Running For President" was tweeted from Walker's account.
The tweet, which did not appear in Walker’s timeline for much of the day but was still visible for hours at its permalink, was a weirdly timed surprise: Walker wasn’t supposed to formally announce his candidacy until Monday in Wisconsin.
A Twitter spokesman said Friday night that the tweet wasn’t the Walker campaign’s fault:

“We’re looking into today’s issue, and we’ve determined the Walker team was not at fault,” the spokesman said in a statement.
Twitter did not provide further information on what exactly happened.
On Monday, Walker is expected to announce his candidacy, which will be the culmination of a lot of early pre-official campaigning for most of the year.

Since Iowa Freedom Summit this winter, he has aggressively campaigned in early presidential primary states this year and is considered a top Republican contender for the nomination.
The Wisconsin governor is best known for his battles with public unions. After he passed a budget that required public workers to contribute more money to their pension plans and limited collective bargaining in the public sector, unions protested for weeks, and ultimately helped force a recall election in 2013, which Walker won decisively. Because of the recall, the Republican has won three statewide elections in a blue state.
Early on, Walker has focused on his conservative record and pitched himself as a slightly more populist alternative to many of the other prospective candidates.

Scott Walker On Hillary Clinton: “What Has She Accomplished?” // BuzzFeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 10, 2015

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker says he’s the best person in the Republican presidential field to take on Hillary Clinton, who he says has no real accomplishments.

“I do,” Walker said when asked if he thought Clinton was going to be the Democratic nominee on the Charlie Sykes Show Friday. Walker is set to officially launch his presidential campaign on Monday.

“I think that provides a great contrast,” continued Walker. “I think it’s all the more reason why as Republicans we need to nominate a new fresh face. Someone definitely from outside of Washington with big bold ideas. I think most importantly someone who can more than talk who can actually deliver.”

Walker said he is from “the future” but Clinton, who is from Washington D.C., is from “the past.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Cause that's the best contrast. Clinton's obviously not a new face, someone from the past is best taken on with someone from the future. Certainly she's someone from Washington, so someone from outside of Washington is helpful."

Walker added "for all her notoriety" Clinton has no accomplishments.

"Most importantly, for all of her notoriety, what has she accomplished? And so having someone who has real accomplishment I think is a great contrast."

Scott Walker Gets Schooled by His Neighbor // Daily Beast // Eleanor Clift – July 10, 2015

Wisconsin and Minnesota share a common cultural heritage that until recently included a healthy Midwestern strain of progressive politics. Elected in 2010, Governor Scott Walker upended a hundred years of liberal populism, charting a conservative path for Wisconsin that made him a darling of the Republican Right, but left his state with a serious budget shortfall and disappointing job growth.

Meanwhile, across the border in neighboring Minnesota, Governor Mark Dayton has relentlessly pursued liberal policies, embodying the tax-and-spend Democrat that Republicans love to caricature. The result, surprising to many, is that the Minnesota economy is going gangbusters while Wisconsin's job growth has fallen to 44th among the 50 states.

Dayton's success steering his state's progressive course has been a surprise. He was a middling senator at best, serving a single term from 2001 to 2007 before returning to Minnesota disillusioned with the way Washington operated. Time named him one of America's "Five Worst Senators" in 2006, and he was known mainly for his inherited fortune as the great-grandson of the founder of Dayton's department store, which became Target. As senator, he donated his salary to underwrite bus trips to Canada for senior citizens buying low-cost prescription drugs.

"Minnesota's gains are not because Mark Dayton has overpowered the state with his political acumen," says Lawrence Jacobs, a political science professor at the University of Minnesota. He describes the low-key Dayton as the "anti-politician," someone the voters trust because he's not smooth enough to fool them. "His skill is he has a clear agenda, and he's unyielding. This is not pie-in-the-sky Great Society adventurism."

Dayton has a majority Democratic legislature just as Walker has a Republican controlled legislature, bolstering the ongoing policy experiment in their states. The two governors have pursued agendas that mirror their respective party's core beliefs, and the results so far suggest that the starve-the-government, tax-cutting credo of conservative orthodoxy has run its course.

Dayton has raised the minimum wage, and he's significantly increased taxes on the top two percent of wage earners to close a budget shortfall and to raise money for investments in infrastructure and education. In the legislative session that just ended, some Democrats joined with Republicans to block his goal of expanding universal preschool. But he did get more scholarship money to educate four-year-olds.

"This is the largest tax increase we've seen in Minnesota, over $2 billion," says Jacobs. More than three-quarters of the new spending is on education, compared to Wisconsin, where education is on the chopping block, and Walker is at odds with professors and administrators alike at his state's flagship university system.

Minnesota has also passed the state's version of the Affordable Care Act (MNsure), and while its implementation has been rocky, it is in place and serving tens of thousands of people.

Dayton ran for governor in 2010 on an unapologetically liberal agenda, and won narrowly after a recount. He was reelected comfortably in 2014, and his approval rating in the latest Minneapolis Star Tribune poll is 54 percent. Contrast that with Walker's 41 percent, and you've got a clear picture of how each is faring in the eyes of voters.

Dayton's idiosyncratic style is in tune with the times, and at 68, he has no ambition for national office. Walker is running for president and touting hard right policies that play well with Iowa caucus goers. He opposed raising the minimum wage, has significantly weakened unions, reduced spending for education, cut taxes on the wealthy, and increased taxes on the middle-class in part to pay for the tax cut. According to the non-partisan Wisconsin Budget Project, Walker gave tax breaks that disproportionally favored upper income earners while cutting $56 million in tax credits for working families.

Faced with a budget shortfall and no way to plug it without additional revenue, Republicans in the Wisconsin legislature are rebelling against additional spending cuts. But Walker shows no sign of softening his stance against raising taxes or fees. Other Republican governors, notably Louisiana's Bobby Jindal, are in the same quandary.

"It seems like they've been backed into a corner and are just going forward with pure ideology and discounting any contradictory evidence," says David Madland, author of Hollowed Out: Why the Economy Doesn't Work without a Strong Middle Class.

As the Director of the American Worker Project at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, Madland in his book takes on the premise that inequality is good in the sense that helping the rich get richer is going to help everybody else, that a rising tide lifts all boats. Trickle-down economics has gotten a bad rap and is rarely invoked as a phrase anymore, but the belief that tax cuts are the engine of economic growth remains the core of GOP ideology.

The fact that Minnesota's economy rallied under progressive policies while Wisconsin's has struggled is "one more data point proving that trickle down is wrong," says Madland. While it's tricky to attribute the wellbeing of a state's economy solely to its political leadership, Minnesota is experiencing much stronger growth than its neighbor. Dayton has also proved responsive to the business community, easing early fears that his liberalism might go unchecked.

Walker, on the other hand, has doubled down to the detriment of his state on policies that are backfiring. And if voters in his home state aren't buying what he's selling anymore, that doesn't bode well for his presidential campaign.

KASICH

Pro-John Kasich group raises $11.5 million // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – July 10, 2015

New Day for America, an advocacy group supporting John Kasich's presidential bid, announced Friday that it and allied organizations raised more than $11.5 million through the end of June.

Though the Ohio Republican has not yet announced his candidacy, the group's executive director, Matt Carle, said in a statement that "the response to Governor Kasich's message has been strong."

"In over eight weeks, we've exceeded our initial fundraising goal by over a million dollars," Carle said. "Supporters are looking for a record of accomplishment and someone who looks out for all Americans. That's what they are seeing when they look at Governor Kasich and why we've already received millions in additional commitments already pledged."

The fundraising announcement comes a day after the group began airing its first ads on television stations around Manchester, New Hampshire, and Boston. The group has purchased approximately $1.7 million in air time through July 13.

The Ohio governor plans to announce his candidacy for president on July 21. A former Republican congressman who is now serving in his second term as governor, Kasich plans to contest heavily in New Hampshire by highlighting his working-class background and work improving Ohio's economy.

Kasich's Early 527 Haul: $11.5 Million In Just Two Months // Bloomberg // Mark Halperin – July 10, 2015

Two 527 committees supporting John Kasich's presidential bid will report raising around $11.5 million dollars in just two months, an encouraging sign for the Ohio Republican governor's late-starting effort.

Part of that money is already being spent on a million-dollar television advertising buy that began this week, targeting New Hampshire voters, in advance of Kasich's expected formal announcement in Columbus on July 21.

According to a source familiar with the two committees, which share a version of the same name (New Day for America), the effort has focused on major donors, rather than grassroots contributions. The total includes thirty checks of $100,000 or more. The source said millions in additional donations are already in the pipeline.

Raising more than $10 million in eight weeks suggests that the Ohio Governor's backers can potentially compete on equal footing with the committees backing at least some of his rivals, which have raised more than Kasich, but over longer periods of time. A nonprofit backing Florida Senator Marco Rubio, Conservative Solutions Project (501(c)(4)), announced recently that it had raised $15.8 million to date since January. A group of Ted Cruz affiliated super-PACs said they raised a combined $37 million since early April. Yesterday, Jeb Bush's super-PAC, Right to Rise, announced it had raised a whopping $103 million since the beginning of the year.

"In just over 10 weeks, we've exceeded our initial fundraising goal by over a million dollars," said New Day for America Executive Director Matt Carle. "The response to Governor Kasich's message has been strong. Supporters are looking for a record of accomplishment and someone who looks out for all Americans."

Among those major contributors who have raised money for the committees as well as contributed were Phil Geier, former chairman and CEO of the Interpublic Group of Companies, and Gay and Stanley Gaines, longtime active Republican donors from Florida.

Kasich has long rubbed elbows with the kind of megarich donors who can kick in big checks to these types of organizations, first as a prominent member of Congress for many years, then as an investment banker, and in the last few years as the governor of one of the nation's most politically important states. Since he began to seriously consider running for president several months ago, he has put a premium on determining if he could raise sufficient money to be competitive and has spent a good deal of time courting wealthy backers.

Kasich's operation will also have to prove it can also raise money for the campaign itself if he is going to thrive within the large field of Republican candidates. Raising campaign money, with a limit of $2,700 per person for the nomination fight, is an extraordinarily time-consuming effort, one which Kasich will have to engage in while continuing his day job as governor of Ohio and meeting voters around the country.

Kasich and his supporters are eager to convince political elites and voters that he should be considered a top-tier candidate. With his meager poll standing, fundraising success is one of his best talking points to date to suggest the viability of his candidacy.

In the 2000 presidential cycle, when Kasich made a previous run, he proved to be an anemic fundraiser and withdrew from the race.

Kasich groups announce $11.5 million haul // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 10, 2015

Two groups backing Ohio Gov. John Kasich announced Friday they had pulled in $11.5 million since May 1.

"The response to Governor Kasich's message has been strong. Supporters are looking for a record of accomplishment and someone who looks out for all Americans," New Day Executive Director Matt Carle said in a statement Friday.

New Day for America, Kasich's 527 group that can run political ads with unlimited individual and corporate contributions, as well as an affiliated organization, New Day for America Independent Media, touted the haul at a critical juncture for Kasich. The Ohio governor is not formally entering the race until July 21, but he faces the possibility he might not make it onto the stage for the first Republican debate next month.

To forestall that possibility, Kasich supporters spent $1.7 million to go on air in New Hampshire with the first major ad buy of the 2016 cycle.

Kasich's haul puts him near the middle of the Republican pack, based on announced fundraising tallies so far. The Jeb Bush apparatus leads the pack with an eye-popping $114 million and Sen. Ted Cruz drew in a surprising $51 million with the help of a string of super PACs. On the Democratic side, a set of groups backing Hillary Clinton say they have raised $24 million and her campaign has raised $45 million.

Republican Candidates Appeal to Anti-Abortion Groups // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters – July 10, 2015

A half dozen Republican candidates for president reassured members of one of the most influential anti-abortion groups on Friday that they favored further regulation and restriction of the procedure and, if elected, would be strong leaders on the issue.

Some, like Jeb Bush of Florida and Rick Perry of Texas, both former governors, pointed to the various laws they signed when in office that made obtaining an abortion more difficult for women. Praising the "extraordinary work" of the National Right to Life Committee, Mr. Bush, speaking via a produced video that featured people testifying to his strong credentials on the issue, listed his work as governor.

"I'm strongly pro-life," he said. "I expanded adoption. We increased regulation over abortion clinics. We abolished this horrific procedure of partial-birth abortion. We limited late-term abortions. We required parental notification for teenage children."

Mr. Perry assured the crowd that no one has a better record than his. "That's a fact," he said. "We passed a parental notification law. I signed a parental consent law. I signed a sonogram law so mothers facing that agonizing choice can actually see."

One of those laws that Mr. Perry signed — it set a higher bar for standards that govern things like medical equipment and staffing and required that doctors have admitting privileges at a nearby hospital — has been put on hold while the Supreme Court decides whether to hear an appeal.

While abortion is not likely to dominate the 2016 election, its potency as an issue that can stir passions and fears among both conservatives and liberals will no doubt be a factor. And wIth movement on several fronts, including in state legislatures and the courts, the fight over abortion policy is already something that candidates of both parties are being forced to confront in more real and urgent ways compared with other recent presidential elections.

In Wisconsin this week, where Gov. Scott Walker is preparing to announce his campaign for the Republican nomination, lawmakers passed a bill that would ban abortion after 20 weeks of pregnancy. Mr. Walker plans to sign it. But his shifting public statements on abortion illustrate how fraught the issue is, and the differences in running for office in a swing state and in running for the nomination of a party that has shown little tolerance for ambiguous stances on social issues.

When he was running for re-election last year, Mr. Walker insisted that making abortion illegal was out of his hands and a matter of settled Supreme Court precedent. He also produced an ad in which he said he supported legislation that "leaves the final decision to a woman and her doctor." Then early this year, as he was starting to more aggressively court the social conservatives he believes he needs to win the White House, he encouraged state legislators to send him a 20-week ban. Similar bans in several other states are now being challenged in the courts.

Abortion rights advocates have pointed out that the bill Mr. Walker intends to sign in Wisconsin has no provisions exempting women who are victims of rape or incest.

The possibility that the Supreme Court could take up a major abortion case next term forces the issue in another way that makes it very likely to persist well into 2016. The fact that the next president could appoint several new justices was never far from the minds of the speakers.

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida alluded to this when he condemned the "egregiously flawed" Roe v. Wade decision and told the crowd, "The White House needs an occupant who values and prioritizes life. And so my pledge to you is this: if you help send me to that place, I will never forget this place. And i will bring advocacy to the White House, and we will get things done."

Could a 2012 Rule Change Upend the GOP's 2016 Nomination Process? // WSJ // Patrick O'Connor – July 10, 2015

Close races can turn on small, often overlooked details. One detail getting some attention from Republican campaign strategists in the runup to 2016 is a rule requiring its presidential candidates to win more than half the delegates in eight states to qualify for the nomination. In a field as crowded as this one, that might prove trickier than usual.

The Republican National Committee adopted the rule ahead of its convention in 2012 at the insistence of allies to the last GOP nominee, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who wanted to insulate him from an insurgent challenge. The previous requirement was that a candidate win five states.

Some have suggested this rule might help winnow the field, as a de facto shortcut to winning the nomination, if the delegate math becomes a little blurry. But critics have argued the rule might prevent some candidates with a sizable share of delegates from qualifying for the nomination. Some go a step further, suggesting the rule may upend the entire nominating process if no candidate claims more than half the delegates in eight states, or if multiple candidates clear that bar.

The reality is that this rule, like just about every other rule in politics, can be changed. Members of the RNC rules committee can simply vote to change the number of states needed to qualify when they meet the week before next year's convention in Cleveland. They can raise or lower the threshold of states in which the eventual nominee needs a majority of the delegates. Or, they can scrap the requirement entirely. The candidate with the most delegates will control this process.

Of course, it may not be that simple. As anyone who has witnessed an RNC rules meeting can attest, even small tweaks can provoke a spirited backlash, especially if a presidential nomination is on the line. A small group of RNC agitators has been griping about this rule since the 2012 convention, with one committeeman vowing to use it to unravel the entire primary process no matter the results.

And, a fight over arcane procedural rules is the last thing party leaders or the eventual nominee wants a week before the 2016 convention, especially if the nomination remains up in the air.

These questions may seem a little silly and premature, but the smartest campaigns are already trying to game out scenarios like this one as they look for an edge in this historically crowded field that includes a half-dozen top-tier candidates but no obvious front-runner.

Just as the Obama campaign corralled delegates in smaller states and caucuses, don't be surprised if the savviest Republican campaigns start sending allies to Guam, Puerto Rico or the other territories that award delegates. For all the focus on Iowa and New Hampshire, the best-organized campaigns are already taking steps to collect the signatures necessary to qualify for contests in the 10 or so states that require them.

This, of course, is all a byproduct of the size of the field and the caliber of the candidates. Despite the heartburn this process may cause the party if the contest stretches deep into next year and turns on RNC rules and delegate math, for many Republicans, it's a welcome break from the last two GOP primaries in which no candidate generated significant early enthusiasm.

"When this rule change was made in Tampa, there was no way to anticipate four years later that there would be the largest number of Republican presidential candidates running all being on the varsity team," said Rick Hohlt, a prominent GOP fundraiser. "It is a serious problem, but a good one to have, if you are the RNC chairman."

Once allies, Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio in battle for Florida // Boston Globe // Matt Viser – July 10, 2015

With Florida's political elite gathered in the state Capitol, Governor Jeb Bush welcomed the next House speaker with a flourish, presenting Marco Rubio with a gold sword and a legend dredged from the annals of the Bush family.

The sword, Bush half-seriously explained to Rubio in the 2005 ceremony, once belonged to a mystical (and mythical) warrior named Chiang, "who believes in conservative principles, believes in entrepreneurial capitalism, believes in moral values that underpin a free society." The story was inspired by Bush's father, who used to joke about unleashing the wrath of the former anticommunist Chinese political leader Chiang Kai-shek against his opponents on the tennis court.

A decade after that humorous moment, the two Floridians, who have described their relationship as mentor and protege, are now rivals, locked in an intense battle for the Republican nomination for president. Both are near the top in national polls.

The battle for Florida — which votes March 15 and awards all 99 delegates to the winner — is shaping up to be one of the juiciest subplots of the GOP primary. Both Bush, 62, and Rubio, 44, established their public identities in the state's diverse and sprawling political culture and are now seeking to use their experience and records to catapult to the pinnacle of national power.

But for Rubio to win the nomination, political observers say, he must develop a strategy to sabotage his onetime mentor, creating tensions that are beginning to seep into view.

Bush supporters contend that Rubio should have been more deferential to Bush — waiting until he had more experience — while Rubio's supporters say he is just the type of generational leader to challenge Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

And that sword that Bush gave Rubio so many years ago? In the minds of some Bush supporters, the senator might as well be using it to stab his mentor in the back.

"Marco was supposed to be a good boy and wait his turn," said one Florida Republican with ties to both. "Jeb people are not happy at all with Marco getting into this race."

"Marco is a wonderful politician. He could very well someday make a decent president. But I don't know that time is now," said Juan-Carlos Planas, a Bush supporter who has known Rubio for decades and served with him in the state Legislature. "Marco may be many great things. But he's not Jeb."

Rubio is not-so-subtly suggesting the Bush name is a negative, talking up young new leadership and running against dynastic political families. In response, Bush allies are openly denigrating Rubio.

"Marco's four years into his first term in the Senate," said Mac Stipanovich, an influential Florida lobbyist and longtime Bush supporter. "The biggest thing he's ever managed is a 10-person House staff."

It was 1998, and a 26-year-old Marco Rubio had just become the newest West Miami city commissioner. He was at City Hall celebrating when the phone rang. The man on the line had donated $50 to the campaign and wanted to share in the joy.

It was Bush, the soon-to-be-governor.

From the beginning of Rubio's career in politics, Bush was there to help. Although one is the scion of a storied political family and the other the son of a bartender and a maid, the two developed a bond out of their experiences in Miami.

"Did [Rubio] sit at Jeb's knee as Jeb taught him the way of the world? No," Stipanovich said. "But was he someone who liked and admired and aspired to be like Jeb, and probably learned a lot of his skills from watching Jeb? I think yes."

In an e-mail exchange with a supporter just after Rubio became speaker, Bush wrote, "I am so proud of Marco." In another, Bush called Rubio "a fine leader."

"I feel that our party can renew itself, something that I fret about at the national level," Bush wrote.

In his memoir, Rubio called Bush "the man I most admired in Florida politics."

"I was most influenced by the creativity and daring of Governor Jeb Bush, who was a one-man idea factory," Rubio wrote in the book, "An American Son: A Memoir."

Six years ago, during a high-profile race in Florida, Rubio was happy to wait his turn.

It happened two days before Christmas in 2008. News had just broken that Senator Mel Martinez was not going to run for reelection in 2010. Speculation was rampant that Bush would run, so Rubio drove to his business office at the Biltmore Hotel. Rubio, who was about to leave office because of term limits, wanted to run, too. But he wouldn't think of challenging Bush.

Jeb Bush was at the Biltmore Hotel when Marco Rubio won the US Senate seat.

They sat for an hour, and Rubio left convinced that Bush was going to seek the seat, according to a recounting in Rubio's memoir.

But about two weeks later, Bush called Rubio to tell him, "I'm not going to do it." Only then did Rubio begin planning to run himself in a race in which he started as the underdog. At one point, he was down by more than 50 points and contemplated getting out of the race. Jeb Bush encouraged him to stay in, according to a source familiar with their conversation.

In the end, Rubio's timing proved to be excellent. He burst onto the national scene with his Tea Party conservatism in 2010, when a health care backlash sweeping much of the country helped him pull an upset victory against Governor Charlie Crist, who ran as an independent, and Democratic Congressman Kendrick Meek.

And just as he had been there for him on an election night for Miami City Commission a decade earlier, Bush was at the Biltmore Hotel when Rubio won his US Senate seat.

"I'm so proud of Marco," Bush told the crowd. "I'm so proud of his high-voltage energy, I'm so proud of his enthusiasm. I'm so proud of his eloquence. And I'm so proud that he will be part of a next generation of leaders that will restore America. Marco Rubio is the right man at the right time."

The Senate race placed Rubio's name near the top of many lists for president — in 2012, Bush was publicly pushing Mitt Romney to tap Rubio as his running mate. Not only did Rubio hail from a big and important general election state, but his Hispanic heritage could help his party broaden its reach with a growing slice of the electorate.

In 2012, Jeb Bush was publicly pushing Mitt Romney to tap Marco Rubio as his running mate.

Rubio still feels like he is the right man at the right time. And this time, there was little deference paid to Bush. His career has been marked by underdog races in which he displays a willingness to take political risks. Like Obama, he also has shown that he's willing to jump into a race when he thinks he's ready — but when others say it's not his turn.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's like, 'I like Jeb. But not as much as I like the idea of being president of the United States,' " said Steven Geller, who overlapped with Rubio and Bush as the Democratic leader in the Senate.

The strategy for Bush is to portray himself as an experienced manager who has a run the nation's third most populous state. Rubio, on the other hand, is presenting himself as a fresh face who doesn't hail from a dynastic political family.

"Yesterday's over," he declared as he announced his campaign in April, a swipe he made at Clinton that could also be interpreted as aimed at Bush.

Although Bush currently leads in most national polls, Rubio is seen as a likely alternative. When asked whether they could vote for certain candidates, 75 percent of probable GOP primary voters said they could vote for Bush and 74 percent said the same for Rubio, according to a recent NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll. Those results were significantly higher than any other candidate in the race.

In Florida, Bush leads with 20 percent of voters, followed by Rubio with 18 percent, according to a Quinnipiac University poll released last month.

A key battle will be waged over Florida's Hispanic voters, not just in the fight to win the state but also to demonstrate who can best attract Latinos to the Republican Party nationally.

Rubio often talks about his Cuban heritage, and he was the first to deliver the State of the Union response in Spanish. Bush had a Cuban band playing during his announcement speech. He toggles between English and Spanish, and his friends are quick to point out that he speaks Spanish at home.

On some key issues, the two candidates offer a contrast.

On immigration, Rubio initially pursued a comprehensive overhaul that would both strengthen border security and provide a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants. But under withering conservative criticism he backed away from that plan, saying changes should be done piecemeal.

Bush favors a comprehensive approach that would solve both issues at once, a solution that immigration advocates support and consider more politically realistic but also one that causes heartburn among conservatives.

Bush is also more steadfast in his support for Common Core and its national education standards. Rubio has talked about eliminating the Department of Education and in 2013 came out against Common Core.

For some Republicans in Florida and across the country, seeing one of their brightest young stars and a scion of one of their party's most enduring families compete is causing deep angst.

"As a friend of both, I don't like it. I wish it weren't so," said Ana Navarro, a Miami-based Republican who is supporting Bush. "But it is a fact, and there's not a damn thing anyone can do to change it."

Presidential Race Takes Shape and Offers Hints of Things to Come // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 10, 2015

The presidential race, slow-forming for much of the year, sprang clearly to life this week with disparate events that could play a role in deciding the Republican nominee and the contours of the general election.

In one sphere is Donald J. Trump, the bombastic real estate developer and television personality. Skepticism remains about whether he'll stay in the presidential race through the fall, but he appears to be laser-focused on making it into the primary debates next month. And he is dominating the discussion in the Republican Party.

The slow reaction from party figures to his caustic remarks about Mexicans has again highlighted divisions over an immigration overhaul, two years after Republicans criticized Mitt Romney's tone on the issue in 2012.

Mr. Trump's remarks are already being used by Hillary Rodham Clinton to tar the Republican field, including Jeb Bush, the one party candidate who has long made overhauling immigration a cause.

Separately, Mrs. Clinton and her allies have pounced on a comment from Mr. Bush about people needing to "work longer hours" to improve the economy. The Clinton team has said the comment defines him as a clone of Mr. Romney, who was lampooned as out of touch by President Obama in the 2012 race.

Mr. Bush is certain to hear about that statement for weeks, but Mrs. Clinton's campaign is signaling clearly that they see him as the likeliest nominee. And he will be able to make that point to Republicans to try to galvanize support in a crowded field.

Finally, the economic turbulence in Greece and in Puerto Rico is a familiar pocket of uncertainty as the United States recovers from the Great Recession and moves toward a national election.

he Insiders: Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton are experts at manipulating the media // WaPo // Ed Rogers – July 10, 2015

Besides the fact that they are both running for president in 2016, what do Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton have in common? They both play the media like a fiddle. They use the mainstream media in the same way: They say something outrageous, whether it's an outright lie or a provocative statement, then wait for the media to come after them.

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump gestures and declares "You're fired!" at a campaign rally in Manchester, N.H., in this file photo taken June 17, 2015. (Dominick Reuter/Reuters) Donald Trump gestures and declares "You're fired!" at a campaign rally last month in Manchester, N.H. (Dominick Reuter/Reuters)
In Trump's case, he throws down the gauntlet and goads the media into pursuing him relentlessly. Trump relishes the chase, and it draws needed attention to his campaign. He knows perfectly well how to garner as much attention as possible with his incendiary comments.

Clinton throws down the gauntlet and intimidates the media into silence. She regularly stiff-arms the press but is available just enough to allow her apologists and her enablers to say she is not hiding from the media. She can say whatever she wants, true or not, and the media mostly go along with it or feign disappointment that there is not more to say.

The media like to pretend they are forced to cover Trump; they act as though he has thrust himself upon them and they wish they didn't have to talk about him. The media pretend they can't cover Clinton because she won't let them; they ask the obvious questions but rarely show any zeal for follow-up.

So what are we left with? The Trump coverage is forced and phony, yet it's exactly what he wants. Any substantive coverage of Clinton is practically nonexistent, which is exactly what she wants. The whole thing is a game, and we shouldn't pretend otherwise. Clinton and Trump are both manipulating the media, but the media are proving all too willing to be manipulated. Everyone seems perfectly willing to play his or her role and be compliant. As I have said before, the coverage of Campaign 2016 thus far has been a product of too much media chasing too little story.

The Truth Behind Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton's Twitter Spat // Bloomberg // Victoria Stilwell – July 10, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush and his Democratic rival Hillary Clinton got into an economic spat yesterday via the noblest form of debate: the Twitter argument.

As Bush campaigned in New Hampshire Wednesday, he bemoaned the nation's low labor force participation rate, telling the New Hampshire Union Leader editorial board "that people need to work longer hours" to help propel U.S. growth. The Clinton campaign quickly capitalized on the comment, tweeting:

A few hours later, Bush struck back:

Naturally, the issue is much more nuanced than either candidate is making it out to be. And harder to fit into 140-character dispatches.

Here's the context of Bush's now-infamous quote at the Union Leader editorial board.

"My aspirations for the country, and I believe we can achieve it, is for 4 percent growth as far as the eye can see. Which means we have to be a lot more productive. Workforce participation has to rise from its all-time modern lows. It means that people need to work longer hours and through their productivity gain more income for their families. That's the only way we are going to get out of this rut that we're in."

While that may make the "longer hours" comment more palatable, a 4 percent growth rate is ambitious to say the least. The last time the nation saw economic growth rates at that level or higher: 2000.

Bush is calculating that the growth rate can be goosed by upping labor force participation, the share of working-age people who are employed or actively looking for a job. In June, the share of Americans in that category was

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

62.6 percent, the lowest level since 1977. That compares with a peak of 67.3 percent in January 2000.

What's debatable, however, is just how much participation can rise in the future. Much of the decline — about half by some estimates — has been driven by the mass exodus of retiring baby boomers from the labor force. There are also other long-term trends at play, such as more young people choosing not to work when they're in school.

And while there is a significant share of people who were sidelined from work by the recession, it's unclear how many are left waiting in the wings. At 5.3 percent, the unemployment rate is bumping up against the Federal Reserve's estimates for what full employment looks like. The number of discouraged workers — those who say the dearth of job prospects has driven them to give up looking — has been coming down steadily. And jobless claims are trending at levels consistent with a booming economy.

Still, most economists agree there's some amount of slack left. For one, wages have been slow to accelerate out of the 2 percent band they've tracked since the recovery started, which suggest employers aren't yet feeling the pressure to offer fatter paychecks to attract the best talent.

And, as Bush correctly notes (and Democratic-socialist presidential candidate Bernie Sanders agrees), the number of part-time workers is still elevated compared to before the recession. While Americans worked 34.5 hours on average per week in June, right in line with the trend for the two years' worth of Labor Department data that pre-date the recession, there are 6.5 million people in part-time jobs for an economic reason, like having their hours cut or being unable to find full-time work. That compares with an average 4.62 million in the 20 years leading up to the recession.

This is something that others are worried about too, such as Fed Chair Janet Yellen. She's pointed to this measure as one of several signs there's still room for the labor market to improve.

Bush says that's what he meant when he remarked "people need to work longer hours." More people working more hours will boost productivity, he reasons, which will in turn help them make more money. While that may seem like okay logic on the surface, it's more involved than that.

Productivity is measured by how much stuff a worker can churn out for every hour of labor. While it's fluctuated over the years, lately it's been pretty lousy since a decade-long boom ending in about 2004, according to Wells Fargo Securities LLC. So recent productivity trends haven't really looked as rosy as the chart that Clinton tweeted out, which dates to 1948 and ends around 2010. It's also worth noting that it was supplied by the Economic Policy Institute, which is partly funded by labor unions.

In fact, the anemic productivity numbers have economists concerned, including Yellen, who served in President Bill Clinton's administration. High productivity is the key to creating growth that doesn't spur rampant inflation. It boosts living standards for U.S. workers.

But simply having more people work more hours isn't enough to increase productivity. They've got to need to work more hours, for lack of a better word. If employees are working more hours, but there's not a commensurate increase in demand for their goods and services, their output will stay the same. That actually hurts productivity.

Additionally, there are long-lasting factors at work that have pushed down productivity. Companies haven't been investing in new capital like they used to -- equipment that could help their workers do their jobs more efficiently. Some economists think the heydays of productivity are long gone because new technology has become less revolutionary. It's what they call "secular stagnation."

So in summary, both Clinton and Bush left out really important details in this debate, cherry-picking data points that support their agenda. But I suppose we shouldn't be that surprised. That's politics, after all.

Republicans rename the GOP the 'Retrumplican Party' // Reuters // Lena Masri – July 10, 2015

The national Democratic Party has found a new nickname for the GOP: "The Retrumplican Party" — after Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump.

A video, released Thursday by the Democratic National Committee shows clips of Trump making defamatory statements about Mexican immigrants. The video connects his stands on immigration with Republican presidential hopefuls Rick Perry, Chris Christie, Jeb Bush, Carly Fiorina, Ted Cruz, Scott Walker and Marco Rubio.

"Donald Trump may be running for president," proclaims the video. "But his ideas are running the party."

In fact, most Republican presidential candidates — including those targeted by the DNC — have denounced Trump's controversial statements.

The head of the Republican National Committee, Reince Priebus, spent nearly an hour Wednesday on the phone with Donald Trump, urging him to tone down his comments about immigrants, according a report from The Washington Post.

'War horses' Bush, Clinton lay ground for 2016 race // USA Today // Susan Page – July 10, 2015

Bill Clinton and George W. Bush agree on this: Learning leadership skills is crucial in just about every worthwhile endeavor in American life, political and otherwise.

That said, they couldn't disagree more on who, exactly, would have the right leadership skills in 2016 to warrant winning the White House job they both have held.

In a rare joint interview, the two former presidents who share what may be the most complicated political relationship in modern times sat down with USA TODAY Thursday at the Bush Presidential Center. They were together for the graduation ceremony of the inaugural class of Presidential Leadership Scholars, a project sponsored by four presidential libraries that has offered leadership training for mid-career professionals who work for non-profit groups, private-sector firms, state and local agencies and in the military.

The participants aren't really politicians.

"People hear this and they say, 'You've got a Young Republicans Club' or 'Clinton's got a Young Democrats Club,' (but) that's not the intention at all," Bush said. "The intention is to take people who have shown good promise and let them learn some lessons about how decisions were made or how people collaborated."

"There might be nothing we can do anymore about how fractured America is politically and ideologically," Clinton said. "But in the end, people have to get together and make decisions and do things — not just in Congress and the White House, but I mean all over the country."

It was impossible to ignore the elephant in the room, or maybe the elephant and the donkey. That is: Clinton's wife, Hillary, is the clear front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016. Bush's brother Jeb is in the top rank of contenders for the Republican nomination.

Friends today, combatants tomorrow?

"He loves his brother; I love Hillary," Clinton said. If they win their respective presidential nominations, "he's going to vote for his brother; I'm sure going to vote for Hillary, and something will happen. But we'll still be friends."

"I know Jeb will treat Hillary with respect, and I'm confident Hillary will treat Jeb with respect," Bush said. "I'm not sure I can speak that highly of some of the surrogates they may have out there, but these two surrogates will" do that as well.

The two men sat side by side on a couch in Bush's private office at his presidential center on the campus of Southern Methodist University. They had just finished having a class photo taken with the program's scholars, and in a few minutes, they would head to the auditorium for a joint address to the group.

They seemed relaxed and at ease, friendly and deferential to one another. They discussed a challenge they had shared: how to raise confident daughters into adulthood. Bush reached over to touch Clinton's shoulder as he made a point; at another time, Clinton tapped Bush's arm.

"Sometimes the decisions we make have bigger consequences," Clinton said, describing how presidential leadership is in some ways different from other top jobs. "No question," Bush chimed in.

When Bush noted, "A president, it turns out, has to be prepared for the unexpected," Clinton nodded and said, "Yes," then enumerated the challenges Bush faced when the 9/11 attackers struck during the first year of his tenure.

They said neither believes a 2016 Clinton-Bush campaign would be waged any differently because of their friendship and collaboration — nor do they think it should.

"I don't think it's going to be different," Bush said flatly. "I think it's going to be a political campaign."

"If they win the nominations, it's going to be a very hard-fought campaign, and if it's like any other campaign, it'll be somewhat bruising, and the surrogates will be really tough, and they'll have hard debates, and we'll just live with it," Clinton said.

His advice to the prospective candidates: "Make the choice clear: 'This is where I am; this is where he is.' Be as accurate as you can, and let it rip."

The two got to know each other under hostile circumstances, during what Bush called "the first Bush-Clinton race," which he wryly noted "didn't turn out that well" for his side. In 1992, Clinton defeated the elder George Bush in his bid for a second term. In 2000, the younger Bush defeated Clinton's vice president, Al Gore. Another contest between the families in 2016 would break new ground.

Though they differ in party registration and many policy positions, they share some fundamental characteristics, Bush said. "First of all, we're Baby Boomers, and the only two Baby Boomer presidents. Secondly, we were both governors of Southern states, Arkansas and Texas." He said both were "affable people; we're not zero-sum thinkers." And at this point, he said, both were "like two old war horses, put out to pasture."

Clinton became so close to the elder Bush over the years after their election showdown that the younger Bush jokes he is his "brother by another mother." Clinton made a similar reference when noting that Bush had turned 69 this week, a month ahead of Clinton. ("For one month a year, I'm the younger brother," Clinton said.)

"I just wrote him a birthday note because he just had a birthday," Clinton said. "So I said, 'Now we have a genuine family feud, maybe we ought to go get that guitar player from Deliverance and get him to play for us.' Remember that movie? I mean, the banjo player, the dueling banjos."

The Gloria Borger – Hillary Clinton Watch: Waiting for Insight // HuffPo // Kathleen Reardon – July 10, 2015

I've written a number of times about journalists citing "some people say," "some people think" and "it's been said" as support for their supposedly objective reporting. What was once a desire to protect important sources has deteriorated into a sign of journalistic laziness. When reporters covering presidential politics employ words they fully know will disparage female candidates -- or when they purport to discern dishonesty by examining candidates' facial expressions -- they are taking journalistic prerogative another step too far.

"Women are tested in ways that men are not," Senator Diane Feinstein recently observed about Hillary Clinton. It will be harder for a woman to win the presidency in 2016 than for a man and, Feinstein says, Secretary Clinton knows this. Clinton has been the target of facile, disparaging labels and categories -- ones that enter the general lexicon like lice on a host, becoming firmly attached to women unless people recognize and reject their misuse.

In 2008 CNN's Gloria Borger wrote the following about then-presidential candidate Hillary Clinton.

But there is no joy in Hillaryville. In its place are anger (at the press, for being soft on Barack Obama), angst (at losing 11 straight contests), and apoplexy (at Obama, for daring to challenge a nomination that was supposed to have been wrapped up by now).
She added:

And so there is frost, not sun, in the Clinton campaign

The first line -- using the words "anger," "angst" and "apoplexy" -- is gratuitous, gender baiting alliteration. "Frost" used to describe Clinton's campaign was not idly chosen. We're all familiar with the ice queen image and other versions of coldness attributed to competent, assertive women.

Then there are Borger's "multiple faces" insults fanning the flames of the distrust theme promulgated by Clinton's detractors:

Multiple faces. But presidential choices are intensely personal. And so the Clinton campaign has decided to play a game of the blind man and the elephant: Present the multiple faces of Hillary, as if somehow each identity might attract a voter. Call it microtargeting her persona. Too bad the result of the groupthink often morphs into caricature. One moment, it's a scold ("Shame on you, Barack Obama"); the next, fuzzy praise ("honored to be here with Barack Obama"). And at the Ohio debate, Clinton seemed more whiny than presidential when she brought up a recent TV skit about journalists falling in love with Obama. "Well, can I just point out that in the last several debates I seem to get the first question," Clinton complained, wearing a false smile.

A "false smile" can be a tight smile, an unfinished smile, a sign of politeness or simply a means of dealing with difficult situations without anger. "Scold" is another loaded word, to say nothing of "whiny." This is how Borger and others like her surreptitiously attempt to poison Hillary's well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an April interview with former Commerce Secretary and White House Chief of Staff Bill Daley, Borger did it again: "You know she comes with baggage. There are negative perceptions about the Clintons as paranoid, too protected, even arrogant." A woman who refrains from standing her ground on important issues is seen as lacking leadership potential. One who speaks affirmatively, risks being seen as difficult, arrogant -- a loose canon. Borger knows this. Such reliance on denigrating labels is cheap, shabby, sleight of hand "journalism."

If we ever hope to see a female shatter that highest, hardest glass ceiling of the U.S. presidency, and give our daughters the same chance as our sons have had to lead our country, we must reject efforts to slither into the "news" the easy, derogatory categories so often applied to women in the workplace.

Hillary Clinton is not perfect. If there is a shield" around her, it's been constructed because any woman who gets ahead in her career knows that being one of the guys doesn't work. There is much about Secretary Clinton we don't know. Her communication style is occasionally stilted. But there is much we don't need to know of any candidate. Yet, Clinton will have to prove herself over and over and over because that is what's typically required of women who seek to break through professional barriers.

I, for one, won't sit back and watch people like Gloria Borger try to shape Hillary Clinton into a bitch, a brassy, bossy, distant, elusive woman simply because Borger won't do the hard work of a real journalist. When was the last time Borger gave us actual new information or a unique new insight on any topic or person? C'mon Gloria. Is the title of "Chief Political Analyst" for Wolf Blitzer's CNN program a code word for someone who is entitled to cast personal aspersions without providing hard data or at least hard-won reporting? Is it a code word for someone who relies on readily available, gender-specific, disparaging labels to provide "analysis"? It's one way to make and keep a career going, but it isn't journalism.

When Borger again dragged out the "Where's the real Hillary" theme in response to Clinton's recent interview with CNN correspondent Brianna Keilar, where was the "meat"? Nowhere to be found.

We see gratuitous excuses for reporting so often that the public has become jaded. It's time to let the press know that a presidential election is deserving of the best information and insights available from qualified journalists -- of whom a fair number are sitting on their hands thanks to the personnel efficiencies of media oligarchy. Journalists come out of a proud tradition, and many of them place their lives on the line every day to bring insightful news and analysis. Certainly accurate, well-researched election coverage can't be all that hard.

Hillary Clinton's fibs // Chicago Tribune // Jonah Goldberg – July 10, 2015

Hillary Clinton lies.

This is a widely acknowledged fact among people who pay attention and aren't on her payroll. Nearly 20 years ago, New York Times columnist William Safire wrote: "Americans of all political persuasions are coming to the sad realization that our first lady — a woman of undoubted talents who was a role model for many in her generation — is a congenital liar."

Younger folks probably have little to no memory of the lies Safire had in mind, though some might have heard about Clinton's infamously implausible explanation for how she managed to make a 10,000 percent profit in cattle futures simply by reading The Wall Street Journal.

Suffice it to say that she's been honing her craft for decades. And that's turning into a problem for her, perhaps her biggest problem.

After ducking the press for months, Clinton sat down for an interview with CNN's Brianna Keilar. It was a savvy choice. Keilar covers the Clinton campaign and has every incentive not to offend her famously vindictive sources 16 months before the election.

The most discussed deception came in an exchange about her emails. Clinton declared emphatically that, "You know, you're starting with so many assumptions that are — I've never had a subpoena. ... Let's take a deep breath here."

Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., chair of the committee investigating the Obama administration's response to the Benghazi attack, promptly produced a copy of the subpoena.

Team Clinton says she was responding to a specific allegation that she deleted emails that were under subpoena. It's a legalistically plausible defense given Keilar's muddled question and Stakhanovite effort to avoid asking meaningful follow-ups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, it was a classically Clintonian way of lying: Make a sweeping, definitive-sounding statement, and then when called on it, release a fog of technicalities.

Of course, the greatest example of this tactic was her husband's parsing of the word "is" when called out for saying things like "there is no improper relationship" with a White House intern. Only under oath did he explain that it was technically true if you understand "is" to be a statement about the present moment, unlike "was."

The rest of the CNN interview was a farrago of misleading statements, blame-shifting and deceptions. Hillary insisted she had only used "one device" for email, when we now know that's not true. Perhaps under oath she would clarify that she meant "one device at a time."

She proclaimed that she broke no rules by using a personal server and other email chicanery. The Washington Post's Fact Checker column gave her "three Pinocchios" (out of a possible four) on those claims.

Clinton even flatly denied that voters distrust her when polls clearly show Americans do, and — as usual — blamed all her problems on right-wing conspirators.

Reacting to the interview, Carl Bernstein, of Woodward and Bernstein fame, offered an odd analysis of Clinton's deceptions, conceding on CNN that Clinton has a "difficult relationship with the truth."

"We have to look at what politicians do generally in terms of fudging," Bernstein added. "It's endemic in the profession. She's become a kind of specialist at it."

He went on to explain that Clinton had to become a specialist because she's a victim of her husband's peccadilloes — what Bernstein called the "peculiarity of the Clinton situation." Because Bill catted around, "She's been in a difficult position."

It was a strangely forgiving argument from a reporter who made his career by exposing presidential deceit. And while it's certainly true Bill put Hillary in some awkward predicaments, his philandering doesn't explain why she lied on issues ranging from her cattle futures windfall to her stealth server.

But Bernstein is right about one thing: Hillary is a specialist at lying. And that's a problem for her. Her husband was — and is — a prodigy at deceit, a renaissance man of lying. If football were a game of lies, he could play every position on offense and defense.

Hillary Clinton, alas, is more like a veteran coach — she's adept at telling others how to lie on her behalf. But she's not a natural liar herself, and it shows. At a time when the Democratic base craves authenticity (hence the mobs at Bernie Sanders rallies), Clinton seems utterly fabricated (hence her inability to get a capacity crowd at her announcement speech last month in New York City). Her best hope now would be to stop pandering to Sanders' fans and instead explain where she and Sanders differ on policy. But that would require a level of political authenticity she's forgotten how to fake convincingly.

Not Feeling the Bern // US News and World Report // Matthew Dickinson – July 10, 2015

Can you feel the Bern? Maybe not.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders' presidential campaign is "surging", according to multiple media reports. His campaign events have been attracting huge crowds, including 10,000 – the largest of the campaign season so far – at a Bernie rally last week in Madison, Wisconsin, and another 7,500 this week ago in Portland, Maine. He has also been raking in the cash – some $15 million in the first three months of his candidacy – via small campaign donations, a testament to his broadening appeal.

This surge has been reflected in his polls in Iowa and New Hampshire, the sites of the presidential campaign's first caucus and primary, respectively. In Iowa, Sanders has closed to within 19 percent of the front runner Hillary Clinton in the latest poll, up from a 40 percent deficit to her in earlier surveys. He's even closer to Clinton in New Hampshire, with the most recent poll showing him trailing by 8 percent, prompting one enthusiastic headline writer to proclaim they were in a "dead heat" in the Granite state. Nationally, Sanders has consistently ranked second in polls, with only Vice President Joe Biden, who so far has shown no evidence that he is interested in running, challenging him for this spot.

The combination of large crowds, more money and stronger polls has prompted the national media to give Sanders a second look. To their credit, this time they are focusing less on essays he wrote four decades ago or his aborted singing career and more on his stance on the issues. To be sure, they still seem skeptical that he can win, but they are now at least willing to acknowledge the possibility, however remote. In Sanders' home state, of course, belief that he is surging runs far deeper, with Vermont media outlets openly speculating whether (and no doubt secretly hoping) he can maintain his presidential momentum. Apropos that sentiment, a local reporter asked me today why, if Bernie wasn't a viable candidate, she couldn't find anyone in the state who wasn't supporting him!

So should Hillary Clinton be worried? The short answer is no. To be sure, as Clinton learned in 2008, it is wise never to take one's front-runner status for granted. Accordingly, she and her aides are saying all the right things by publicly acknowledging that Sanders is a serious candidate who poses a potentially significant threat to her bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. The reality, however, is that rather than exceed expectations, Sanders has done about as well as I expected he would to this point, given where he has positioned himself within the Democratic field.

My expectations were predicated in part on the existing distribution of preferences among likely Democratic voters, and how they matched up with Sanders' ideological leanings, but also on previous efforts by progressives to win the Democratic nomination. As I wrote when Sanders first announced his candidacy three months ago, he is not the first Vermont favorite son to set his eyes on the White House in recent years. In 2004, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean threw his hat in the ring, positioning himself, much like Sanders, as the progressive Democrat amid a cast of more centrist opponents such as John Kerry and Richard Gephardt. In Dean's case, there was no Clinton-like political heavyweight standing in his path to the White House and he initially attracted strong support in the polls and in media coverage based in part on his imaginative use of the Internet to organize online meetups of "Deaniacs" and to solicit small-dollar donations, much as Bernie has done. And yet Dean was never able to attract much more than 30 percent support in national polls and his candidacy peaked shortly before the Iowa caucus, where he subsequently imploded.

Despite the recent up swell in media coverage, the fact is that Sanders' road to the nomination is probably steeper than was Dean's. Keep in mind that, as of today, Sanders is still drawing less than 20 percent support nationally, compared to Clinton's almost 60 percent. So he has a way to go to even match Dean's showing, never mind threaten Clinton. To be sure, there are differences between Dean and Sanders. Although Dean attracted strong support among progressive Democrats based largely on his opposition to the Iraq war, on economic issues, such as income inequality, his liberalism was never truly as authentic or as deeply-rooted as Sanders'. But the reality is that for Bernie to win the Democratic nomination, he is going to need to expand his support beyond his natural constituency of aging Grateful Dead hipsters, environmentalists and professors.

In particular, he has to demonstrate some appeal among moderate and conservative Democrats. This includes the racial and ethnic minorities of low-to-middle socioeconomic standing who proved so crucial to Obama's ability to defeat Clinton in 2008. Right now Sanders is trailing Clinton by 40 percent in the crucial state of South Carolina, which holds its primary directly after New Hampshire. Among African-Americans, who make up about a quarter of the registered Democratic vote there, he's polling at an anemic 3 percent, compared to Clinton's more than 50 percent support.

He's not doing much better nationally among these key voting blocs, including racial minorities and older, more moderate Democrats. In the latest Economist/YouGov national survey of registered voters, Bernie receives only 10 percent support among African-Americans and 15 percent among Hispanics, compared to Hillary's 53 percent and 39 percent respectively. Keep in mind that in past elections racial minorities constituted more than a third of Democratic primary voters.

Perhaps more worrisome is the fact that he trails Clinton among self-identified liberals by 44 percent to 32 percent. His strongest support comes from those earning more than $100,000 a year, where he ties Clinton in support at 25 percent in the Economist poll, and among the18-29 year-old crowd which, not incidentally, is the least likely to vote in national elections. These results are consistent with other national polls in the field at approximately the same time. And while it is true that Sanders is attracting his fair share of campaign contributions, the fact remains that Clinton is outraising him three-to-one. Perhaps most tellingly from the Democratic Party's perspective, Clinton has taken an early lead in endorsements, including backing from Vermont Gov. Peter Shumlin and the state's senior Sen. Patrick Leahy.

The bottom line is that Bernie's recent "surge" is largely a case of a candidate securing his natural coalition of support. But there's little evidence so far to suggest that he is going to expand his base beyond the Ben and Jerry's crowd and significantly cut into Clinton's larger and more diverse constituency. Of course, these facts won't stop pundits from engaging in the "what if" scenarios that are the staple of political talk shows, particularly if no other viable Democrat (Joe Biden, where are you?) arrives on the scene. The media loves a horserace, after all, even a lopsided one, and the thought of Clinton running roughshod across a weak Democratic field is not a particularly interesting narrative. So expect pundits to tout the Sanders' horse until a stronger ride appears. But the reality is that rather than exceeding expectations, Sanders, so far, is doing about as well as one would anticipate given his stance on the issues and the configuration of preferences among likely Democratic voters. And, barring an unexpected turn of events, that's probably not enough to secure the presidential nomination.

Barack Obama to make historic visit to federal prison // Politico // Nick Gass – July 10, 2015

President Barack Obama will become the first sitting chief executive to visit a federal prison when he goes to El Reno, Oklahoma, next week to meet with law enforcement officials and inmates as part of the administration's push for criminal-justice reform.

"Next week the president will underscore the administration's focus on the need to reform and improve America's criminal justice system," White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest said during Friday's news briefing.

Obama will speak to that on Tuesday when he addresses the NAACP conference in Philadelphia before stopping at the medium-security federal facility in Oklahoma on Thursday.

"While there, the president will meet with law enforcement officials and inmates and conduct an interview with Vice" for a documentary set to air later in the fall on HBO.
Vice founder Shane Smith, who will host the special, said the documentary is "going to be fascinating."

"Visiting El Reno with President Obama — the first-ever visit to a federal prison by a sitting president — will give our viewers a firsthand look into how the president is thinking about this problem, from the policy level down to one on one conversations with the men and women living this reality," Smith said in a statement.

Obama is also expected to issue executive orders next week commuting the sentences of non-violent drug offenders.

Confederate flag comes down for good at S.C. Statehouse // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 10, 2015
With thousands looking on, the Confederate flag at the South Carolina Statehouse came down permanently on Friday morning.

The flag was removed in a short ceremony by an honor guard of the South Carolina Highway Patrol as onlookers chanted "USA!" and "Take it down!" A small number of protesters were also present. Gov. Nikki Haley, civil rights activists, other state leaders and their families looked on from the Statehouse steps.

Calls to remove the flag had mounted in the wake of the June 17 deaths of nine black churchgoers, including beloved state Sen. Clementa Pinckney, in Charleston, when pictures emerged of the alleged shooter posing with a Confederate flag license plate and other racist symbols.

The lowering of the flag caps three weeks of soul-searching in the state that culminated with a dramatic early-morning vote in the South Carolina House on Thursday to pass a bill mandating the flag's removal. Haley signed the bill in a joyous ceremony at the Statehouse on Thursday afternoon.

Two other South Carolina governors, Republican David Beasley and Democrat Jim Hodges, have attempted to take down the flag, which was first flown from the top of the Statehouse dome in 1962 in defiance of federal desegregation efforts. Beasley failed to remove the flag after calling for it to come down in 1996, and lost his 1998 reelection as a result of backlash from white voters.

Hodges helped broker a compromise that moved the flag from the dome to a pole in front of a Confederate war monument on the building's north lawn, where it flew from 2000 until Friday morning.

On Thursday, an ebullient Beasley, who had returned to Columbia for the bill signing, told POLITICO, "Love transcends division. It's the most powerful weapon in the history of the world."

After it came down from the pole, the flag was carried in a side door of the Statehouse. It was to be placed in a van and moved to the Confederate Relic Room inside the nearby South Carolina State Museum.

OPM director resigns amid data breach scandal // Politico // Sarah Wheaton and T al Kopan – July 10, 2015

President Barack Obama accepted the resignation of OPM Director Katherine Archuleta on Friday amid widespread criticism of her office's handling of a massive data breach that exposed the personnel records of more than 22 million people.

The move was an abrupt reversal and a rare public punishment by a White House that has generally resisted political pressure the make speedy leadership shakeups. But as the official toll of the data breaches grew – up from around 4 million records in a single attack revealed last month to more than 22 million over two infiltrations — the bipartisan calls for Archuleta's ouster became overwhelming.

Archuleta resigned of her "own volition," White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest said Friday. "She recognizes, as the White House does, that the urgent challenges currently facing the Office of Personnel Management require a manager with a specialized set of skills and experiences."

Members of Congress cheered the move – even as experts in government management and cybersecurity questioned whether removing Archuleta would actually help fix the problem, which originated well before her tenure began in 2013.

"This is the right move for the agency and all those affected by the breach," said Senator Mark Warner, who became the most prominent Democrat to call for her removal on Thursday, in a statement. "The focus now needs to be on fixing the problem and protecting those impacted."

Warner's voice joined those of the top three Republicans in the House on Thursday, as well as Senator John McCain, in demanding that Archuleta step down after the administration revealed that hackers had gained access to background check information from almost everyone who has applied or taken a job with the federal government over the past 15 years. They joined a growing chorus of officials that began in June, after Archuleta deflected blame for the situation during a House Oversight Committee hearing in June, saying decades of neglecting government security systems was at fault.

"I am as distressed as you are about how long these systems have gone neglected," Archuleta said, adding that she had made upgrading the systems a priority and that the breaches were discovered as part of that upgrade process. "The whole of government is responsible and it will take all of us to solve the issue."

As late as Thursday night, the White House agreed with her, maintaining that the president still had confidence in her leadership.

But on Friday morning, Archuleta announced that she had "conveyed to the president that I believe it is best for me to step aside and allow new leadership that will enable the agency to move beyond the current challenges and allow the employees at OPM to continue their important work."

Her interim replacement will be Beth Cobert, currently the chief performance officer and deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget.

Archuleta had been popular with the bureaucratic rank and file, and the president of a top federal employees union predicted that the upheaval would make it more difficult to fix OPM's IT issues.

"Federal employees are kind of in a critical state of uncertainty," said National Federation of Federal Employees President William Dougan in an interview. "The volatility of the situation has kind of been escalated."
Cobert will take over as acting director Saturday.

Greece's Parliament Approves Prime Minister's Bailout Plan // NYT // Liz Alderman and Andrew Higgins – July 10, 2015

Setting the stage for a pivotal deal with Europe, the Greek Parliament early Saturday approved Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras's proposal for a three-year, $59 billion rescue package with harsh austerity terms that was remarkably similar to the one Greek voters rejected in a referendum less than a week ago.

With a Sunday deadline looming for a decision on the bailout, a crunch point that all sides see as Greece's last chance to avoid bankruptcy and stay in the euro currency zone, the plan passed by an overwhelming margin.

The final vote showed that 251 lawmakers voted for the plan, while the rest of the body's 300 members opposed it, abstained or were absent. But because 17 lawmakers from Mr. Tsipras's coalition did not support the plan — 2 voted no, 8 voted present and 7 were absent — a shuffling of the prime minister's government seemed likely, and some analysts said that it was possible that Mr. Tsipras might resign.

Fears persist that creditors will still doubt that a government with such internal rifts will be able to carry out the tough economic measures it has proposed.

Mr. Tsipras had said that he would resign if he lost the vote in Parliament, which required the support of 151 lawmakers to pass.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The proposal must now win approval from European officials and institutions before negotiations can finally go forward on a comprehensive bailout package.

Lawmakers took up the measure after Mr. Tsipras decided to give in to most of the demands of Greece's creditors. In exchange, he won the chance to negotiate for the new bailout money, on top of about $270 billion Greece has received since 2010, and potential talks to reduce repayment terms on the debt. It might also allow Greece to avoid a catastrophic exit from the eurozone.

Yet even as the vote was debated in the Greek Parliament, influential voices in Germany and Eastern Europe expressed skepticism about whether Greece would follow through on pledges to be more fiscally responsible. And crowds gathered outside the Parliament building in Athens on Friday evening to protest Mr. Tsipras's abrupt U-turn, with many saying they felt betrayed after he had urged them to reject the bailout in the referendum last Sunday.

One of the demonstrators, John Papageorgiou, 45, a math teacher, said he wanted Greece to drop the euro currency because he believed the euro benefited certain countries, like Germany, while putting others, like Greece, at a disadvantage.

Nonetheless, he said, he did not feel betrayed by Mr. Tsipras's compromise efforts, and he thought that the European leaders would recognize that Greece's debt was illegal. His friend Maria Antonopoulou, 44, who works for an electric company, interjected: "We love Tsipras. We needed him as Greeks. We have faith in him. Compared to what we had, he's clean."

The new proposal was given a swift thumbs-up by France and lifted hopes in Brussels that, after months of ill-tempered arguments and fruitless crisis meetings, Greece and its creditors could reach a deal by midnight on Sunday to prevent a fracturing of Europe's currency union.

The goal is not to seal a deal that would immediately provide Greece with new funding, but simply to get a formal green light to start what could be lengthy talks on a new bailout to replace one that expired on June 30. Just the signal to start talks, though, could lift a dark cloud of uncertainty, at least temporarily, and give the European Central Bank cover to perhaps expand recently frozen emergency cash for Greek banks, which have been closed since June 29.

The economy has been in disarray. People have been out of work for years. The banks have been running out of money. It sounds a lot like the Great Depression in the United States. But it is Greece – and in some ways, the situation is worse.

A final agreement is still far from a sure thing. A raft of actors — 19 eurozone finance ministers; 28 European Union leaders, who have been called to Brussels to discuss the crisis on Sunday; and the bureaucracies in Brussels — need to examine the proposal before giving their approval. And there is so much bad blood after months of insults, frustration and failure, there is little faith in European circles in Greece's pledges to carry out measures like tax increases and cuts in pension spending.

Representatives of the main creditors — the International Monetary Fund, the European Central Bank and the other European nations that use the euro — were poring over the Greek proposal on Friday. Their assessments will play a critical role in any decisions by the Eurogroup, an assembly of finance ministers from euro countries, which is to meet in Brussels on Saturday.

Even Mr. Tsipras's party, Syriza, which drafted the proposals with help from French experts, seemed confused, with members voicing concern over measures that the culture minister, Nikos Xydakis, described on Friday as "very tough." Many lawmakers from Syriza, a coalition of left-wing groups, had serious misgivings about the proposal. Mr. Xydakis said in an interview: "No, it's not a better deal. It's a tough deal and the only one we can get right now."

Speaking to members of Syriza on Friday, Mr. Tsipras said his government had a "mandate from the Greek people to bring a better agreement," but "we do not have a mandate to take the country out of the eurozone," an event that would follow a decisive rupture with creditors.

"For six months we fought an uneven war. We suffered losses, but we gained ground, too," he told lawmakers later. But, he conceded, "now a minefield lies ahead of us."

Mr. Tsipras, who last week vowed never to succumb to creditors' terms that he had condemned as the work of "extreme conservative forces," seems to have calculated that it was worth making concessions to secure the proposed three-year, $59 billion bailout loan and the possibility of negotiating easier terms for repayment of the nation's debt. When Syriza began negotiations with creditors after it came to power in January, the objective was a more modest unblocking of about $8 billion from an existing bailout program that has since expired.

"It is largely a capitulation on Tsipras's part to what creditors have been asking for, but is that enough?" asked Raoul Ruparel, co-director of Open Europe, a research group in London. "Germany and some others are very skeptical about anything the Greeks produce, and this goes back to the main problem — a total lack of trust."

While President François Hollande of France welcomed the new proposals as "serious" and "credible," Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany and her key ministers kept silent on Friday, insisting that it was too soon to judge the suggestions now being reviewed by the European Commission, the European Central Bank and the I.M.F.

"We will wait until the institutions examine them and express their opinion," said Steffen Seibert, a spokesman for the German government.

But he repeated Germany's longstanding insistence that all 19 countries that use the euro must follow the rules, a position that has made Berlin resistant in the past to pleas from Greece that demands for tight budgets must be relaxed and debts restructured to prevent the country from suffocating.

Martin Jäger, spokesman for the German finance minister, Wolfgang Schäuble, said the outcome of the Saturday gathering remained "completely open." Both Mr. Schäuble and Ms. Merkel have ruled out writing off any of Greece's debt under what Ms. Merkel has called "a classical haircut," or debt write-down, but they have indicated they might be open to extending payment deadlines and reducing interest rates.

Some of Ms. Merkel's political allies and the governments of Eastern and Central European countries that have taken an even tougher line on Athens than Germany raised doubts on Friday about Greece's readiness and ability to deliver on its new promises, delivered Thursday just before a deadline fixed by creditors expired.

Hans-Peter Friedrich, a member of the Christian Social Union, which is part of Ms. Merkel's conservative bloc, noted the similarities between the new proposal and the one rejected by the Greek people. "That means there are two possibilities: Either the Greek government is tricking its own people, or us yet again," Mr. Friedrich told Deutschlandfunk radio on Friday.

Turkey Arrests 21 Suspected of Ties to ISIS // NYT // Ceylan Yeginsu – July 10, 2015

Under pressure from its Western allies to do more to combat Islamist extremists, the Turkish authorities arrested 21 suspected Islamic State members on Friday, the semiofficial Anatolian News Agency reported.

Among those arrested were three foreigners and two prominent Islamic State supporters known to have recruited fighters in Turkey, the local news media reported.

In early-morning raids in Istanbul and Sanliurfa Province, which borders Syria, the Turkish police seized automatic rifles, large ammunition packs and military uniforms, the agency reported.

Turkey is a NATO member and a longtime American ally, but it has been frequently criticized for its reluctance to play a more active role in combating the Islamic State. Western officials have accused Turkey of a degree of ambivalence toward the militant group, which now controls large parts of Syria and Iraq, and the Turks sometimes give the impression that they see Kurdish autonomy in Syria as a greater threat to their country than the extremists.

"They have a strong stake in things, in stability to their south," Defense Secretary Ashton B. Carter said on Tuesday in Washington. "I believe they could do more along the border."

Thousands of foreign fighters have joined the ranks of the Islamic State over the past year, many of them traveling through Turkey to reach the extremists' self-declared caliphate in northeastern Syria and northwestern Iraq. Pressed by the West to stem the flow, the Turks have detained and deported about 1,500 people trying to reach Syria and have barred more than 14,000 others from entering the country, according to Turkish Foreign Ministry figures. And there have been at least seven smaller police raids across the country in the past two weeks against suspected Islamic State fighters.

Turkey has also stepped up its military presence along the porous Syrian border, deploying additional tanks and troops. But much of that was done after Kurdish forces took control of the Syrian border town of Tal Abyad from the Islamic State in June.

Mr. Carter's critique aside, other senior American officials said on Friday that Turkey's recent actions demonstrated the government's new commitment to fighting the Islamic State, though they said it was too early to say whether the Friday arrests were a major turning point or a symbolic gesture to fend off the Western criticism.

“The Turks are actually trying to do more, and our collective work with them would be vastly aided if we’d stop criticizing them in public,” said one senior Obama administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss confidential assessments. “I don’t think this is a symbolic offering.”

Analysts said that the large-scale raids and arrests on Friday were something new, and were probably based on intelligence obtained from the United States. A delegation of American counterterrorism experts met with Turkish officials in Ankara this week to discuss the fight against the Islamic State.

“Turkey sees Daesh as a major threat, not just to our country but to the entire world,” a government official with knowledge of the issue said on Friday, using the Arabic acronym for the Islamic State. The official spoke on the condition of anonymity in line with government protocol.

Addressing Western criticism that Turkey had been slow to act against the group, the official said, “Antiterrorist operations take time and require comprehensive intelligence gathering and logistics. This is why.”

Aaron Stein, a nonresident fellow at the Atlantic Council, a Washington-based analytical institute, said Turkey might be stepping up its efforts now because it was worried about an Islamic State drive toward the border town of Azaz in northeast Syria.

But he was skeptical that the arrests signaled a major, new antimilitant resolve in Turkey. “The Ebu Hanzala detentions tell us that we have to be cautious,” Mr. Stein said, referring a cleric considered to be the “spiritual leader” of the Islamic State within Turkey, who has repeatedly been arrested and released.

“Much will be determined in the coming days, and whether those arrested face charges and are put behind bars,” Mr. Stein said of the latest raids.

In the Hacibayram neighborhood of Ankara, a known Islamic State recruitment hub, a resident said on Friday that two suspects who were arrested there last week were freed the next day. The resident would not allow his name to be used because he feared reprisals.

“They came back and celebrated the fact that they were only charged for drug abuse,” he said of the two freed suspects. “These arrests will only mean something if these men are locked up for good. They have gone and killed in Syria, then they come back and roam our streets. It’s terrifying.”

World War III Proponent McCain Says It Will Take 'All-Out World War III' To Re-Institute A Military Draft»

During a "tele-townhall meeting " last evening, John McCain was asked by a mother of two sons if he believes the nation will one day re-institute the military draft. It would take an "all-out World War III " to make that happen, McCain responded.

Indeed, if that's true, then a military draft may indeed be a possibility. McCain himself has suggested we are in a "World War III" confrontation with Iran.

In July 2006, McCain appeared on CNN's Larry King Live, where he was asked to respond to this quote from Newt Gingrich: "We're in the early stages of what I would describes as the Third World War and, frankly, our bureaucracies aren't responding fast enough." Here's how McCain reacted to that quote:

> KING: Senator McCain, do you agree?
> MCCAIN: I do to some extent. I think it's important to recognize that we have terrorist organizations which — who are dangerous by themselves, are now being supported by radical Islamic governments, i.e., the Iranians, which makes them incredibly more dangerous because they are trained, equipped, motivated and assisted in every way by the Iranians.

Last October, President Bush himself warned of a coming "World War III " with Iran. "I've told people that if you're interested in avoiding World War III ," said the President. "It seems like you ought to be interested in preventing them from have the knowledge necessary to make a nuclear weapon."

McCain Agreed That "This Is In Fact World War Three." During an appearance on CNN's "Larry King Live," Larry King asked John McCain if he agreed with Newt Gingrich's claim that, "You'd have to say to yourself this is in fact World War III." Subject: [big campaign] Conservatives' Dangerous and Reckless Iran Response

Conservatives' Dangerous and Reckless Iran Response

Washington, D.C. - American conservatives are showing their true colors in their response to demonstrations in Iran. Despite the almost unanimous opinion of serious Iran experts that it would be very harmful to the demonstrators if the United States were seen as directly supporting them, conservative political leaders - such as Mike Pence, Eric Cantor, and John McCain - and thinkers - such as Robert Kagan - have insisted that the United States do just that. Ascertaining the motives of these conservatives is difficult - are they so blinded by ideology that they actually don't recognize that U.S. meddling would play into Ahmadinejad's hands and would potentially further endanger Iranian demonstrators; or are they simply trying to score cheap political points by attacking Obama. But what is clear is that their cries, recommendations, and critiques are reflective of a conservative movement that on foreign policy has run off the rails.

Calling for the United States to directly support the protests - even symbolically - could place the demonstrators in severe danger. The Iranian regime is feverishly attempting to label the demonstrators as western agitators backed by the United States - Iranian state television even used a clip from FOX News in an effort to make this point. Therefore the calls from Pence, Kantor, and McCain are not only just unhelpful but they are a total gift to Ahmadinejad. Furthermore, conservatives seem oblivious to their own record of failure to promote democracy under the Bush administration, as democracy failed to advance and even receded in much of the world. Aggressive sounding talk, threats of force, and an over emphasis on the mere holding of elections served only to strengthen hardliners and undermine the United States.

- Iranians, Iranian Americans, journalists, and Iranian national security experts all agree that the last thing Iranian demonstrators need is U.S. interference. There is an overwhelming consensus among journalists following Iran, experts on Iran, and Iranians themselves that U.S. interference in the current turmoil would strengthen hardliners, and put demonstrators in harm's way:
- Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns: "President Ahmadinejad would like nothing better than to see aggressive statements, a series of statements, from the United States which try to put the US at the center of this." [Former Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns, 6/16/09]
- National Iranian American Council President and Iran Expert Trita Parsi: "I think it's quite reckless to turn this into a political football here in the United States. In reality, this can have severe repercussions on the streets of Tehran, if the protests are being casted as being orchestrated from the United States." [Trita Parsi, 6/16/09]
- Iran Expert and Former NSC Official Gary Sick: "Anything we do or say is going to be interpreted in Iran as interference in their domestic affairs and it will tarnish anyone who is in anyway seen as being supported by the United States." [Gary Sick, 6/15/09]
- Carnegie Endowment Iran Expert Karim Sadjadpour: "[W]e don't want to denounce these elections and insert ourselves into that political process which is playing out in Tehran. Historically, we have unwittingly hurt those whom we've tried to help in the past." [Carnegie Endowment Iran Expert Karim Sadjadpour, 6/15/09]
- Spokesman for the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran Hadi Ghaemi: "It is better for the U.S. not to comment and make itself part of the equation... By supporting one faction versus another, the U.S. would not be helpful at all." [Spokesman for the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran Hadi Ghaemi, 6/15/09]
- Iranian Expatriate via Andrew Sullivan: "I'm an Iranian living in Canada. A few hours ago I talked to my brother who is a student at Sharif University, he was at the big rally yesterday and they were only feet away from Karoubi when they marched from the university entrance to Azadi square. He asked what had Obama had said and I started reading the transcript. When I got to 'the United States can be a handy political football, or discussions with the United States [can be]' my brother sighed and said thank God this guy gets it." [Iranian expatriate reported by Andrew Sullivan, 6/16/09]
- Washington Independent Reporter Spencer Ackerman: "American rhetorical support will immediately become a cudgel in the hands of Ahmadinejad." [Spencer Ackerman, Washington Independent, 6/15/09]

Nevertheless, conservatives endanger protestors in Iran in order to advance narrow political objectives. Despite pleas from Iranians and insistence from experts, conservatives latched on to protests in Iran as a means of attacking the administration, putting both the protests and U.S. interests in jeopardy. Seizing on the instability in Iran as a means to score political points, Congressman Mike Spence (R - IN) introduced a resolution supporting Iranian dissidents, which read: "While the President may be 'troubled by the violence,' he has yet to express the unqualified support of the American people for those who are courageously risking their lives for free elections and democracy in Iran. If the President of the United States will not express our nation's solidarity with the dissidents in the streets of Tehran, then Congress must." Spence's resolution received the backing of conservative leadership, as second-ranking minority Member Eric Cantor (R - VA) issued a statement saying "The Administration's silence in the face of Iran's brutal suppression of democratic rights represents a step backwards for homegrown democracy in the Mideast. President Obama must take a strong public position in the face of violence and human rights abuses." Cantor and Spence's conservative colleagues in the Senate echoed these extreme positions. Long-time foreign policy hawk and occasional conservative ally Joe Lieberman (I - CT) proclaimed: "We as Americans have a responsibility to stand in solidarity with people when they are denied their rights by repressive regimes. When elections are stolen, our government should protest. When peaceful demonstrators are beaten and silenced, we have a duty to raise our voices on their behalf. We must tell the Iranian people that we are on their side." And, as the Politico reports this morning, Sen. John McCain (R - AZ) demanded on NBC that "that the United States should make clear that it backs anti-Mahmoud Ahmadinejad demonstrators in their battle against 'an oppressive, repressive regime.'" [Rep. Mike Pence (R-IN), 6/16/09 . Rep. Eric Cantor (R-VA), 6/15/09 . Sen. Joseph Lieberman (I-CT), 6/14/09 . Politico, 6/17/09]

Conservatives' approach - which is based on dangerous ideology and ignorance of the situation in Iran - would endanger demonstrators and undermine broader U.S. objectives. Commentator Joe Klein remarked that the comments by McCain and his conservative colleagues are consistent with their "dangerous habit of making broad, extreme statements based on ideology rather than detailed knowledge of the situation in Iran and elsewhere." Even right-wing commentator Pat Buchannan condemned the approach taken by congressional conservatives, saying: "When your adversary is making a fool of himself, get out of the way... U.S. fulminations will change nothing in Tehran. But they would enable the regime to divert attention to U.S. meddling in Iran's affairs and portray the candidate robbed in this election, Mir-Hossein Mousavi, as a poodle of the Americans." Nico Pitney of the Huffington Post reported Iranian national television playing clips of FOX News to show that foreign press was trying to divide the Iranian people in order to take advantage of a weakened Iran. Trita Parsi explains their approach is not based on any familiarity with the situation in Iran: "They're [conservatives] coming out and saying that we should side with the opposition, with Moussavi. I'm really curious to know if they've been in contact with Moussavi, and asked him if he thinks that's a good idea. That's the test that we've failed to pass in the past, in the sense that we've made up our mind on what they should want, and then we act. And then, even when it doesn't work out the way that we hoped for, we think that it's their fault, that they did understanding, genuinely, how positive our intentions were. We can't do it this way." [Joe Klein, 6/16/09 . Pat Buchannan, 6/16/09 . Huffington Post, 6/16/09 . Trita Parsi, 6/16/09]

Conservatives claim Obama and progressives don't care about democracy promotion, but after Bush's eight years of failure they have no legs to stand on. Robert Kagan wrote in the Washington Post today that, "[t]he turmoil in Iran since last week's election has confused the foreign policy debate here in the United States in interesting ways. Supporters of President Obama, who until very recently had railed against the Bush administration's 'freedom agenda' and who insisted on a new 'realism,' have suddenly found themselves rooting for freedom and democracy in Iran... His [Obama's] strategy toward Iran places him objectively on the side of the government's efforts to return to normalcy as quickly as possible, not in league with the opposition's efforts to prolong the crisis." Contrary to the claims of Kagan, progressives railed against Bush's "freedom agenda" not because they oppose the promotion of democracy, but because Bush's efforts both totally failed and were pursued in ways that undermined democracy and hurt America's national interests. The invasion of Iraq is the most clear example of neoconservatives efforts to promote democracy through the barrel of a gun. Yet it was the Bush administration, by giving only insubstantial and inconsistent support for democracy promotion that damaged democracy promotion efforts abroad. When the Bush administration was not invading countries to promote "freedom," its democracy promotion efforts were almost solely based on calling for elections. In the Middle East, from Iraq to Lebanon to the Palestinian territories, the Bush administration pushed elections, while ignoring the need to support liberal institutions, individual rights, rule of law, and the role of civil society that are necessary to build long-lasting democracy. Meanwhile, President Bush kept silent on the various illiberal policies of nations like Russia and Pakistan, where the president preferred a policy based on personal relationships with the dictatorial leaders. [Robert Kagan, 6/17/09 . Washington Post, 8/20/08 . Washington Post, 8/27/08]

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Last night around 9PM five people died when a passenger train carrying 238 passengers and five crewmembers derailed in Philadelphia, PA, forcing Amtrak to shut down all service between New York City and Philadelphia. A sixth person was reported dead this morning and 8 remain in critical condition.

In political news the Senate voted Tuesday to block action on a crucial "trade promotion authority" bill, delivering a setback to President Obama, who strongly supports the bill. The Washington Post Editorial Board calls on Hillary Clinton to take a position on trade saying, her "performance on trade so far implies that it's just about winning the nomination."

Congressman Gowdy is expected to say whether he'll accept Hillary Clinton's offer to appear once before his committee next week. The likely answer will be 'no' and this will delay the process again.

A CBS News piece highlighted last week's CBS/New York Times poll that found that both Hillary Clinton's favorability ratings and the percent of people who see her as a strong leader have jumped in the month since questions about the Clinton Foundation began mounting. Her favorability rating leapt from 26 to 35 percent, and the number of people who see her as a strong leader jumped from 57 to 65 percent.

Bill de Blasio Elizabeth Warren have been labeled as the voice of the liberal opposition, and yesterday unveiled a "Progressive Contract With America" alongside dozens of fellow travelers in Washington, D.C. The Daily Beast characterized the Hillary Clinton campaign as "yawning" in response.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

NBC had a segment on Jeb Bush's support for the Iraq war discussing his controversial comments from earlier today. There was no 2016 coverage on ABC or CBS. They instead covered the American military helicopter with six marines, helping in the aftermath of the earthquake in Nepal, is missing; the NFL's lead investigator making critical statements about Tom Brady; Homeland Security agents raided a clothing drive that was a front for weapons trafficking.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton, MIA on trade // WaPo // Editorial Board - May 12, 2015

FORTY-FOUR senators in the Democratic caucus voted Tuesday to block action on a crucial "trade promotion authority" bill, delivering an embarrassing setback to President Obama, who strongly supports the bill — and, more importantly, sowing doubts about U.S. leadership among friends and foes around the world. Leaders of both parties swore that this would not be the final word, that they would find a face-saving exit from the arcane procedural conflict that Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) is using as a fig leaf for the ascendant anti-trade agenda within his party.

As it happens, they are probably right, in part because there are still enough Democrats in the Senate (in addition to the one, Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, who had the guts to vote against Mr. Reid on Tuesday) who favor trade. Still, it's remarkable how much power the anti-trade left wing of the Democratic Party has come to wield within the Senate, which historically was a bastion of bipartisan pro-trade sentiment. Mr. Obama wants trade promotion authority — "fast-track" authority — to grease the legislative skids for his proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership, a measure that would enhance U.S. exports to Asia, as well as security ties to key nations such as Japan. Progressives oppose the trade deal on the spurious grounds that it would kill American jobs.

So powerful has the opposition on the left become, in fact, that it has turned the party's presumptive presidential nominee, Hillary Clinton, into a quiet follower on the issue, rather than the forceful leader she once was — and still could be. While her opponents for the Democratic nomination populistically posture, all she has mustered are a couple of anodyne remarks. "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security," she said in a recent visit to New Hampshire.

Ms. Clinton's dash for the tall grass is transparently inconsistent with the position she embraced as Mr. Obama's secretary of state. "Our hope is that a TPP agreement with high standards can serve as a benchmark for future agreements — and grow to serve as a platform for broader regional interaction and eventually a free trade area of the Asia-Pacific," she wrote in an October 2011 cover story for Foreign Policy magazine. Indeed, given this well-known record, her avoidance now rather insults the electorate's intelligence.

With the president's agenda embattled in the Senate, this would be a good time for Ms. Clinton to abandon her political caution and speak up for what she said so recently were her principles. In refusing to take a stand, Ms. Clinton is not only abandoning the president she once served but also missing an opportunity to help define the values of the party she would lead in November 2016.

Do independent voters care about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation? // CBS News // Jake Miller - May 12, 2015

Republican candidates are on the warpath against the Clinton Foundation, raising questions about whether Hillary and Bill Clinton sold influence to foreign entities in exchange for donations to their sprawling philanthropy.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul told Politico the Clintons accepted "thinly-veiled bribes."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Are you going to trust an individual who has taken that much money from a foreign source?" asked former Texas Gov. Rick Perry during a recent interview on CNN. "Where's your loyalty?"

"At the very least, these revelations present a clear conflict of interest," added Texas Sen. Ted Cruz last month in a statement. "I call on Hillary Clinton to return the donations from foreign governments. Until she does, how can the American people trust her with another position of power?"

Journalists have followed the money trail as well, examining whether Hillary Clinton took any actions as secretary of state that benefited donors to the Clinton Foundation. That question was thrust back into the media spotlight last month by a new book called "Clinton Cash: The The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich." The author of that book, conservative Peter Schweizer, has admitted he found no "smoking gun" pointing to tangible wrongdoing by the Clintons, but he's argued their "pattern of behavior" suggests a quid pro quo.

The Clintons themselves have strongly denied any wrongdoing and accused Republicans and the media of hyping unsubstantiated claims about a foundation that does a lot of valuable charity work around the world. Bill Clinton has argued the scrutiny shows he and his wife are held to a different standard than many other public figures.

If nothing else, though, the kerfuffle has presented a big political headache for Hillary Clinton as her 2016 presidential bid is taking flight. But with Clinton likely to seize the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, is there any indication the issue is resonating with the swing voters who will decide the election?

Thus far, it doesn't seem to be taking much of a toll. A CBS News/New York Times poll released last week found that both her favorability ratings and the percent of people who see her as a strong leader have jumped in the month since questions about the Clinton Foundation began mounting. Her favorability rating leapt from 26 to 35 percent, and the number of people who see her as a strong leader jumped from 57 to 65 percent.

It's still possible the issue could begin to erode her poll numbers, though - 55 percent of independent voters said they did not yet know enough about the foundation's fundraising to render an opinion on its integrity. If opinions among that bloc begin to harden, either for or against the Clintons, it could make an appreciable difference in the outcome of the 2016 election.

CBS News talked to twelve of those poll respondents - independent voters who have not decided how they plan to vote in 2016, and who have said they need to know more about the foundation before forming an opinion on the matter. During a follow-up conversation, these voters were asked whether they plan to investigate the issue further and whether any information they find will factor into their 2016 decision. The results, together forming a kind of virtual focus group, suggest the issue won't be too big a hurdle for Clinton come Election Day, barring a more scandalous revelation over the course of the campaign.

Most respondents seemed willing to give the Clintons the benefit of the doubt, disputing the idea that they would leverage their influence on behalf of foundation donors.

"I don't believe that a donation from a foreign country or dignitary will have that big of an effect on decision making for the country," said Jerome, a 63-year-old from California.

"If they were directly selling influence, you know, through the secretary of state's office, then yeah, that would probably be a deal breaker for me," said Michael, a 35-year-old Arizonan who works in the restaurant industry. That said, he added, there's a "lack" of a smoking gun. "A lot of it is based off of that book written by that author that has done nothing but trash the Clintons," he explained. "The snippets that I have read from his book, they're baseless. They basically connect a few dots that shouldn't be connected, you know. He uses a lot of, you know, just guessing, to connect two dots."

Several suggested the whole episode is much ado about nothing, arguing there are more important considerations facing voters than charitable donations to the Clinton Foundation.

"There are bigger issues on the table," said Alex, a 35-year-old writer from Texas who said she's not seen any evidence of wrongdoing, and that she's "satisfied" all of her questions about the issue have been answered

"I don't see it being that big of an issue," agreed Andrew, a 28-year-old physician from Oklahoma who suggested other candidates have their own controversies. "It's politics and all politics has, you know -- it's always something."

"Of course if it's some enormous scandal or fraud or something, I'm sure that would affect me more," Andrew added.

Ruth, an 84-year-old from New York, said the issue would "certainly" play a role in her vote, though she did not indicate which way she's leaning. "There are questions about the funding and how it was used," she explained. "I think all that enters...into a judgment as to what kind of a person this is, how they use their funds."

Some voters suggested Hillary Clinton would be able to distance herself from any questions of impropriety -- that she couldn't be expected to monitor all the foundation's activities, and that her husband deserves more scrutiny on the issue than she does.

"This is more affecting what former President Clinton has done, for his charity, causes, and things like that, rather than what Mrs. Clinton, and how she's been involved with it. Because I think she's been more involved in government, more than what her husband has, since he's left office," said John, a 63-year-old retired chauffeur from New York. "One person doesn't know everything. To hold one person accountable for what goes on like in a foundation, that's unrealistic."

Others nodded at a reservoir of trust and goodwill that the Clintons have earned during their long time in public life. Mary, a 52-year-old nurse from Massachusetts, initially told the pollsters that she did not have enough information to render a verdict, but that she's since heard all she needs to know.

"I just saw something last night on TV and it was regarding Bill Clinton making a statement, so he brought me up to speed," she said. "I thoroughly trust the Clinton family, and I believe that that foundation is on the up and up, I never had a hint of thinking Hillary, or Bill, or [the foundation] would be other than the up and up. I have a good feeling of the Clinton family, and I don't think they'd ruin their integrity,"

Mary blamed the controversy on a "smear campaign" by Clinton's opponents and suggested it would "in no way" alter her opinion of Bill or Hillary. "I have a good feeling of the Clinton family, and I don't think they'd ruin their integrity."

Almost all of the voters said they were leaning toward supporting Clinton, though several allowed that subsequent developments could prompt them to reconsider.

"She's, in my mind, like the person I'd vote for given the other candidates, but, like I said, a lot can change between now and then," explained Andrew, the Oklahoma physician.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Unless someone else come into it, she's probably my best bet," said John, the retired chauffeur from New York. "Just because of her experience."

"I'm leaning towards voting for her, I would like to have Hillary in there just from hearing what she says - her views on everything," said Justin, a 31-year old from West Virginia who works in real estate and property maintenance. "But I need to figure out what this scandal is all about, and that will be the deciding factor for me."

"I would ultimately vote for her over pretty much any candidate you can name coming from the Republican Party," said Michael from Arizona.

"I'm leaning towards Hillary Clinton," agreed Alex from Texas. "I haven't seen any other candidate that suits my needs as a voter, that represents me."

Even voters who said they're leaning against Clinton suggested the questions surrounding the foundation are not foremost in their mind.

"As long as the money is going for what it's supposed to go for, I don't have a problem with that - the charitable work," said Kim, a 46 year old from Arizona. "There's bigger issues on the table. I probably would not be voting for her."

Of course, at this early stage in the election, the electorate is relatively tuned out - political geeks are following the story intensely, but most voters aren't political geeks.

"I'm really busy," said Andrew from Oklahoma. "I can't keep track of every single thing between now and 2016. You know, like I said I'll look at it close to that time and...make a decision then."

"Truthfully, I've read a little about it, but I couldn't care less," said William, a 24-year-old from New York. The election is "too far in the future, really. There are so many things that can happen."

Is New Hillary Clinton Super-PAC Pushing Legal Boundaries? // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein - May 12, 2015

A second, semi-official super-PAC is being formed to help Hillary Clinton, and in an unusual twist, has announced plans to coordinate with the Democratic presidential front-runner's campaign.

The move is the latest manifestation of a new trend in 2016 politics: the outsourcing of routine campaign functions to outside groups that are permitted to raise money in unlimited amounts. Candidate committees are limited to donations of $5,400 a campaign cycle from individuals. Last month, the Associated Press reported that all-but-declared Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush will be running much of his campaign through a super-PAC.

Clinton's newest super-PAC ally, Correct the Record, is spinning off from American Bridge, another super-PAC that formed four years ago and that conducts opposition research on Republican presidential hopefuls. Correct the Record, which has been serving as a rapid-response team to defend Clinton since November 2013, is being recast as an independent super-PAC that will continue to serve as “a political research and communications war room,” the group said Tuesday.

What’s unusual is that Correct the Record plans to coordinate with the Clinton campaign and potentially other federal campaigns and Democratic party committees—something that quickly drew skepticism from watchdogs who find it difficult to see how the group can function without running afoul of campaign finance laws. Those laws are designed to prevent committees that collect big-dollar contributions from having direct contact with campaigns.

Correct the Record's plans to coordinate with Clinton's team amount, at the very least, to a "campaign finance law boundary-pushing" arrangement, said Paul S. Ryan, senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center. As a super-PAC, the group "cannot make any contributions to a candidate directly or in kind," he said.

Correct the Record's communications director, Adrienne Watson, defended its approach, arguing that "FEC rules specifically permit some activity—in particular, activity on an organization's website, in email, and on social media—to be legally coordinated with candidates and political parties."

She added: "This exception has been relied upon countless times by organizations raising non-federal money." The group's lawyer, who declined to be named for the record, pointed to nonprofit issue-focused groups like the National Rifle Association and the Sierra Club, which can communicate with candidates and convey their views through press releases or on websites, as playing a similar role.

If Correct the Record follows through on its plans to bulk up its existing rapid response and research structures, it could allow Clinton campaign to outsource some of the functions that have typically been part of presidential campaigns to a group that can collect dollars in much larger denominations than she can legally. That could mean that Clinton's campaign committee could focus its more funds elsewhere.

A Democratic lawyer supportive of the Correct the Record-Clinton campaign alliance dismissed the argument that the group's work would amount to an in-kind contribution, saying it's no different than a state political party doing rapid response to defend a presidential candidate.

Correct the Record is the second super-PAC to largely focus on boosting Clinton. The other is Priorities USA Action, the group formed in 2012 to support President Barack Obama's re-election campaign. That group will not coordinate with the Clinton campaign but the candidate and her team have signaled that she welcomes Priorities' efforts. Clinton met last week with a few potential donors to Priorities and former Clinton staffers including her 2008 political director, Guy Cecil, are coming on board to balance the influence of the Obamans still there.

There's at least one preliminary hint that the new super-PAC has the Clinton campaign's blessing too: Correct the Record is represented by lawyers in the Washington office of Perkins Coie and the Clinton campaign's general counsel is Marc Elias, chair of the firm's political law practice.

Regardless of the legal precedents it cites for the coordination it plans with Clinton, Correct the Record will draw plenty of scrutiny. "We will be monitoring the activities of Correct the Record and the Clinton campaign very closely," Ryan said, and CLC will file complaints not only with the Federal Elections Commission but with the Justice Department, if it believes that campaign laws have been violated.

Gowdy vs. Clinton, no end in sight // Politico // Lauren French – May 13, 2015

Trey Gowdy and Hillary Clinton are locked in a high-stakes game of cat-and-mouse that is threatening to drag on deep into the 2016 campaign.

Depending on which side you talk to, it's either a search for truth in the death of four Americans or a partisan witch hunt to hobble the presumed Democratic nominee. On the ground, the tit for tat is more mundane — a dispute over when, how many times and in which forum Clinton will testify in what promises to be a media circus.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi and the 2016 Democratic presidential candidate have become inextricably linked by the congressional investigation into the 2012 terrorist attacks and related to her use of an email account set up on a private server during her four years as secretary of state.

The latest twist could come this week, when Gowdy, a three-term congressman from South Carolina who was appointed a year ago to lead the Benghazi panel, is expected to say whether he'll accept Clinton's offer to appear once — but only once — before his committee next week.

The answer likely will be no: Gowdy and Republicans wanted Clinton to appear for a private interview with the committee but later offered two public hearings as a compromise.

"The fear was if she was to do two hearings, he would take the information from the first, which would probably be about the emails, and cherry-pick it and use it in whatever way was most advantageous," said Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.), the top Democrat on the Benghazi panel. "This thing has gotten to be too much about Hillary Clinton and far away from what the parents of the victims (of the attacks) asked from us."

At the very least, Gowdy wants the State Department to turn over a trove of documents before scheduling a public hearing with Clinton.

As his negotiations with Clinton's high-powered attorney, David Kendall, continue, Gowdy is going out of his way to avoid the appearance of meddling in presidential politics — no easy task given who he's dealing with. The 50-year-old congressman, a federal and state prosecutor earlier in his career, is eyeing a federal judgeship and hates being tagged as an ideologue.

Since Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) tapped Gowdy to run the Benghazi panel, Gowdy has repeatedly stressed that he's unwilling to risk his reputation as a sincere legislator just to nab a Democratic heavyweight — even if the catch is the presumed Democratic nominee for president.

"This has always been about getting the facts … and the first thing you have to do is establish that you have all the relevant documents," a Republican committee aide said. "That is the only thing he is looking for. … It would probably be easier if he was trying to be political, but he isn't."

When Clinton does finally appear, she'll face a balancing act between the highly message-focused act of running for president and being forthright about the consequences of the Obama administration's decisions in Libya. Clinton's camp has known since the House voted to create the Benghazi select committee in May 2014 that the former secretary of state would be asked to testify — and her allies on the Hill had long predicted that her appearance would come after she announced her candidacy.

Clinton backers say the spectacle of Clinton testifying under oath again about the Benghazi attacks will backfire on Republicans.

"Rep. Gowdy reminds me of my old dog, Gus, who I had when I was a kid in Missouri City, Texas," said Paul Begala, a close Clinton ally. "Ol' Gus loved to chase cars. … Till one day he caught one. Or, rather, one caught him. Before you knew it, Ol' Gus had 5,000 pounds of 1977 Oldsmobile rolling over his head. If I were Mr. Gowdy, I'd be mighty careful. Hillary has the facts on her side, and I suspect the last thing the Republicans truly want are the facts."

Still, the former diplomat also needs to avoid another "What difference does it make?" moment. That animated retort — which came under tough questioning from Republicans during a Senate committee hearing in 2013 — was promptly turned into a sound bite by her adversaries.

Clinton's campaign did not return a request for comment.

Gowdy has been trying to schedule a Clinton appearance for weeks — making multiple offers to the former secretary of state to answer questions in public and private about Benghazi and her use of a non-official email account while at State. Clinton's team has steadfastly refused to appear for more than a single, public hearing.

The latest offer from Gowdy could come within days, after Kendall told the 12-member panel last week that Clinton was ready to appear as early as next week.

"The committee will call Secretary Clinton to testify once it is satisfied that all the relevant information has been provided by both the State Department and her," Gowdy said Friday. His statement came shortly after Kendall accused the Republican-led committee of having "no basis, logic or precedent" for multiple hearings.

Gowdy has zeroed in on outstanding requests for documents and emails from the State Department and Obama administration as the major sticking points in scheduling a hearing with Clinton. Without assurances from the State Department that they have the documents, congressional Republicans have been wary of agreeing to just one hearing.

Aides on the committee have pointed to the committee's discovery of Clinton's private email as proof that it would be ineffective to have her appear, only to discover new evidence later.

But Democrats have seized on the delay as evidence that Gowdy is only interested in damaging Clinton by pushing the probe further into campaign season. Cummings repeatedly has compared the Benghazi panel to the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"At every turn, the select committee comes up with a new excuse to further delay its work and then blames its glacial pace on someone else," he said. "Republicans are desperately trying to validate the $3 million in taxpayer funds they have spent over the past year, but they have nothing to show for it other than a partisan attack against Secretary Clinton and her campaign for president."

Hillary Campaign Yawns at de Blasio // Daily Beast // David Freedlander - May 12, 2015

During a Democratic primary season in which Hillary Clinton's putative opponents have pointedly declined to criticize her, Bill de Blasio has emerged as the voice of the liberal opposition, declining to endorse her on national television on the day she announced her candidacy, traveling to the early primary states to tout his vision for the Democratic Party, and on Tuesday unveiling a "Progressive Contract With America" alongside dozens of fellow travelers in Washington, D.C.

But if all that activity is supposed to rally the Democratic base to pull Clinton to the left, the Clinton campaign would like to thank de Blasio very much for his effort, but says it is unnecessary.

"For her entire career, Hillary Clinton has championed many of the issues included in this contract," said Karen Finney, senior campaign spokeswoman. "She has a long record of pushing for progress on issues like family leave, income inequality, and education, and she looks forward to continuing the conversation around these important topics as she lays out her own ideas in this campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, many of the nearly a dozen Clinton advisers and supporters contacted for this article said they welcomed de Blasio's forays into presidential politics, as so much of what he has been trying to do is create a constituency that dovetailed with Clinton's own record and platform. Most of the issues de Blasio touts in his Progressive Agenda to Combat Income Inequality, like a higher minimum wage and higher taxes on the wealthy, have been pushed by President Obama, to little avail, and Clinton has spoken out in favor of them.

"Hillary Clinton has a long career of advocating for progressive issues—the minimum wage, issues important to women," said Jack Rosen, a New York-based real estate executive and longtime donor to Bill and Hillary Clinton. "De Blasio has a right to speak out on issues he cares about, but Hillary Clinton doesn't need any advice. She has her own inner compass on this."

Tom Sheridan, a top D.C lobbyist and a donor to the Clinton campaign, said that by trying to pressure Clinton from the left, de Blasio was actually creating space for Clinton to position herself as palatable to the broad middle.

"He is giving her running room and new ways to position herself on these issues," he said. "I think it's all good, I really do. You have people trying to put pressure on the left wing and the right wing, and Hillary gets to show that she knows how to fly the plane, so to speak."

"If the purpose of this is to put pressure on our candidate, there are better ways to do it, and it's unnecessary anyway."

Polls show that Clinton remains strongly popular with even the most liberal elements of the party, though grassroots organizers continue to push Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren as a populist challenger to her. Robert Wolf, a former CEO of UBS Americas and friend of Obama who has already signed on to the Clinton campaign financial operation, predicted that the impact of de Blasio's press conference Tuesday on the Clinton campaign would be minimal, especially once Clinton flushes out more of her own agenda.

"To me the candidates that are talking about real issues like the secretary last week on immigration versus trying to rally the far left or the far right seem to get the most traction to the thoughtful person, as opposed to getting the most media hype of the day," Wolf told The Daily Beast.

Which isn't to say Team Clinton isn't a bit mystified at what de Blasio is doing. The New York City mayor owes his career in part to Clinton, having served as campaign manager for her 2000 run for the U.S. Senate, then parlaying that experience into his first political run. Bill Clinton inaugurated de Blasio as mayor, while Hillary Clinton looked on. "I am proud to come from the Clinton family," de Blasio told reporters after he won the Democratic nomination.

"If he were running for president, that would be one thing, but he is not," said Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic strategist and longtime adviser to both Clintons. "People who hold elective office like to get covered and like to be heard and like to be part of the conversation. I take him at face value."

People in and close to the Clinton campaign say they take de Blasio at his word, that he is not running for president (despite a New York Post report to the contrary). Rather, they assume he is trying either to elevate his national profile and capitalize on a Democratic base yearning for a standard-bearer, or trying to shore up his credentials with progressives in New York in the face of sinking poll numbers and what could be a potentially competitive reelection in 2017.

"I know Bill de Blasio like the back of my hand," said Manhattan borough president Gale Brewer, who served with de Blasio in the David Dinkins administration in City Hall and in the City Council, and who was one of the first New

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

York City elected officials to endorse the Ready for Hillary super PAC that laid the groundwork for another Clinton run.

“He thinks this is part of his official duties as mayor,” she said. “Of course, you elevate yourself when you do that, but in his head it is about elevating the city.”

Brewer said she was supportive of the mayor’s efforts if it meant getting more resources to the city. If it also meant getting Clinton to tack left, well, good luck.

“I don’t think that is helpful,” Brewer said. “She is going to do what she needs to do to win the election. I don’t know too many people who are listening to what Bill de Blasio is saying about Hillary Clinton being to the left or not. They are judging Hillary Clinton on her own pluses and minuses.”

Much of the Democratic establishment backed Clinton long before she was even a candidate, even many of those who appeared alongside de Blasio at his press conference in Washington on Tuesday. If de Blasio’s non-endorsement on Meet the Press was a bit curious, few Clintonistas doubted that he would eventually come around.

“I was with Bill de Blasio in the 2000 Senate campaign. I bumped into him several times in Ohio in 2008 when he was campaigning for Hillary,” said Ann Lewis, a longtime Clinton adviser. “And I fully expect to be campaigning with him again.”

Former Rep. Anthony Weiner, a one-time de Blasio opponent—and whose wedding to a Hillary Clinton aide was officiated by Bill Clinton—agreed. He said de Blasio had every right to step out on the national stage as mayor of New York but that he was not sure exactly what the point of it all would be.

“It takes some hubris here to suggest that Hillary Clinton doesn’t understand the challenges of inequality or the challenges facing our country,” Weiner said. “So what are you going to do, say, ‘I am going to hold my breath until Hillary becomes a good Democrat?’ If the purpose of this is to put pressure on our candidate, there are better ways to do it, and it’s unnecessary anyway.”

GOP battles for Benghazi leverage // The Hill // Martin Matishak – May 13, 2015

Hillary Clinton and Republicans on the House Benghazi panel are battling for leverage surrounding the Democratic presidential front-runner's possible testimony on the deadly 2012 attack.

Both sides are determined to make sure that if and when Clinton testifies to the panel, it is on their side's terms.

Committee Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) is due to consult with Republican leaders and his fellow panel members on Wednesday about how to best respond to a request by Clinton's camp to have her testify only once and not twice as he wanted.

One congressional aide predicted Gowdy would give his response to Clinton before the end of the week.

"I'd be surprised if that didn't happen," an aide said on Tuesday.

The former secretary of State has made it clear that she is willing to testify — but only once. She does not want the fight over the 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi, Libya, to cast a long shadow on her 2016 presidential campaign.

Republicans, for their part, have an obvious interest in extending the Benghazi battle, which could be a lingering distraction for Clinton's campaign.

Both sides face risks as they battle over when and how Clinton will testify.

If Republicans are seen as continually pushing off Clinton's testimony even as she agrees to appear before the panel, it will bolster allegations that the committee is all about politics.

Republicans firmly deny their probe is about politics, even as Democrats on the panel insist it is all about Clinton.

Gowdy "is not interested in the politics of this," the congressional aide said.

"He's made that clear from Day One," the aide said, adding that any possible long-term political risks to Clinton's presidential bid are "not a consideration he has made."

Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.), the panel's top Democrat, rejected that argument. He said Republicans appear to want to drag the process out for as long as possible so that it remains a focus in 2016.

"It does appear we have a situation where Republicans are drawing this entire situation out," he told The Hill. "I think it would be very difficult to draw any other conclusion than it's all about Hillary Clinton."

A risk for Clinton is appearing as if she has something to hide. It's a risk magnified by the controversy over her use of a private email account while she served as secretary of State.

The former secretary of State has gone to lengths to make sure she does not come off as reluctant to appear before the panel.

Clinton, Cummings said, has been willing to “come forth and provide the truth and resolve any questions that the committee might have.”

“It seems like the Republicans can’t take yes for an answer,” he told The Hill.

Cummings, who said he has not been in touch with the Democratic front-runner’s campaign, said he was “sure it’s very frustrating for her to see the goal posts constantly being moved” over when she will testify and about what.

Gowdy has been careful to signal that, while his panel wants to hear from Clinton, its members must first have access to all of the information necessary to question her.

It’s an argument that hints at the controversy over Clinton’s private email server, a topic likely to dominate any appearance she makes before the panel.

An interim report from the Benghazi committee, released on Friday, said it would not call Clinton to testify until “it is satisfied that all the relevant information has been provided by both the State Department and her.”

The congressional aide said Gowdy has “hands down” placed a premium on getting emails from State Department principals, including Clinton, before her appearance.

The committee requested those communications in November and issued a subpoena for them in March.

Without those records “it becomes difficult to question because how do you close the loop?” the aide asked.

Despite the delays, Gowdy doesn’t plan on subpoenaing Clinton to appear.

“From his perspective, it hasn’t come to that, and he’ll cross that bridge if it’s necessary, but so far, it has not come to that. She hasn’t said she’s unwilling to come, so I don’t know why you would subpoena her,” the aide said.

Any impact the investigation might have on Clinton and her White House bid “would only be with regards to what the committee can determine are the actual facts.”

Cummings said he doesn’t know what the GOP wants, as Clinton has already agreed to testify.

“The question is, when does it end?” he asked.

In mid-April, Hillary Clinton announced she was running for President of the United States because everyday Americans and their families need a champion, and she wants to be that champion

Her life's work reflects her middle-class upbringing in Chicago, demonstrates that she is a hard-worker and listener, and proves that Hillary will stand strong for everyday Americans. She has consistently fought to help women and children, the middle class, and the African-American community because she knows that when our families are strong, America is strong.

Like all of us, Hillary is shaped by her parents and her upbringing. At a young age, Hillary's mother was abandoned, and understanding her struggle motivated Hillary's tireless efforts to become a champion for children and families. That's why when she graduated from law school, Hillary chose not to go to a large law firm in a big city. Instead, she knocked doors in New Bedford, Massachusetts for Marian Wright Edelman's Children's Defense Fund. Her on-the-ground work helped ensure that all children, including those with disabilities, had a fair shot at a good education.

Strengthening families and keeping loved ones together has been the bedrock of Hillary's work as a Senator on criminal justice reform, too. By promoting tough but fair reforms of probation and drug diversion programs, pushing an anti-crime plan to cut the number of repeat offenders and reduce the prison population, and championing community policing programs, Hillary has shown time and again that she will fight for fair treatment under the law.

As a co-sponsor of the End Racial Profiling Act of 2001, she fought to prohibit any racial profiling. And by proposing a strong Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) hiring program, Hillary worked to ensure that new community police officers were trained to partner and work with the communities they serve. Bottom line: an important part of her career has focused on creating safe neighborhoods.

Important as well for the African-American community, and all Nevadans, is the feeling that while the economy has come back from collapse, many families still don't feel economically secure. We see those at the top benefiting from the growing economy while wages stagnate and the cost of living increases. Hillary has made clear she will work so that all middle-class families can thrive. So many Nevadans are waiting for it to be their turn; they want someone they can count on who can help them get ahead and stay ahead.

President Obama inherited an economy wracked by the financial crisis, but over the last six years he has made remarkable progress in turning our economy around. Over the last year, according to the Department of Labor, we have added an average of 269,000 jobs per month. The person we can count on to continue this progress is Hillary Clinton.

While we have started to bounce back, we cannot lose sight of the need to grow our economy for everyone. When the deck is stacked in favor of those at the top, we need to reshuffle that deck. CEO pay is through the roof, and yet everyday Americans are not sharing in the success. It is time for our everyday Nevadans to get ahead and stay ahead.

Hillary Clinton is focused on engaging every community, hearing our ideas, and working with us to find solutions. Our country, our state, and our community needs a champion. The middle class needs a champion. Hillary Clinton will be that champion. That's why I'm standing with her as she works to earn your vote.

Hillary Clinton's hedge on trade leaves Obama without political cover // WaPo // David Nakamura - May 12,

The United States' reputation in Asia was suffering under the weight of economic and political turmoil at home when Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton arrived in Hong Kong in the summer of 2011 to reassure American business executives that the future was brighter.

Back in Washington, President Obama was locked in a budget dispute with Congress that would ultimately damage the nation's credit rating. But in remarks to the American Chamber of Commerce, Clinton painted a robust vision of U.S. economic leadership, anchored by an emerging free-trade deal that "will bring together economies from across the Pacific."

The goal of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, she explained, was to "create a new high standard for multilateral free trade," a pact that would cement the United States' standing in the world's fastest-growing region.

Four years later, with Obama making a desperate final push to complete that 12-nation pact, his former partner and most effective global advocate for the deal has gone quiet. As the president has scoured Capitol Hill for elusive Democratic support in recent weeks, Clinton has said virtually nothing about the TPP, other than to point out areas of the deal with which she has concerns.

Senate Democrats blocked legislation on Tuesday that would have given President Obama the power to grant "fast-track" authority to move trade deals quickly through Congress. (Reuters)

Clinton's silence on trade, coming at the worst possible time for Obama, dovetails with her transformation into a presidential candidate eager to align herself more squarely with the liberal wing of her party. In other areas in which Clinton has moved to the left — such as immigration reform and gay marriage — White House aides have been delighted that she has forcefully embraced the president's governing record.

But on trade, Clinton's hedge has left Obama without political cover in his increasingly bitter feud with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and other progressives, who have fiercely opposed the pact as a boondoggle for big business. On Tuesday, a bill to grant Obama "fast track" trade authority failed to clear a procedural hurdle in the Senate, with only one Democrat voting in favor of it. Republican leaders have vowed to try again, but it was an embarrassment for the president.

"One of the biggest proponents of the TPP in the administration now, as a candidate, picking on a couple of technical issues just looks like pure politicking," Ernest Bower, a Southeast Asia expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said of Clinton.

White House aides have refused to criticize Clinton for remaining on the sidelines, noting that the trade pact has undergone changes since she departed more than two years ago. But she has been mocked by her political rivals on both sides of the aisle for her refusal to take a clear position.

"She can't sit on the sidelines and let the president swing in the wind here," House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said on "Meet the Press" last week.

Clinton's campaign pointed to a statement from three weeks ago, in which her spokesman said any trade pact must "raise wages and create more good jobs at home" and strengthen national security. Clinton reiterated those criteria a few days later during an appearance in New Hampshire, her only public comments on the trade deal since launching her campaign.

In many ways, the politics for Clinton are playing out in a fashion similar to 2008, when both she and Obama, competing for support in Rust Belt states during the Democratic primary, distanced themselves from the 1993 North American Free Trade Agreement, signed by President Bill Clinton.

Longtime allies described Hillary Clinton as generally less inclined to support large, multilateral trade deals than her husband was. As a senator, she voted against the Central American Free Trade Agreement in 2005, as did Obama, then also a senator.

“Some people are generally pro-trade or anti-trade. She’s case-by-case on trade,” said Gene Sperling, director of the National Economic Council in both the Clinton and Obama administrations.

With manufacturing-heavy Iowa holding the first-in-the-nation caucuses — which she lost to Obama seven years ago — Clinton would be foolish to actively stump in favor of the president’s trade initiative, allies said.

But this time, the political calculus is complicated by her legacy as the nation’s top diplomat.

Foreign policy analysts have pointed to the Obama administration’s bid to shift U.S. attention and resources toward Asia to counter China as potentially one of Clinton’s most significant achievements as secretary of state.

From the start of her tenure, Clinton made Asia a priority; her first trip in office was a swing through Japan, Indonesia, South Korea and China. Early on, Clinton and her top aides endorsed the TPP to balance the Pentagon’s military buildup in the Asia Pacific region.

Clinton’s team helped elevate the trade pact as a pillar of what Clinton later described, in a Foreign Policy magazine cover story in October 2011, as the administration’s “pivot” to Asia.

“Clearly, we all saw this as strategic,” said James Keith, the U.S. ambassador to Malaysia from 2007 to 2010. Before the administration publicly unveiled its Asia strategy, “there was lots of talk of having to add meat to the bones, not just on security but on economics, too.”

Yet a primary concern Clinton has raised about the TPP after leaving office did not register alarms inside the State Department during her tenure.

In 2009, the agency oversaw a review of a component of U.S. trade policy, appointing a panel of business officials, labor leaders and academics to review the language in the United States’ “model bilateral investment treaty.” That treaty is used by U.S. negotiators in most trade deals.

During the review, which lasted six months, one of the primary disagreements centered on the standard inclusion of a dispute settlement mechanism that allows corporations to sue nations over policies that damage their profits. Under the provision, the cases are heard by an international tribunal that rules outside of domestic legal systems.

To the chagrin of the labor representatives, the dispute mechanism provision remained intact during the State Department review after the business representatives on the panel fiercely defended it.

“I had the feeling that we were a box that was just going to be checked off,” said Kevin P. Gallagher, an associate professor at Boston University who was on the panel. “It was a multi-stakeholder dialogue in which we did not agree with each other, so they just go with the old model."

Warren has made this arrangement — formally known as "investor-state dispute settlement" — a chief part of her objections to the TPP. She has argued that the mechanism potentially exposes U.S. taxpayers to massive monetary damages outside of U.S. courts if corporations sue the government over new laws to protect the environment or workers.

Obama has called her arguments "dishonest," noting that the United States has been sued just 13 times over the provision in previous trade pacts and never lost a case.

In her book "Hard Choices," published last year, Clinton raised concerns that echo Warren's. She cited a case in which the Asia division of tobacco giant Philip Morris sued Australia over a "plain packaging" law, employing the dispute settlement provisions in an Australia-Hong Kong trade pact.

"We should avoid some of the provisions sought by business interests," Clinton wrote.

Robert Hormats, a high-ranking State Department official from 2009 to 2013, oversaw the trade policy review and emphasized that Clinton was not involved in those types of granular policy discussions.

By the time she left office, the general framework for the TPP was already in place. During a speech in Australia in November 2012, Clinton referred to the pact as "the gold standard in trade agreements."

The risk now for Clinton is that if the trade deal fails, the Obama administration's "Asia pivot" strategy risks being viewed as more rhetorical than tangible, foreign policy analysts said, which could lead to a reevaluation of her legacy at the State Department.

"We saw it as a chance to make a difference," Hormats said, reflecting on the Clinton team's early embrace of the TPP. He added, "The weakness of the American economy in the financial crisis led many to assume the U.S. was backing off and incapacitated."

After he and other Clinton aides made trips to China in 2009, Hormats said, "we came back more resolute than ever that we had to do this."

Obama's war of words over trade deal puts pressure on Clinton // Yahoo News // Jon Ward - May 12, 2015

President Barack Obama's decision to escalate his fight with the Elizabeth Warren wing of the Democratic Party over a free trade deal with Asia is unwelcome news for Hillary Clinton.

Former secretary of state Clinton, who is now running for president, had been keeping her head down on the trade issue — and on the fast-track trade authority that Obama is seeking in order to execute the deal. Despite her past support for the Trans-Pacific Partnership deal, which she in 2012 called "the gold standard," she has remained noncommittal on it since announcing her presidential bid.

Labor and progressive groups are eager to see Clinton come out swinging against the deal. But Clinton would open herself up to charges of flip-flopping and cynical pandering if she did so now, given her past remarks and her generally pro-trade positions in the past.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“What would be her reason for opposing it? She hasn’t laid the groundwork for that with any articulation of serious concerns about this trade deal,” said a senior-ranking Democratic congressional aide. “She probably wants fast-track authority if she’s going to be president.”

If Clinton were to vocally back the deal, however, that could give oxygen to one of the other declared or likely candidates for the Democratic nomination, such as Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) or former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, both of whom oppose the deal. And while Clinton at present far outpaces both men in polls, fighting members of her own party on the trade deal could pave the way for union endorsements for her opponents and give them strength on the ground in early-contest states.

“TPP is treacherous territory. It proves that … even without a dozen well-funded primary opponents, she’ll still have to navigate a bunch of tough issues that various segments of her base consider critically important — all without alienating swing voters for the general,” said Dan Newman, a Democratic consultant who is working for California U.S. Senate candidate Kamala Harris and the state’s lieutenant governor, Gavin Newsom.

Union and liberal organizer support for Clinton’s opponents would drain resources, time and energy from her campaign that otherwise could have gone to preparing for a general election.

“Whatever the merits of the TPP, this issue has become a surrogate within the party for a larger debate about corporate power and fairness, which puts her in a difficult spot,” said David Axelrod, a former top political adviser to the president.

“She was the [secretary of state] when these negotiations began, and the previous Clinton administration was closely identified with trade. But it is a volatile issue, and supporting it could add to fears on the left that she is too oriented toward big business and give additional impetus to a potential primary challenger,” Axelrod said.

“In the end, this is one where [Clinton] is going to have to take a gut check and choose. And she would probably do best by choosing the side in which she genuinely believes, even if it buys her some grief,” he noted. Obama “could relieve some of that pressure” on Clinton “by making a compelling case” for the trade deal, he said.

The president should stress “a cooling-off period for review before he signs and another before Congress votes, and specific standards for labor, human rights, and the environment, with the ability of Congress to rescind fast track if the standards are deemed not to be met,” Axelrod said.

When asked if he thought Obama was doing enough to make a “compelling case” for the deal, Axelrod said, “It’s a tough hill to climb. He just needs to keep climbing.”

Obama and the White House have been feuding with Warren for days over her opposition to the trade deal. But during the weekend, the president made his most pointed comments about the liberal Democratic senator from Massachusetts, inan interview with Yahoo News.

Obama told Yahoo’s Matt Bai that Warren is “absolutely wrong” in her opposition to the trade deal and that her warnings of a Republican president using authorities given to the executive in the deal to unwind Wall Street regulations are “made up.”

“It doesn’t make any sense,” he said of Warren’s objections to the bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The president also suggested that Warren's opposition is motivated more by her own ambition than by righteous ideology. "The truth of the matter is that Elizabeth is, you know, a politician like everybody else, and she's got a voice that she wants to get out there."

Warren quickly responded on Monday morning, reiterating her concerns in detail to the Washington Post. It is a quickly intensifying intraparty squabble that will be increasingly hard for Clinton to ignore.

"Given how this is developing, I think she will need to pick a lane," said Iowa Democratic operative Jeff Link.

In Iowa, "we tend to support trade deals," he said, and so if Clinton were to support the deal, it would not hurt her in the first primary or caucus state.

But in the broader Democratic Party, there is money and organization that is poised to punish Clinton if she does step out and take a position in favor of the trade deal.

"Unless there is some miracle compromise to convert the bill's fierce opposition, it's a very risky thing for a candidate to support. Why wade into danger when you can promise to sign a better version as president?" asked Gil Duran, a California political operative who has worked for Governor Jerry Brown. "Any candidate who backs this turkey stands to lose some very important blocs of support."

A Clinton spokesman did not answer a question about whether Clinton would take a position on the issue. In roughly a month as a presidential candidate, Clinton hasanswered only eight questions from the media. She has not spoken with the press in almost three weeks.

Will Bill de Blasio and Elizabeth Warren be able to push Hillary Clinton to the left? // Slate // Jamelle Bouie – May 12, 2015

Thus far, the Democrats' anti-inequality agenda has focused on redistribution. Barack Obama wants free community college and tax credits for child care, congressional Democrats want a $12 minimum wage, and Hillary Clinton has endorsed paid family leave. But scholars at the forefront of the inequality battle want Democrats to go even further.

"To fix the economy for average Americans," writes Joseph Stiglitz and his team of fellow economists in a report for the left-leaning Roosevelt Institute titled "Rewriting the Rules: An Agenda for Growth and Shared Prosperity," "we need to tackle the rules and institutions that have generated low investment, sluggish growth, and runaway incomes and wealth accumulation at the top and created a steeper hill for the rest to climb. It would be easier, politically, to push for one or two policies on which we have consensus, but that approach would be insufficient to match the severity of the problems posed by rising inequality."

In an unequal economy, they argue, it's not enough to redistribute the gains of a tiny, wealthy minority. Even with more programs—more health care, more tax credits—the shape of the economy is the same: The wealthiest individuals and corporations receive the lion's share of national income. And that's by design. "Inequality has been a choice," writes Stiglitz and his team. "Beginning in the 1970s, a wave of deliberate ideological, institutional, and legal changes began to reconfigure the marketplace. ... Get government out of the way and the creativity of the marketplace—and the ingenuity of the financial sector—would revitalize society." Put differently, the "deregulation" of the 1980s and 1990s was really a "re-regulation"—"a new set of rules for governing the economy that favors a specific set of actors."

And it failed. Labor force participation sits at a 37-year low, public and private investment is weak, and tens of millions of Americans struggle with slow growth and low wages. Greater redistribution can ameliorate these problems, but it can't solve them.

For that, you need to rethink the markets themselves. You need new rules to build an economy that delivers more equal results before the government steps in to tax and spend. In short, Stiglitz and company recommend greater financial regulation—ending "too big too fail" and creating greater transparency in financial markets—incentives for long-term business growth (including a financial transaction tax to discourage short-term trading and "encourage more productive long-term investment"); higher taxes on capital gains, dividends, and corporate income; and a national commitment to full employment, through public works and monetary policy. And to deliver more gains to ordinary people, they call for stronger bargaining rights and lower barriers to unionization, criminal justice reform, pay equity, health care reform ("Medicare-for-all"), and a host of new programs for children (universal pre-K, child benefits), retirees, and homeowners (a public option for mortgages).

It is one thing to push Clinton on immigration and criminal justice reform; it's something else to push her toward a fundamental revamp of our economy.

The bulk of this plan is far afield from the mainstream of the Democratic Party. Which means it runs far afield from Hillary Clinton, who stands at the center of the Democratic coalition. What's more, from the Clinton administration to her time in the Senate, Clinton has held close ties to the Wall Street wing of the Democratic Party, which favors the kind of financial deregulation that produced yawning inequality and a catastrophic economic collapse. It is one thing to push Clinton on immigration and criminal justice reform—areas where the coalition has moved to the left. It's something different, and more difficult, to push her toward a fundamental revamp of our economy and its rules.

It helps, however, to have an ally. And the Roosevelt Institute has two in the form of Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren and New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio. Both spoke at the Tuesday event for the new report, urging Democrats—and Republicans, for that matter—to rethink their economic assumptions. "This country is in real trouble. The game is rigged and we are running out of time," Warren said. "We cannot continue to run this country for the top 10 percent." De Blasio touted his agenda in New York City—including universal pre-K and paid sick time for all workers—but urged national action. "We in New York are doing all we can, but we cannot complete the mission without fundamental change in federal policy," he said. "There needs to be not only new debate in this country, but there needs to be a movement that will carry these ideas forward."

To that end, de Blasio took to the Capitol steps Tuesday afternoon to unveil his "Progressive Agenda to Combat Inequality," a deliberate echo to the 1994 "Contract With America" of Newt Gingrich and the congressional GOP. "These 13 progressive ideas," he said, "will make an enormous difference for families all over this country, for everyday Americans." Among the proposals are a minimum wage increase to $15 an hour, national paid sick and family leave, subsidized child care, and "closing the loopholes that allow CEOs, hedge fund managers, and billionaires to avoid paying their fair share in taxes."

There's no doubt Clinton will adopt this language—to an extent, she already has. But will she adopt the policies? Will she go beyond the agenda for redistribution to embrace structural change of the American economy?

The answer to this question depends on power. Is the left strong enough to budge Clinton from her ground in the corporate center of the Democratic Party? It's too early to say—the fight has just begun—but there are signs. Hours after the Roosevelt Institute unveiled its package, the Senate held a cloture vote for a bill that would give President Obama "accelerated power to complete a major trade accord with Asia." On this, Warren has been a strong opponent, denouncing the bill—and the accord itself—as a giveaway to corporate America. The vote failed. Warren peeled away enough Democrats to block cloture and continue debate, a blow to the president's standing.

If this is a fluke, then Clinton can resist the calls from her left. But if it's a sign of the times, then liberals can look forward to a Clinton campaign that sounds a lot like them.

Hillary Is Passing 2016's Biggest Test—and Jeb Is Flunking // The New Republic // Brian Beutler - May 12,

2015

In America, in 2015, large swaths of people with wildly differing political ideologies—and, in some cases, wildly differing factual and analytical premises—are converging on a series of assumptions they didn't always share. The list is long, but it includes the following, timely opinions: that the drug war is a moral and practical failure; that three-strikes laws, mandatory minimum sentences, and myriad other aspects of our criminal justice system are flawed, racially biased, and in desperate need of reform; that the loosening of certain financial regulations in recent decades was disastrous; that the Iraq war never should have happened.

The political establishment hasn't caught up to all of these consensuses, or emerging consensuses, but in most cases the public has, and in each instance the public has outpaced its elected officials. And when you view the aforementioned left-right convergence in light of federal policymaking over the past 20 or 30 years, it reflects poorly on our country's most recent political leaders. Or at the very least, it suggests those political leaders made a number of very consequential decisions while they were in power without thinking past near-term politics. You might believe these errors stem from the inherent difficulties of governing, or from systemic institutional failures, or a mix of both. But the phenomenon is indisputable, and a reckoning with the causes is now inevitable.

Why? Because these issues have moved to the foreground of the country's political imagination just as the most recent president's brother and his predecessor's wife are running for president. In the absence of the Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush candidacies, a new paradigm could prevail without a great deal of bipartisan introspection. Instead, this election will force referenda on the Bill Clinton and George W. Bush presidencies. The coming Democratic and Republican primaries will to a great extent turn on how adeptly and convincingly Jeb and Hillary can explain away or atone for the country's biggest public policy failures in recent memory. Were these mistakes? Were they rational decisions that simply didn't withstand the test of time or have grown obsolete? Or, despite all appearances, is the jury still out?

From an elevated vantage point, the retrospective politics of the 2016 campaign should be easier for Hillary Clinton than for Jeb Bush to navigate. Whatever particular mistakes her husband made in office, the public generally remembers Bill Clinton's presidency fondly, as a time of relative peace and economic growth. He left office popular and has grown more so ever since.

George W. Bush's presidency, by contrast, is widely and correctly understood as a travesty—marred by debt-financed social policy, intelligence failures, the deadliest terrorist attack in U.S. history, grand-scale deception, a gruesome, losing war of aggression— which culminated in the country's worst economic crisis in nearly a century. He became historically unpopular and has only returned to parity, or near-parity, by dint of the afterglow that tends to accrete around presidents after they leave political office.

And yet despite these fundamental differences, both Hillary Clinton and her husband are publicly grappling with the shortcomings of his substantive record, while Jeb Bush, if anything, is embracing his brother's toxic record.

Jeb told funders in New York recently that when it comes to Middle East foreign policy, George is his lodestar. "If you want to know who I listen to for advice, it's him."

More damningly, Jeb told Fox News host Megan Kelly that he still supports the invasion of Iraq.

"Knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion?" she asked.

"I would have," replied.

Jeb's full answer was actually more ambiguous than most political writers, including Washington Examiner's conservative reporter Byron York, are allowing. Though he appeared to suggest that the Iraq war was wise despite false pretenses, he added, “And so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody. And so would have almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got.” But Jeb is painfully aware of the expectation that he’ll disavow George W.’s presidency. “[J]ust for the news flash to the world,” he told Kelly, “if they’re trying to find places where there’s big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons are, by contrast, at pains to scrutinize their own records. Hillary's criminal justice speech last week, in which she called for an end to “the era of mass incarceration” was an implicit rebuke of her husband's former views and her own. Bill himself conceded that mass incarceration (and thus its attendant racial inequities) were partly attributable to a 1994 crime bill that he signed. Republicans, he said, insisted on incorporating the legislation’s tough-on-crime measures, but he was willing to accept them as the price of signing. “The problem is the way it was written and implemented,” Clinton told CNN’s Christiane Amanpour at the Clinton Global Initiative last week, “we cast too wide a net and we had too many people in prison. And we wound up… putting so many people in prison that there wasn't enough money left to educate them, train them for new jobs, and increase the chances when they came out so they could live productive lives.”

Hillary has had a more difficult time explaining how she landed on her belief that same-sex marriage is a constitutional right and explicating her position on free trade (which her husband supported unabashedly), but in both cases her current substantive views depart in obvious ways from her previous ones and thus constitute admissions that—at the very least—time hasn’t been kind to the Democratic orthodoxy of the 1990s, which she helped shape.

Though there’s a strangeness to the spectacle of Jeb embracing his unpopular brother while the Clintons break faith with their former selves, it’s also difficult to see how it could be any other way. Progressivism by its nature isn’t kind to old dogmas, which is why any politician who hopes to remain relevant in progressive politics for decades will have to evolve and atone. Conservatives, by contrast, are wary of precisely this kind of second-guessing. Republicans no longer zealously guard Iraq as a war of patriotic necessity, but they will sooner admit that Obamacare isn’t a complete failure than that Iraq was a mistake on its own terms.

And here the dynastic differences between the Bushes and the Clintons further complicate matters. Unlike the Bushes, the Clintons don’t have a political ancestry. You can believe that they admit error now because they learn from their mistakes or simply because it’s the path of least resistance to power, but they aren’t the reflexive defenders of Bill’s every decision the way the Bush family must be of George W.’s.

That’s partly attributable to the unusually bad record George W. amassed over eight years—it’s ironically easier for the Clintons to admit select errors when they can defend Bill’s record in general. But it’s also partly attributable the fact that the Clintons just aren’t like the Bushes. As The New Republic’s Rebecca Traister wrote recently, “There are big differences between being born into a position of political privilege and marrying someone who becomes politically powerful.” One of those differences is that you don’t have to treat the family name as if it’s a precious stone that must constantly be burnished.

A further irony is that these apparently liabilities—the dynastic heritage, the conservative reluctance to second guess—each work to Bush’s advantage in Republican politics. But when conservatives fret that nominating a Bush will neutralize one of Hillary Clinton’s only big weaknesses, this—the inherent awkwardness of squaring the recent historical record with the current state of public opinion—is exactly what they have in mind.

Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton and authorizing the war in Iraq // PolitiFact // Amy Sherman – May 12, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush’s comments on Fox News about the Iraq War brought up more questions than answers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Did Bush fully understood the question posed by Megyn Kelly on May 10? We'll go straight to the transcript.

Kelly: "On the subject of Iraq, very controversial, knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion?"

Bush: "I would have, and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody, and so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got."

Kelly: "You don't think it was a mistake?"

Bush: "In retrospect, the intelligence that everybody saw, that the world saw, not just the United States, was faulty. And in retrospect, once we invaded and took out Saddam Hussein, we didn't focus on security first, and the Iraqis in this incredibly insecure environment turned on the United States military because there was no security for themselves and their families. By the way, guess who thinks that those mistakes took place as well? George W. Bush."

His remarks drew considerable attention: Was Bush saying that even knowing the intelligence was faulty, even he and Clinton would have gone to war anyway?

After the interview aired, Kelly said, "I do think, in fairness to Gov. Bush, when I said 'knowing what we know now would you have invaded Iraq,' I think he was trying to answer the question: 'Do you think it was a mistake at the time?' " she said. "That was my take on it in the interview. He wasn't trying to say, 'Still today I don't there is an issue.' "

Bush went on Sean Hannity's radio show May 12 to clarify his remarks.

"I interpreted the question wrong, I guess," Bush said. "I was talking about, given what people knew then, would you have done it, rather that knowing what we know now. And knowing what we know now, clearly there were mistakes as it related to faulty intelligence in the lead up to war and the lack of focus on security. My brother has admitted this, and we have to learn from that."

Of course, it's impossible to know with certainty how people would have acted if history were different. But we suspect Clinton would have answered the question differently than Bush. How candidate Clinton and presidential contender Bush talk about the Iraq war will be a major foreign policy topic in the 2016 race, so we decided to take a look at their statements about the Iraq war.

Hillary Clinton

Clinton has said recently that she regrets her 2002 vote, which ended up being a stumbling block during her 2008 presidential campaign.

In her 2014 book Hard Choices, Clinton said this about her vote:

"While many were never going to look past my 2002 vote no matter what I did or said, I should have stated my regret sooner and in the plainest, most direct language possible. I'd gone most of the way there by saying I regretted the way President Bush used his authority and by saying that if we knew then what we later learned, there wouldn't have been a vote. But I held out against using the word mistake. It wasn't because of political expediency. After all, primary voters and the press were clamoring for me to say that word. When I voted to authorize force in 2002, I said that it was 'probably the hardest decision I have ever had to make.' I thought I had acted in good faith and made the best decision I could with the information I had. And I wasn't alone in getting it wrong. But I still got it wrong. Plain and simple."

On Meet the Press on Sept. 23, 2007, she said, "Well, I cast a sincere vote based on my assessment at the time, and I take responsibility for that vote. I also said on the floor that day that this was not a vote for pre-emptive war. ... Now, obviously, if I had known then what I know now about what the president would do with the authority that was given him, I would not have voted the way that I did." She made similar comments on the Today Show on Dec. 18, 2006: "Obviously, if we knew then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote, and I certainly wouldn't have voted for it."

Her decision in 2002 to vote for the Iraq war urged international co-operation and focused on Saddam Hussein's atrocities. She described Hussein as "a tyrant" who used weapons to kill more than 20,000 people and that he blocked weapons inspections in 1998.

"A vote for it is not a vote to rush to war; it is a vote that puts awesome responsibility in the hands of our president and we say to him -- use these powers wisely and as a last resort," Clinton said in a speech on the Senate floor. "And it is a vote that says clearly to Saddam Hussein -- this is your last chance -- disarm or be disarmed.

Jeb Bush's statements about the Iraq war

Bush showed strong support for his brother leading up to and during the war.

During a 2003 news conference in Pensacola, Bush said, "It is the last thing that a commander in chief, a president of the United States, wants to do. But in his heart, I know he is doing what he thinks is right, and I concur with him."

In April 2006, amid mounting criticism of how President Bush was handling the war, Gov. Bush visited Florida troops in Iraq for Easter.

"It is very important that we stay the course, that we provide support for these incredible people that are doing such a service for liberty around the world and protecting our freedoms here," Bush said upon returning.

Bush has been asked about the Iraq war several times since he left office in January 2007.

In March 2013, CNN's Candy Crowley asked Bush about polls showing that the American public thinks the war was a mistake: "Do you think that will ever change?"

Bush: "Yes. You know, a lot of things in history change over time. I think people will respect the resolve that my brother showed, both in defending the country and the war in Iraq. But history will judge that in a more objective way than today. The war has wound down now, and it's still way too early to judge what success it had in providing some degree of stability in the region."

As Bush has explored a bid for president, at times he has tried to avoid picking apart his brother's decisions about Iraq.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At an event with his mother in Florida in February, Bush told reporters that he would not be addressing the war in Iraq or "re-litigating anything in the past."

But that's exactly what he has had to do.

In a February speech in Chicago, Bush said during the question-and-answer session:

"There were mistakes made in Iraq, for sure," Bush said, adding that the intelligence "that everybody embraced about weapons of mass destruction turned out to not be accurate."

Bush also faulted his brother's administration for failing to create "an environment for security" in Iraq after the removal of Hussein.

However, he called his brother's decision to deploy 20,000 additional troops into Iraq in 2007 "one of the most heroic acts of courage, politically, that any president's done because there was no support."

While in New Hampshire in March, Bush said that if Obama had kept 10,000 troops in Iraq, it would have prevented the rise of the Islamic State.

"The surge worked. We created a fragile degree of stability. The forces agreement the president could have signed, I think, would have avoided where we are today," Bush said, referring to a troop level increase that his brother had authorized. "But we are where we are."

He said the United States should "re-engage with some small force level who can help continue to train the Iraqi army, to be able to provide some stability."

In his most recent remarks on Hannity, Bush praised the surge again, but wouldn't say if he would have authorized the war, knowing what he knows now.

"Yeah, I don't know what that decision would have been," Bush said. "That's a hypothetical. But the simple fact is, mistakes were made. They always are in life and (in) foreign policy. So we need to learn from the past to make sure we are strong and secure going forward."

Our conclusion

Bush said regarding the Iraq invasion that both himself and Clinton would have authorized it.

"I would have and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody, and so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got," he said.

Bush can't know what Clinton would have done if she had known that the intelligence was faulty. Here is what we do know: In 2002, Clinton supported the Iraq resolution, but by 2006 she said she regretted it.

Bush was a supporter of the invasion at the time and stood by his brother. He has acknowledged that the intelligence was flawed but has still expressed support for his brother's decisions.

The 13 Questions Hillary Clinton Has Answered From The Press // NPR // Tamara Keith – May 13, 2015

It has been more than three weeks since Hillary Clinton has answered a question from reporters. There is always a tension between the press and the candidates they cover. Journalists want access, and want to ask questions. Campaigns want to control the message. Over time, that has especially been true with Hillary Clinton.

Since announcing her candidacy in a web video, there have been no press conferences and no sit-down interviews. It has been a month, and the candidate has answered just 13 reporter questions (at least that we've been able to find, building on the work of National Journal). And you can quibble about whether some of the answers were really answers.

Last week in Nevada, as Clinton posed for pictures, we in the press corps attempted to get her attention. All we saw was the back of her head as she walked out of the room, to applause from a small hand-selected group of participants and observers.

Clinton's campaign describes this as the ramp-up phase, where she listens to voters. Questions about when there will be interviews, or when she will make herself available to questions from reporters are deflected with something along the lines of: all in good time.

Now, this isn't to say the candidate hasn't answered any questions. She's answered plenty. But they've been generally friendly questions on comfortable topics from people invited to participate in round-table discussions with her.

Her campaign spokesperson, Nick Merrill responds in an email:

The focus of our ramp-up period is to hear from voters about the issues they care about. She's enjoyed engaging in hours of public question and answers sessions and, as the campaign progresses, looks forward to more engagement with voters and the press as well.

Until then, here are the 13 reporter questions Clinton has answered:

1. Strategy in Iowa

NBC's Kristen Welker caught up with Clinton outside of her very first campaign stop at an Iowa coffee shop:

"You lost Iowa in 2008. How do you win this time? What's your strategy?" Welker asked.

Clinton's reply, as she walked toward an open van door: "I'm having a great time. Can't look forward any more than I am."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Liking Iowa

AP got in a question as Clinton walked into the Iowa State Capitol building to meet with lawmakers: "How are you liking Iowa?"

"I'm having a great time," Clinton answered.

3. Why are you running?

ABC's Cecilia Vega got a question in during Clinton's visit to a community college in Iowa. "What would you say to Americans who want to know why you are running?," she asked.

"I'm running to be the champion to Americans and their families, so that we can not just worry about treading water, but you can get ahead and you can stay ahead," she answered.

4-6. More liking Iowa, and opportunity structure

Clinton answered three other questions from reporters at the community college in Iowa.

One was "Is it good to be back out here again?"

Her response was: "Welcome. It is, it's fabulous. We're having the best time."

She was also asked what she learned during her visit, to which she responded, in part: "So much good information, so much great exchange about what works, what can work not just here in Iowa, but I think across the country."

She was also asked a question not caught in recordings of the event, and in response spoke about the start of the campaign and her visit to Iowa. "We're off and running, and I had a great drive across the country. One of the highlights was seeing spring, finally, once I got to Iowa, which I thought was a good sign. I saw daffodils and tulips and flowering trees. It was so beautiful. Just glad to be here," she said.

7-8. Campaign finance plan

A pair of Washington Post reporters spotted her outside of an unannounced event and asked about campaign finance reform. The answers weren't substantive.

According to the Post, she said "We do have a plan. We have a plan for my plan."

9. Importance of Iowa

Brent Roske, the host of the Iowa television show Roske on Politics worked his sources to figure out where the candidate would be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I found myself basically the sixth car in the motorcade pulling into Mount Vernon, Iowa," he said.

He was in the right place at the right time and was able to ask a question.

"Secretary Clinton what do you think the importance of the Iowa caucus will be in the upcoming election?," Roske asked.

Clinton answered: "I think it's important because it's the first contest and I look forward to getting prepared for it next February."

Roske admits it was a softball question. But it's a question he asks all of the candidates he interviews, to get the conversation going. And Roske has interviewed a ton of candidates. His Clinton interview in the middle of the street as she headed into a closed door event has to go down as one of his shortest.

"Was hoping to get a minute or two with her and just got a very short exchange," he said. "I was hoping it would spark a bit more of a conversation. I didn't know at the time that she wasn't necessarily taking press questions on this tour."

10. Position on trade deal

In New Hampshire, Clinton answered four reporter questions. One was about trade. NBC's Andrea Mitchell asked Clinton about the trade deal, and whether that will hurt American competitiveness.

Clinton didn't answer immediately or directly. Instead she talked about an Intellitech machine assembled in Manchester. And then about 30 seconds later, she talked more broadly about trade deals. "Well any trade deal has to produce jobs, and raise wages, and increase prosperity and protect our security. And we have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive," Clinton said.

11. Response to Clinton Cash book

ABC's Vega asked Clinton for her response to the Clinton Cash book, specifically:

"Did foreign embassies receive any special treatment for making any kind of donations to foundation or your husband?"

"Well, we're back into the political season and therefore we will be subjected to all kinds of distraction and attacks. And I'm ready for that. I know that that comes, unfortunately, with the territory," Clinton answered. She went on to say she didn't know what the Republicans would talk about "if I weren't in the race."

12-13. Criticism of a staged campaign

And then a reporter from WMUR asked her to respond to criticism that the campaign is too staged.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is exactly what I want to do. I want to hear from people in New Hampshire about what's on their minds," she said.

And the follow-up:

"Are you planning to answer reporter questions about some of the things that are coming up regarding the play for pay allegations in the latest book, emails back in 2012?" the reporter asked.

"Those issues are in my view distractions from what this campaign should be about. What I'm going to make this campaign about," Clinton responded.

But does avoiding questions or not answering them directly hurt her with voters?

"The premise of your question presupposes that the way that Hillary Clinton needs to reach voters is through the national media, and that's simply not the case anymore," said Steve Schmidt, a Republican strategist who was a senior adviser on John McCain's Straight Talk Express campaign back in 2000.

He argues a campaign as sophisticated Clinton's can bypass the media filter and target voters directly.

"The notion that real voters worried about real issues cares one whit about how often a presidential candidate talks to their traveling press corps or answers questions from them is just ludicrous. It's not the case," he said.

You can argue other candidates have to answer reporter questions. They need the free media. Clinton doesn't. And with minimal primary competition, she'd be happy to have much less media attention.

GOP candidate Carly Fiorina's campaign is keeping a running tally of all the questions she's answered. Since the last time Hillary Clinton answered a reporter question, Fiorina has answered 328.

Hillary Clinton Hasn't Answered a Press Question in 21 Days (And Her Opponents Are Taking Notice) // ABC News // Liz Kruetz - May 12, 2015

Today is the one month anniversary of Hillary Clinton’s 2016 presidential campaign. It also marks 21 days since she has answered a question from the press.

During this "ramp up" phase of her candidacy, Clinton has kept her distance from the media, answering only a handful of questions from the reporters following her on the campaign trail.

As the days go by, Clinton’s opponents have begun to take notice and Clinton’s limited engagement with reporters is becoming an issue.

Likely Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush took a shot at Clinton for not taking questions, saying in an interview with Fox News Monday he wants to run a campaign where he doesn’t “have a protective bubble.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And last weekend, Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina rolled out a fresh attack line.

“Like Hillary Clinton, I’m also running for president, but unlike her, I’m not afraid to answer questions about my record," Fiorina noted at the South Carolina Freedom Summit. "She’s answered seven on-the-record questions since April 12th; I’ve answered over 200 on the record since Monday.”

Not surprisingly the press is also taking notice: The New York Times launched a new feature called “Questions for Hillary,” dedicated to posing hypothetical questions that it would ask Clinton (if the paper had the chance).

By ABC News’ count, Clinton has responded -- in one way or another -- to a grand total of nine questions from reporters since she launched her campaign last month. Most recently, on April 21 she answered a question from a reporter about her position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership Trade Agreement.

Clinton has not answered any questions from reporters since, though she has fielded her fair share from voters in events her campaign has organized.

Here’s how Clinton campaign spokesman Jesse Ferguson explained the approach: “The focus of our ramp up period is to hear from voters about the issues they care about. She’s enjoyed engaging in hours of public question and answers sessions and, as the campaign progresses, looks forward to more engagement with voters and the press as well.”

Clinton has participated in multiple roundtable discussions and coffee chats with voters during campaign swings through Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada. But, in some instances, those voters were chosen by her own campaign.

Clinton is not the only 2016 hopeful who has been steering clear of inquisitive journalists lately. Wisconsin governor and likely Republican presidential candidate, Scott Walker, has largely ducked encounters with the media since he told the Washington Post in February he did not know whether President Obama was a Christian. This week, Walker is on a trip to Israel (the national press were not invited).

Even so, Clinton’s strategy differs from that of many other announced or likely presidential candidates such as Bush and potential Democratic rivals Bernie Sanders and Martin O’Malley, who have been doing regular television interviews and answering multiple questions on their campaign stops.

Clinton herself, however, has suggested things could change.

As reporters swarmed during her first official campaign stop last month in Iowa, Clinton dodged their questions but offered this: “We'll have lots of time to talk later.”

Welcome to day 29 of the Hillary Clinton 2016 presidential campaign!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In those 29 days -- including April 12, the day she announced, and today -- Clinton has taken a total of eight questions from the press. That breaks out to roughly one questions every 3.6 days. Of late, she's taken even fewer questions than that. According to press reports, the last day Clinton answered a question was April 21 in New Hampshire; that means that she hasn't taken a question from the media in 20 straight days.

Carly Fiorina, one of the many newly-minted Republicans running for president, is doing everything she can to shine a light on Clinton's close-mouthed approach with the press. This came from Fiorina deputy campaign manager Sasha Isgur Flores this morning:

In the last eight days, Carly has been interviewed almost 30 times and answered well over 300 questions. She continues to impress voters, pundits, and reporters alike with her willingness to share her thoughts and ideas – and to answer any question, from whether she likes hot dogs to how she would tackle the crisis in the Middle East....This is in stark contrast to many other candidates – and most especially to Hillary Clinton.

And, it's not just the Republican candidates attacking Clinton on her silence. The New York Times posted an item on its "First Draft" blog last week entitled "Questions for Hillary Clinton: Immigration" in which Timeswoman Amy Chozick wrote: "This is the first installment of a regular First Draft feature in which The Times will publish questions we would have asked Mrs. Clinton had we had the opportunity." And, late last month, I offered up seven questions Clinton should answer.

The Clinton campaign's response to all of this? Blah. Reporters whining -- like they always do. And, as every Clinton staffer is quick to note, she hasanswered questions from lots of regular people during her first month as a candidate -- holding roundtables in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada. They are also quick to note that she makes opening statements at these roundtables.

She's taking questions from voters! She's talking about policy! You guys just don't like it because she's not falling all over herself to jump through your hoops!

So, for roughly the billionth time, let me make two points in response to that way of thinking.

1. Making policy statements/opening statements does not remove the need to answer actual questions from reporters.

2. While answering questions from hand-picked audience members is not without value, no one could possibly think it is the equivalent of answering questions from the working press.

As I have written before, Clinton needs the press at this point in the campaign far less than someone like Carly Fiorina does. Clinton is not only universally known but also has a huge primary lead and is ahead of all Republican contenders in general election matchups as well. Fiorina, on the other hand, is known by roughly no one and to the extent anyone does know her, it's for the way she left HP.

Still, this is the new Clinton campaign, right? The one where she and the people around her pledged to deal differently with the press? Little did we know that "different" in this case meant "next to not at all."

Yes, we are one month into the campaign. And, yes, Clinton and her team wanted to start very low profile this time around -- to avoid making the mistakes she made in 2008. So, it's possible things could change. But, if past is prologue, I wouldn't bet on it.

Here's a clock that counts the minutes since Hillary Clinton answered a press question // WaPo // Philip Bump - May 12, 2015

We have noted, as have others, that it has been three weeks since Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton has answered a question posed to her by the press. (She's been an official candidate for a month as of today.) She's happy to talk with screened attendees of her events -- just not the media.

Last question answered: April 21, 2015, 3 p.m. (or so). Question and response on "Clinton Cash" book reported by WMUR in New Hampshire.

Journalists Try Shaming Hillary Clinton Into Speaking To The Press // Huffington Post // Michael Calderone - May 12, 2015

NEW YORK –- In the months leading up to the 2008 Iowa caucus, reporters covering Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign grew increasingly frustrated by their lack of access to the Democratic frontrunner. Such complaints make for easy Twitter fodder these days, but two election cycles ago, journalist grumbling was still largely confined to the back of the press bus.

Now, as the front-running Clinton again dodges the press, reporters are more than willing to publicly acknowledge the snub. A flurry of recent articles suggest they hope to nudge the press-averse candidate into engaging with them by highlighting how infrequently she does.

Clinton has taken questions from members of the public in controlled settings, but has only answered nine questions from the press in the month since she declared her campaign. She's avoided serious challenges from journalists on her policy positions and on recent controversies involving her exclusive use of a private email account while at the State Department and foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation.

"The focus of our ramp-up period is to hear from voters about the issues they care about," Clinton campaign press secretary Brian Fallon said in a statement. "She's enjoyed engaging in hours of public question and answer sessions and, as the campaign progresses, looks forward to more engagement with voters and press as well."

Meanwhile, Republican candidates like Sens. Marco Rubio (Fla.), Ted Cruz (Texas), and Rand Paul (Ky.), and likely candidate Jeb Bush, have done numerous interviews as Clinton has remained silent. Paul even joked in an interview with a New York Times reporter on Monday about how Clinton won't speak to the paper.

So political reporters, starved for answers from Clinton, have resorted to covering their lack of access to her instead

National Journal highlighted Clinton's lack of accessibility last month in a post aptly titled, "Here Are All Eight Media Questions Hillary Clinton Has Answered During Her Campaign."

Amy Chozick, who has been on the Clinton beat for The New York Times since the summer of 2013, launched a recurring post last week featuring questions the Times would've asked the candidate "had we had the opportunity."

On Monday, The Washington Post Chris Cillizza published a post titled, "Hillary Clinton hasn't answered a question from the media in 20 days."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And ABC News followed up Tuesday morning with, "Hillary Clinton Hasn't Answered a Press Question in 21 Days (And Her Opponents Are Taking Notice)."

Later on Tuesday, The Washington Post took the shaming up a notch by unveiling a countdown clock that tracks the time that has elapsed since Clinton last answered a question. (Fox News tried something similar in 2008 in hopes of getting then-candidate Barack Obama to appear on the network).

Clinton's 2016 campaign surely has its reasons for keeping the press at arm's length, and it may end up being a savvy move. But such a controlled media strategy could also lead to an uneasy relationship between reporters and a candidate they never really get to know, something Politico's Glenn Thrush described in a recent piece about the 2008 campaign.

"I was there, on the eve of the Iowa caucuses, when Clinton boarded the press bus for the very first time to offer a bag of Dunkin Donuts bagels as a peace offering after months of giving us the stiff arm," Thrush wrote. "The candidate was smiling, but her eyes said something different—and so did her feet, which never budged past the white line that separates bus driver from passenger. It is the only time I can ever recall a group of reporters happy to see a major newsmaker depart."

Super PACs rise in influence in 2016 campaign // AP // Ken Thomas and Steve Peoples - May 12, 2015

WASHINGTON (AP) - When Hillary Rodham Clinton takes the stage at fundraisers thrown by a group that wants to elect her president, she's not presented as a White House candidate. She's a "special guest."

When Jeb Bush raises money for a group preparing to run major parts of his all-but-certain presidential campaign, he doesn't ask for the cash himself.

And the hundreds of millions these groups will raise? They have to spend it without talking strategy with the candidates and campaigns they support.

The groups are called super PACs, and their influence in selecting the next president will be without precedent. Born out of two Supreme Court decisions in 2010, they are governed by rules some see as a game of winks and nods, enforced by an agency bedeviled by partisan gridlock.

As with most things in Washington, there's not even agreement on whether they are a problem to solve, or are a solution to celebrate.

"What's really going on largely is a breakdown of the enforcement system of the campaign finance laws," says Craig Holman of the left-leaning consumer group Public Citizen. "The Federal Election Commission is just broken."

Counters David Keating of the right-leaning Center for Competitive Politics, "I think this is overblown. The line has been drawn: It's the First Amendment. So if people want to speak, let them."

The primary benefit for campaigns of the super PACs is that they can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money to advocate for and against candidates, with only a few rules holding them back.

Among the rules is a ban on campaigns and super PACs working together. They cannot discuss political strategy or share key information such as internal polling. While candidates can attend super PAC events, they cannot technically ask for the unlimited donations that make the groups such a powerful force.

"Most of these super PACs that are going to be spending millions of dollars, I think they have a good understanding of what the law is," Keating said.

But even should they break the rules, there are questions about what price they might pay. The six commissioners of the Federal Election Commission are split evenly between Republicans and Democrats, and they have only once cited someone for breaking the rules. In February, the campaign manager for a failed Virginia Republican congressional candidate pleaded guilty to funneling money illegally from a super PAC to bolster his campaign.

Clinton has decried the existence of "unaccounted money" in politics and has suggested a constitutional amendment to overturn the case that helped usher in the new system. Yet during a California fundraising trip last week, she took her first steps to embrace Priorities USA Action, a Democratic super PAC that helped support President Barack Obama in 2012.

Like other candidates, Clinton cannot legally ask donors to give more than $5,000 to the group. But she can appear as a "special guest." Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, has headlined Priorities events in the past.

On the Republican side, Bush is taking it even further.

The former Florida governor is preparing to delegate many of the operations of his expected campaign to his allied Right to Rise super PAC, using the group to produce campaign ads, conduct voter data analysis and run get-out-the-vote efforts.

Mike Murphy, one of Bush's closest political advisers, is expected to lead the super PAC and is intimately involved in Bush's current operation, where he guides staffing decisions, courts donors and shapes political strategy. Bush takes care to say he's not yet a candidate, allowing him to work with Murphy and the super PAC in a way that won't be allowed once he's in the race.

A dozen White House prospects are already benefiting from allied super PACs, which are frequently led by former political advisers and business partners.

For example, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul will benefit from a super PAC run by his former campaign manager, who is also married to Paul's niece. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz's college roommate is working prominently in a network of four allied super PACs, while a longtime friend and financial backer, Dathan Voelter, is the treasurer. Voelter said the pro-Cruz groups have already raised more than $31 million.

During his run for re-election in 2012, Obama never really warmed up to the super PAC world and the group supporting him, Priorities USA Action. He declined to appear at fundraising events even though his opponent, Republican Mitt Romney, frequently attended gatherings held by Restore Our Future, a pro-Romney super PAC.

Seeking to succeed Obama in the White House, Clinton and her allies have taken steps recently to strengthen Priorities USA Action. Among them: She will appear at the group's events and reach out to potential donors, something Obama declined to do.

The group is also bringing aboard Guy Cecil, a former staffer on Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign who remains close to Bill Clinton and previously worked for a firm stocked with longtime Clinton advisers.

Hillary Clinton-Aligned Group Gets Closer to Her Campaign // New York Times // Maggie Haberman - May 12, 2015

Correct the Record, a group started by David Brock, a staunch ally of Hillary Rodham Clinton, is recreating itself as a stand-alone “super PAC” that has the ability to coordinate with her campaign.

Correct the Record, initially run by the opposition research group American Bridge 21st Century — another Brock-connected super PAC — had been focused loosely on the goal of defending all Democrats from attacks. Now its sole mission is helping Mrs. Clinton.

The new version will be run by Brad Woodhouse, a former spokesman for the Democratic National Committee who is now president of American Bridge. Burns Strider, a Clinton ally who runs Correct the Record, will stay on as senior adviser, with his role focused on reaching out to Democratic groups and campaigns.

Jessica Mackler, the chief executive of American Bridge, will become the new president of Correct the Record.

“Going forward, Correct the Record will work in support of Hillary Clinton’s candidacy for president, aggressively responding to false attacks and misstatements of the secretary’s exemplary record,” Mr. Brock said in a statement.

The group’s board includes Nina Turner, the former deputy minority whip for the Ohio State Senate; James Carville, the longtime adviser to Bill Clinton; Susie Tompkins Buell, a friend to Mrs. Clinton; and Freddy Balsera, national co-chairman of the Democratic National Committee’s Hispanic Leadership Council.

The new version of Correct the Record will be able to communicate with federal campaigns and party committees, as it is not involved with independent expenditures.

The old version of the group was involved in research that helped pick apart the book “Clinton Cash,” by Peter Schweizer, which raised questions about overlaps between donors to the Clinton Foundation, Bill Clinton’s paid speaking gigs and Mrs. Clinton’s tenure as secretary of state.

Hillary Clinton's damage control operation gets more troops // POLITICO // Annie Karni - May 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s campaign is getting more firepower to help with its damage control.

Correct The Record, an outside rapid response and research group dedicated to defending the records of Clinton and the other Democratic presidential candidates is reorganizing so it can coordinate with Clinton’s campaign and devote all of its resources to her.

Founded by Clinton ally David Brock in late 2013, Correct the Record is splitting off from its parent organization, the opposition research group American Bridge 21st Century, and registering with the Federal Election Commission as a stand-alone super PAC, the group announced Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Because the group will no longer be involved in paid media, it will be able to coordinate with the campaign and party committees. The change will go into effect by the end of the month.

Brad Woodhouse, who is taking a leave as president of American Bridge to become president of Correct The Record, said the time was right to split off the research group, now that Democrats are announcing their candidacies. He said the entity would be "aggressively responding to false attacks and misstatements of the Secretary's exemplary record."

A Clinton campaign spokeswoman declined to comment.

The Republican National Committee was quick to criticize the move. "Hillary Clinton is taking her hypocrisy on money in politics to interesting new heights, directly linking her campaign to a super PAC whose sole purpose is to play defense," the RNC said.

The change, first reported Tuesday by the New York Times, is good news for the Clinton campaign, which now can assert more control over the surrogates speaking on behalf of Clinton.

Until now, Brock and his team have been defending Clinton's record against attacks, most recently from the book "Clinton Cash" by Peter Schweizer. But it could not receive talking points from the campaign and created its own.

American Bridge will remain a separate independent expenditure group that purchases paid media, and is prohibited from coordinating with the campaign. Brock will remained involved with both American Bridge and Correct The Record, but there will be a firewall, sources said.

Brock is also a former board member of Priorities USA, an outside super PAC raising money for Clinton. Last February he resigned from the board, but has been expected to rejoin at some point.

Pro-Hillary Clinton Group Sets Novel Strategy to Back Presidential Hopeful // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus - May 12, 2015

A pro-Hillary Clinton group formerly under the umbrella of Democratic opposition research group American Bridge is set to become its own super PAC in an effort to more forcefully push back on criticism of Mrs. Clinton.

The group, Correct the Record, launched in 2013 ahead of an expected presidential bid by Mrs. Clinton. At the time, its goal was to back all Democratic presidential candidates, though its primary focus remained on Mrs. Clinton. Now, it is explicitly allying itself with the former secretary of state's presidential campaign.

The group will employ an unusual strategy in doing so. Though it plans to register as a super PAC, a spokeswoman for the group says it doesn't plan to make independent expenditures, which are ads explicitly advocating for or against a candidate. Super PACs aren't restricted in how much money they can raise and spend, but are generally barred from coordinating with candidate campaigns.

By not making independent expenditures, the group said there are no restrictions on its ability to coordinate with Mrs. Clinton's campaign. The group will spend money on activities that can legally be coordinated with a campaign, such as social media, the spokeswoman said.

It is unclear how the super PAC's interpretation of the rules will be met by the Federal Election Commission. The FEC defines super PACs as committees that can take uncapped contributions "for the purpose of financing independent expenditures and other independent political activity."

Correct the Record is expected to register with the FEC in coming days and begin operating as planned. If the FEC—a notoriously slow-moving operation—takes issue with the group's plan it could at a later point request changes in how it is registered or operates. A spokeswoman for the agency declined to comment on Correct the Record's plans.

The strategy "breaks new ground," said Kenneth Gross, former head of enforcement at the FEC. "Since this is uncharted territory it remains to be seen how this plays out," he said.

The new super PAC will be headed by Brad Woodhouse, previously the president of American Bridge, which is also a super PAC. He will be replaced by Jessica Mackler, who was previously the chief operating officer of American Bridge.

"Correct The Record is a strong brand in its own right and now that Democrats are announcing their candidacies, it's the right time to separate it from American Bridge, which focuses on opposition research," Mr. Woodhouse said. "Going forward, Correct the Record will work in support of Hillary Clinton's candidacy for president, aggressively responding to false attacks and misstatements of the secretary's exemplary record."

Burns Strider, a Clinton ally, will stay on as a senior adviser. The group's board will include Susie Tompkins Buell—who is often described as Mrs. Clinton's best friend and hosted a fundraiser for the candidate in her San Francisco home earlier in May—along with longtime Clinton strategist James Carville and David Brock, who founded the group.

The development is the latest in a series of efforts by the Clinton campaign to sharpen its response operation. Last week, Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta announced on Medium the launch of a new website called "The Briefing" to provide a "one-stop shop to provide the facts" about Mrs. Clinton's record.

The website's launch came amid a media frenzy over a book called "Clinton Cash," written by Peter Schweizer, editor-in-chief of a conservative news website. The book added fresh details to previous reporting about potential conflicts between Mrs. Clinton's charitable work with her family's foundation and her public activities as secretary of state.

US OK'd Most Bill Clinton Speech Requests Within Days // AP // Lisa Lerer and Stephen Braun - May 12, 2015

WASHINGTON — State Department officials under Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton moved quickly when aides to Bill Clinton asked them in March 2010 to approve plans for the former president to address clients of a multinational British bank, Barclays. Within four days, the department's ethics office signed off on the request — as it did for hundreds of others from the former president during his wife's four-year tenure leading the agency.

Its standard response, fired off in a short memo: "We have no objection."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That decision remained unchanged even after the Justice Department announced just months later, in August 2010, that Barclays Bank agreed to pay nearly $300 million in penalties for violating financial sanctions against Iran, Cuba, Sudan, Libya and Burma. The long-running case had hardly been a secret: Barclays had openly acknowledged in its annual reports — as recently as the same month as Clinton's 2010 request — that it was under investigation by the Justice Department and others for sanctions violations, and it cautioned that the impact on its profits "could be substantial."

In November, the former president mingled with top Barclays executives and clients at a bank-sponsored question session in Singapore. A little more than two months later, he again joined Barclays officers and clients at an exclusive dinner in Davos, Switzerland. The two appearances for Barclays netted Bill Clinton $650,000.

During Hillary Clinton's tenure as the top U.S. diplomat, lawyers and other ethics officials in the State Department's Office of the Legal Adviser gave near-blanket approval to at least 330 requests for Bill Clinton's appearance at speeches, dinners and events both in the U.S. and around the globe. More than 220 paid events earned the family nearly $50 million, according to a review of State Department documents and Hillary Clinton's financial disclosure forms by The Associated Press.

Now, as Hillary Clinton moves forward with her presidential campaign, the ease with which her husband was repeatedly cleared to address companies and governments around the world highlights potential ethical complications that are likely to intensify if she becomes the country's next president.

"It's politically going to be very treacherous," said Jan Baran, head of the government ethics group at Washington law firm Wiley Rein LLP, who served as general counsel to the Republican National Committee. "It just becomes controversy all the time."

The potential "first dude" has said he intends to continue accepting speaking fees during the presidential campaign.

"I got to pay our bills," he said in an interview with NBC's "Today Show" last week.

Taken together, the State Department and financial disclosure documents show the agency sped through Bill Clinton's steady stream of requests for events while rarely raising concerns about potential conflicts. At the same time, the agency's ethics office, which had primary responsibility for the decisions, was hobbled by "strained program operations," according to a 2012 report by the U.S. Office of Government Ethics, the government's top ethics agency.

State Department ethics officials gave quick approval, for example, for the two Barclays appearances and events paid by other international banks under legal scrutiny. Bill Clinton's $200,000 appearance in Florida for British-based HSBC in 2011 was cleared despite an ongoing federal money-laundering investigation that led to a 2012 settlement with prosecutors.

Five U.S. events in 2011 and 2012 earned the former president $840,000 from the wealth management unit of UBS Bank less than two years after the Swiss bank had acknowledged a massive tax evasion scheme aiding American clients and paid $780 million in penalties. The banks declined to comment about their dealings with the former president.

The State Department also green-lighted requests by foreign governments to hire the former president for events, despite potential complications for his wife's diplomacy at the time and for a future Hillary Clinton presidency. Similar concerns about foreign influence have been raised about the millions of dollars donated by foreign governments over the past decade to the Clinton Foundation, the Clinton family's global charity.

The former president was paid $600,000 to appear at a government-sponsored event in the United Arab Emirates in December 2011. The State Department also approved a 2010 Clinton event in Bangkok co-sponsored by a Thai government energy ministry and state gas firm, but despite news coverage of the speech there is no record of payment in his wife's financial disclosure. An aide to Bill Clinton said the Thai speech fee was donated to the Clinton Foundation.

Not all appearances were approved: A request for Clinton to speak in Shanghai in 2009 was rejected because of State Department hesitation that a prospective host might be an agent of the Chinese government. The former president's team withdrew the request.

The Clinton campaign declined to comment, referring questions to the State Department and Bill Clinton's private office.

State Department spokesman Jeff Rathke said last week the agency was not "aware of any actions taken by Secretary Clinton that were influenced by donations to the Clinton Foundation or its offshoots or by speech honoraria and consultancies of former President Clinton." Another spokesman, Alec Gerlach, declined to address specific cases such as the Barclays events.

The State Department's scrutiny, which went beyond the standard ethics requirements for all federal officials, was the result of a voluntary process agreed to by both Clintons to avoid "even the appearance of a conflict of interest," according to a January 2009 memo sent by David Kendall, Bill Clinton's personal lawyer, to Jim Thessin, who oversaw the vetting in the State Department. Clinton's office agreed to provide the names of organizations hosting the former president at least 14 days before the event, according to the memo. Lawyers at the agency would then aim to complete their review within five days.

While most internal emails between State Department ethics officials about Bill Clinton's proposed appearances were redacted to protect internal legal considerations, snippets that survived the censoring depict a vetting process that appeared both strained by the workload and rushed by the former president's deadlines.

"This is overdue and our host needs a signed contract today," wrote Terry Krinvic, Clinton's director of scheduling, in a March 2, 2011, email to State Department officials. A State Department official working on a speech request described herself in a February 2011 email as "totally stressed out, but will do it this afternoon."

In another memo from June 2010, an agency official dashed off a memo warning: "URGENT RE: Clinton Foundation Issue." The official told a State lawyer: "I'd very much appreciate a turnaround this afternoon as former President Clinton is scheduled to arrive in Tanzania tomorrow and (diplomatic) Post needs to run out these details." The issue, not identified in the redaction, was left unresolved overnight. "Former POTUS Clinton is on the ground in Tanzania," the agency lawyer wrote the next morning. "We need guidance fairly urgently to still be relevant." The censored emails do not indicate whether the State officials resolved the issue in time. POTUS means "president of the United States."

As State Department officials processed Clinton's event requests in September 2012, the Office of Government Ethics warned that the State Department's office "has extremely limited capacity to respond to the increased demands on its program." It said it was "concerned about the lack of compliance with statutory and regulatory requirements in the areas of financial disclosure, annual training and ethics agreements."

Gerlach, the State Department spokesman, said the department's review of former President Clinton's speeches and consultancies was not within the scope of the review by the government-wide ethics agency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A former senior State Department official familiar with the vetting process in the early months of Hillary Clinton's tenure as secretary of state described the department as often shut out from both relevant internal department information and ongoing investigations at other federal agencies that might have aided their reviews. The former official spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss the department's ethics work.

On all sides, the process involved lawyers with long ties to the Clinton family — and each other. Cheryl Mills was Hillary Clinton's chief of staff at the State Department and was frequently included on the other end of emails during the State Department review of the requests. Mills was a former White House deputy counsel who collaborated with Kendall on Bill Clinton's impeachment legal defense before working for Hillary Clinton at the State Department.

Less than a month after Hillary Clinton was confirmed, a request to approve some of Bill Clinton's proposed private consulting work was sent by his long-time personal aide Doug Band, prompting Mills to prod the agency's deputy legal adviser to review the arrangement. Approval for the former president to enter into a consultancy arrangement with Band's corporate advisory firm, Teneo, came in 2011, allowing Clinton to offer "services regarding geopolitical, economic and social trends" for three years.

Only a handful of proposed arrangements appear to have been rejected. A consulting contract with Saban Capital Group Inc., a firm headed by major Clinton donor Haim Saban, was rejected because of what the State Department deemed Saban's active involvement in foreign affairs, particularly the Middle East.

Two other consulting contracts — one with longtime friend Steve Bing's Shangri-La Industries and another with Wasserman Investments GP — raised no such concerns. A corporate entity for Wasserman Investments GP could not be found, but California's Wasserman Media group is run by entertainment and sports executive and Democratic donor Casey Wasserman.

On Thursday, Saban hosted a fundraiser for Hillary Clinton's campaign at his Beverly Hills home, raising at least $1.2 million from 450 attendees.

Occasionally, the agency offered guidance to avoid a clear conflict. In the case of White & Case, an international law firm based in New York, a department lawyer signed off on the speech but noted for "situational awareness" that the firm was representing the 1979 U.S. hostages seeking damages from Iran — a case the State Department was trying to have dismissed. "We think it would be best to avoid being drawn into any discussion of the litigation," the lawyer wrote.

Bill Clinton's November 2010 appearance for Barclays in Singapore was one example of the potential for conflict posed by the frenetic stream of requests.

In March 2010, Krinvic forwarded a Clinton proposal to appear at two bank events, a Barclays Asia Forum in Singapore in November and Barclays dinner in Davos in January 2011. In Singapore, the plans called for Clinton to speak during a moderated question-and-answer session before 650 Asian investors and pose for photos. In Davos, Clinton would attend a similar session before 20 Barclays senior executives and 140 clients and their spouses.

Thessin replied on March 23, telling Krinvic that "we have no objection."

It was widely known by then that Barclays was under investigation by federal prosecutors for repeated illegal transactions with banks in Iran, Libya, Cuba, Sudan and Burma and for violating U.S. financial sanctions against those governments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Barclays had voluntarily disclosed four illegal banking transactions to federal and New York financial authorities in 2006. That led to an internal inquiry by the bank and investigations by federal and New York state prosecutors. The scrutiny resulted in Barclays' acknowledgement in federal court in August 2010 that it had violated U.S. sanctions. The bank also agreed to cooperate with the government under a deal that deferred prosecution for two years under supervision of a federal judge. Barclays agreed to pay $298 million in fines.

The same week in November 2010 that Barclays' lawyers submitted a status report to the trial judge overseeing their case, Bill Clinton appeared at the Barclays forum in Singapore and mingled with clients who also attended a golf tournament sponsored by the bank. There is no documentation in State Department files whether officials had reconsidered their approval after Barclays acknowledged violating U.S. laws. Barclays declined to comment about Clinton's appearances or the investigation.

"People admire the way he can take complex issues and break them down for a global audience," Barclays Plc CEO Robert Diamond said in an interview with Bloomberg News two days after Clinton addressed bank clients in Davos.

While the Treasury Department administers oversees the administration of U.S. financial sanctions, the State Department has its own Office of Economic Sanctions Policy, which is responsible for developing foreign policy-related sanctions to counter threats to national security.

The criminal case against Barclays also noted that the presidential orders for sanctions against Iran were authorized by the treasury secretary in consultation with the secretary of state.

While the State Department's lawyers concluded that most of Clinton's speeches did not violate foreign policy interests, some of his appearances could pose political risk for his wife's presidential bid by giving Republican opponents an opening to depict the couple as beholden to powerful interests.

Over a three-day period in November 2011, the Swedish telecom company Ericsson paid $750,000 for Clinton to address industry leaders in Hong Kong; Chinese executives paid $550,000 for a speech in Shanghai; and he made $260,000 addressing the annual meeting of HCL, an Indian outsourcing giant, at Disney World in Orlando, Florida. His total haul: $1.56 million.

While the former president traveled the world, efforts to assure the ethics of his itineraries bounced around the State Department. A request to speak at a climate change summit organized by an Abu Dhabi government environmental group prompted an email to the UAE desk officer asking whether "potential affiliation with it by high-level officials" would pose "any harm to foreign policy." The response: "No concerns here." Bill Clinton was paid $600,000 by the group, the Abu Dhabi Global Initiative.

When Clinton was invited to participate in the China Philanthropy Forum in November 2012, an event aimed at promoting Chinese charitable giving, the State Department raised concerns that the event's sponsor was an association made up of former and current senior Chinese government officials. "We will need to further consider this one," it said.

Hillary Has Some 'Splainin' To Do About Clinton Foundation // Forbes // Robert W. Wood - May 12, 2015

Bill and Hillary Clinton can sometimes sound like Sargent Schulz on the old Hogan's Heroes show. "I know nothing!" As Mrs. Clinton remains largely mum, the former President said the Foundation had "never done anything knowingly inappropriate." He sounded annoyed, a little like his "I did not have sexual relations with that woman."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton had repeatedly promised disclosure and transparency, but then her private email server and preposterous 'single wireless device' excuse emerged. Oh well, 'mistakes were made. The acting CEO of the Clinton Foundation posted a statement acknowledging that the Foundation failed to separate government grants from donations. Oops, we're amending our tax returns, no harm done, the Foundation suggests. It is clear that the Foundation does good works. The 'no harm done' is somewhat less clear, and it isn't just the tax returns.

Clinton Foundation

Mrs. Clinton has done little to address the extensive donations or grants to her Foundation made by foreign governments while Mrs. Clinton was Secretary of State. Tens of millions of dollars in foreign government payments weren't reported in tax filings for five years. The Foundations acting CEO said they were on the website. But it turns out that is not true either, as the Foundation has belatedly acknowledged.

Foreign government funding has received particular scrutiny, and yet incredibly, precise totals for government grants to the Foundation for the last three years of Clinton's four-year tenure as secretary of state have still not been publicly disclosed. The parsing of 'is' worked for President Clinton, and perhaps it can for Mrs. Clinton too. Mr. Obama may not be mad, but perhaps he should be, since it appears that Mrs. Clinton violated his rules too.

The opaque Clinton Foundation tax returns make it look as if someone wanted to keep the embarrassing and conflict-triggering gifts quiet. Perhaps there are emails? The run-by-someone-else Foundation also came under additional scrutiny for failing to clear all foreign government donations through an agreed-upon State Department vetting process. The Foundation initially claimed that it was barred by Canadian law from revealing the names of donors, apparently a bogus excuse.

How much of Clinton Foundation donations go to overhead is a worry too. Upon becoming Secretary of State, Mrs. Clinton promised that the Foundation would stop accepting donations from foreign governments. There were exceptions, and the Foundation's IRS filings were less than transparent. Starting in 2010, the Foundation reported on its IRS tax return for three consecutive years that it received no donations from foreign government sources.

It wasn't as if they didn't know how. In prior years, the Foundation reported tens of millions of dollars in donations. The Foundation is now worrying over the accuracy of the IRS returns from 2010, 2011 and 2012. Refiling sounds responsible, but it may not fix everything. Indeed, it is clear that the Foundation did accept millions in donations from foreign governments in those years. It is clear that they overlapped with the time Mrs. Clinton served as Secretary of State. In fact, a whopping 181 donors lobbied the State Department while Mrs. Clinton was there. Amended tax forms aren't going to change that.

Uranium Investor- Turned Clinton Foundation Mega Donor Frank Holmes Grilled by CNBC // Breitbart News // May 12, 2015

Clinton Foundation mega donor Frank Holmes was grilled on Tuesday in a blistering CNBC interview when Holmes gave answers at odds with CNBC's own reporting about his investments in the highly controversial Uranium One—a company Hillary Clinton's State Dept. approved for a 2010 sale to the Russian government that resulted in the transfer of 20 percent of all U.S. uranium to the Russian government, according to the New York Times and Clinton Cash.

Nine Uranium One investors, including Frank Holmes, gave Hillary's foundation a combined $145 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a CNBC Squawk Box segment titled “The Clinton Cash Scandal: Frank Holmes,” U.S. Global Investors CEO Frank Holmes was asked when he invested and sold Uranium One. The exchange produced an embarrassing moment for Holmes, as his on-air statements directly contradicted the CNBC fact graphics displayed on the screen.

In a graphics box titled “From the New York Times,” the CNBC screen graphic stated: “Frank Holmes donated between $250-$500k to the Clinton Foundation—U.S. Global Investors held $4.7 million in Uranium Ones shares in Q1 of 2011.”

U.S. Global Investors’ own 2011 SEC filing further confirms Holmes’ company held Uranium One.

However, when CNBC host Joe Kernan asked Holmes when he bought and sold the uranium stock, Holmes’s answer contradicted CNBC’s fact box.

“We were long gone before 2008,” claimed Holmes.

“You didn’t own it when it was acquired by the Russians [2010]?” asked Kernan.

“Uh, by the, by what the date is. I bought it early and I sold it before 2008,” said Holmes, before adding that he gives money to orphanages.

“You sold the stock in 2008?” asked Kernan.

“We were long gone well before all that,” said Holmes.

CNBC’s chief international correspondent Michelle Caruso-Cabrera then jumped in to follow-up on Kernan’s line of questioning.

“But the suggestion is that you donated money to a foundation that was connected with the possibility of approval of a deal that you may have benefited from. Is that correct?” Caruso-Cabrera asked Holmes.

“No, that’s a lot of disinformation. That’s just a political battle this year,” said Holmes.

“But, still, the question is, were you in a position to benefit from approval of this deal at the same time that you were writing checks to the Clinton Foundation?” asked Caruso-Cabrera.

“No, there’s no, I had no idea any of those two events. There are two separate events,” said Holmes.

The CNBC hosts appeared stunned, before CNBC host Andrew Ross Sorkin jumped in.

“When people finish watching this interview, they’re going to say, it wasn’t unequivocal on your part and that there wasn't a lot of clarity," said Sorkin.

"I don't understand. I have no idea what—you're making—lots of conjecture," Holmes fired back.

"We'll give you one last shot at it," said Sorkin. "In a sentence or two, unequivocally, anything you want to say? Because right now it's all a big haze for us."

"There's no haze. I have a global investment company and I invest in many companies in many different countries and I give to a lot of charitable organizations," said Holmes.

"Unfortunately, I don't think it speaks to the answer. We'll leave it there," said Sorkin.

Hillary Clinton has yet to answer a single question surrounding the widening Clinton Cash scandals or her role in the transfer of 20% of U.S. uranium to the Russian government.

Inside the Univision-Clinton network // POLITICO // Hadas Gold and Marc Caputo - May 12, 2015

When former President Bill Clinton takes center stage at Univision's upfront presentation Tuesday, it will mark more than just one of his many paid appearances.

The relationship between the Clintons and Univision flows from top to bottom — from owner Haim Saban's unabashed support for Hillary Clinton's election effort to a partnership between Univision and the Clinton Foundation to the network's newscasts that have bashed Republicans and, most recently, praised Hillary's new position on immigration — putting her squarely in line with the network's stance on the issue.

The importance of Univision for the Latino electorate and 2016 is hard to overstate. It is by far the biggest Spanish-language media network in the United States when it comes to revenue, ratings and stations owned. In some markets, such as Los Angeles, the Univision-owned local newscasts are in the top one or two by ratings. On big nights for the Hispanic community, such as President Barack Obama's remarks on immigration in November, Univision raked in 4.8 million viewers, more than any other network. During the July sweeps last summer, Univision boasted the No. 1 spot in prime time among 18-to-49-year-old viewers for the second year in a row.

"You have to go to Univision to get to Latino voters," said Gabriela Domenzain, a liberal strategist who was a founding producer on Univision's Sunday news show "Al Punto" and who ran Obama's Hispanic media outreach in the 2012 election.

"Even though demographics are changing and more Latinos and young Latinos get their news from English language sites and media, Univision … has been front and center advocating for Latinos for 25 years," she said. "Maybe it's not the 18-25 voters who watches Univision, but their moms do and their grandmas do, and if not it's in the background. You can't disassociate the power of the older generation on the younger generation either."

Univision and the Clinton Foundation joined forces in 2014 for a multi-year early childhood initiative dubbed "Pequeños y Valiosos" (or "Young and Valuable"). The relationship proved of immediate value to Hillary Clinton, whose face was featured in five of seven slides on Univision's website promoting the initiative in February 2014. She also held a New York media event where reporters couldn't ask her questions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The initiative between the Clintons and Univision last year provoked a sharp response from the Republican National Committee, which accused the network of promoting Hillary Clinton ahead of her presidential campaign. The RNC, which has tussled with the network behind the scenes over its coverage of the GOP and immigration, made sure Univision did not host a presidential debate this year.

Univision spokesperson Monica Talan, however, emphasized the bipartisan nature of their initiative in an email, noting that its Leadership Council Members include Cindy McCain, former Sen. Bill Frist and George W. Bush's Under Secretary of Education Sara Martinez Tucker.

"As far as Pequeños y Valiosos, this is a Corporate initiative that is focused on children and is a partnership of Too Small To Fail, one of many foundations and partners we work with to promote education to our Hispanic community," Talan said via email. "As a Company we have been transparent, disclosing the partners in this initiative to our audiences. Our focus is on helping children in the Hispanic community, not on party affiliations."

But the connection to the foundation isn't always transparent on the network's nightly newscast, even in reports that are specifically about the foundation. There was no mention of the network's partnership with the Clinton Foundation in a May 4th segment on Univision's nightly news program about allegations that donations to the foundation affected Hillary Clinton's decisions during her tenure as Secretary of State.

Talan declined to respond specifically to questions about disclosing the network's relationship with the foundation in their reporting.

Domenzain said she thought the network should always note the partnership whenever covering the Clinton Foundation.

"Even if it's apolitical, for childhood education … given that foundation most likely will be a center theme in this campaign, that yes, these are alliances that should be put out in the open," Domenzain said. "When covering the political aspect of it, yes they should and they're going to be much more under the microscope because of that."

Then there's the subject of Univision owner, billionaire media mogul Saban, who purchased Univision in 2007 along with a group of investors. Saban has donated as much as $25 million to the Clinton Foundation and his wife sits on its board. He has said it's a dream of his to see Hillary Clinton elected. The week before Bill Clinton's Univision appearance, Saban hosted a fundraiser for Hillary in California.

"As much as is needed," Saban said in July when asked by Bloomberg Politics how much he'd give to the Clinton campaign. "I think she would be great for the country and great for the world."

Despite Saban's Clinton fandom, a firewall exists between editorial and corporate, Univision spokesperson Talan said in an email.

"As President and CEO, Randy Falco is responsible for maintaining separation between Haim Saban, any other Board member and our News division when it comes to news and editorial judgments. The News division must have complete editorial independence, and it does," she said.

Daniel Coronell, Univision News senior vice president told BuzzFeed in January that Saban is very respectful of the network's journalistic independence.

"He's not connected with our day to day; we're not in this to build his happiness," Coronell said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But a spirit of Republican-bashing has sometimes reared its head at Univision. Coronell's own assistant, for instance, was outed by The Miami Herald after she repeatedly trashed Sen. Marco Rubio on her Facebook page.

Republicans say that incident is emblematic of a culture at Univision, where employees don't have to be told to be biased. Many national Republicans don't trust the network. They're suspicious of Saban's ties to the Clintons. And some believe that any network's talk of balanced is just lip service designed to minimize friction and negative press as part of an effort to fetch a higher price for a planned initial public offering within the next year.

"Based on what we've seen so far, Univision's coverage of the Clinton campaign has been characterized by cheerleading more than anything else," said Ken Olivier-Méndez, director of the conservative-leaning Media Research Center's Latino division. "The extremely solicitous and practically acritical coverage Hillary Clinton has been receiving from Univision so far stands in stark contrast with the consistently tough coverage Republicans like Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz and Rand Paul have been receiving on the network in recent weeks."

Rep. Carlos Curbelo, a Spanish-speaking Republican from Miami who watches Univision and is a moderate on immigration reform, said Univision needs to be more cautious.

"To preserve the integrity of its journalists, Univision should be more careful about identifying with political candidates and parties," he said.

Curbelo said he couldn't speculate too much about why there has been relatively little press coverage about Univision's relationship with the Clintons, but he said it would be hard to imagine Rupert Murdoch being treated the same way if he pledged to support a candidate who had a separate initiative that Fox promoted.

"He would be far more criticized and pilloried if he did something like that. Spanish-language networks probably don't draw as much attention. But when you're talking about Univision, it has high ratings. It does matter," Curbelo said.

"When you have the ownership of a network aggressively backing a presidential candidate – combined with advocacy journalism on some issues – it threatens the journalistic integrity of a news organization," he added.

The top "advocacy" issue: immigration. Last week (on Cinco de Mayo, no less) Clinton went beyond Obama on immigration, promising that as president she would use executive action to allow more undocumented immigrants to get legal protection and work permits. Jorge Ramos, Univision's star anchor and correspondent who is open about his feelings toward immigration reform, tweeted a day later that the debate over immigration might be over.

"I wonder how Republicans are going to respond to the immigration proposals by @HillaryClinton Maybe the debate is over already," he tweeted.

Ramos has also drawn criticism from some in the mainstream media, who say he strays form objectivity into advocacy. But Univision News President Isaac Lee — who has equated speaking truth in today's politics to speaking out against the Nazis during World War II — vigorously defends Ramos' journalist-activist role.

"He's entitled to his opinion. I don't think Jorge wants to be impartial, I think Jorge wants to be a responsible journalist," Lee said in April during the International Symposium on Online Journalism conference in Austin. "Univision's audience knows that Jorge is representing them. That he is not asking the questions to be celebrated as a fair and balanced journalist. He's asking the questions to represent them. He's going to ask the person whatever is necessary to push the agenda for a more fair society, for a more inclusive society and for the Hispanic community to be better."

To be sure, Ramos has been tough on both Democrats and Republicans. In an infamously testy interview with Obama late last year, Ramos accused Obama of not doing enough early in his term to stop deportations, telling him he "destroyed many families." But many Republicans remain wary of him and of Univision, though Domenzain said it was just an excuse to avoid tough questions.

"I think it's mostly an excuse to not go on. I can't tell you how many times we'd extend offers to Republicans and they wouldn't come," Domenzain said. "What they don't like is Univision's immigration editoiral line because it goes against their beliefs."

The feud between Univision and Republicans broke out in the open in 2011 after Sen. Marco Rubio and the network clashed. At the time, Rubio was a newly elected senator – and former Univision commentator – and the network wanted to spend a day with him and talk about immigration reform. At the time, Rubio wasn't ready. And his staff didn't trust the crusading Ramos to conduct a fair interview because he was such an advocate for the DREAM Act and, in the words of one Rubio adviser, "open borders." So Rubio's shop declined, but said it would be willing to participate in an interview with another Univision reporter from South Florida.

That's when things got strange. A reporter from Univision's investigative team soon cold-called Rubio's sister and asked about the 24-year-old drug bust of her husband. Rubio's staff said the senator – who was 16 at the time of the crime in question — was basically being pressured to submit to an interview or have his family embarrassed. Univision honchos denied the claim, but Isaac Lee later acknowledged to the New Yorker that the network offered the senator "options" regarding how the story of his brother-in-law would be reported. Rubio declined the offer of the "options," the story ran and Republicans flipped out when The Miami Herald reported the story of the discussions.

Led by Rubio's longtime friend, U.S. Rep. David Rivera, Republican candidates for president announced they would boycott a proposed debate that Univision wanted to host. Republicans felt even more justified in their decision when they read the reaction of Univision's chairman, Saban, in the New Yorker: "The fact that Rubio and some Republican Presidential candidates have an anti-Hispanic stand that they don't want to share with our community is understandable but despicable. So 'boycotting' Univision, the largest Spanish-language media company in the U.S., is disingenuous at best and foolish at worst."

Behind the scenes, Univision hired lobbyists tied to the GOP to smooth things over with the Republican National Committee. But at the same time, Republicans say, they grew more concerned about the network's coverage of Republicans, particularly with regards to immigration. Criticism of Rubio was rife in Univision's newsrooms. During the August 2012 Republican National Convention in Tampa, an unknown person trashed Rubio via Univisión's official Facebook account, writing "beyond his ideology, Rubio is a mediocre politician who contradicts the values he says he represents. Jeb Bush is more Latino and talented than him," the Facebook posting said. Months later, a top assistant to a Univision news boss ripped Rubio on Twitter by calling him a "loser" and "a token slave boy."

Shortly after he announced his campaign for president in April, Rubio sat down for a relatively calm interview with Ramos and made news by saying he'd attend a gay marriage of someone he loved, but that he'd get rid of deferred action for children of illegal immigrants. But a report on Univision's morning show two weeks later included a title on the screen describing Rubio's comments on gay marriage (that it's "ridiculous" to believe there's a constitutional right to gay marriage) "postura radical" (a radical position). And last week, during a local Arizona broadcast on Univision, the network played up Rubio's refusal to talk with an immigration activist for the liberal group called "Mi Familia Vota."

Though BuzzFeed reports Univision is working to develop better relationships in both parties with internal "red" and "blue" teams, Republicans still have a hurdle when it comes to their relationship with Univision in the 2016 election. The network was already snubbed for a chance at hosting a GOP primary debate, with Telemundo picking up hosting duties instead.

"Regardless of those relationships what's really interesting this cycle is Fusion in particular and the Jorge Ramos show in Fusion has brought them onto the English language mainstream radar, so they're under much more pressure to be quote-unquote 'balanced,' however, the Univision editorial line on immigration is always going to be there," Domenzain said.

But for Hillary, things with Univision are looking good.

"Hillary's Cinco de Mayo Promise: path to citizenship for [undocumented], DACA and extended executive action. Of course we'll remember @HillaryClinton," Ramos tweeted last week.

State Dept. can't fulfill your FOIA because it's overwhelmed by Hillary e-mails // WaPo // Al Kamen - May 12, 2015

The State Department's latest defense on why it can't comply with your ancient Freedom of Information request for documents is: Blame it on Hillary.

The State Department says it is too overwhelmed by reviewing those 55,000 pages of e-mails former secretary Hillary Clinton turned over last year.

That apparently means other folks, who've waited years on their requests for State Department documents, are being told they'll have to wait even longer because of the Clinton review.

The National Security Archive, for example, filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request in 2001 for records of phone conversations of former secretary Henry Kissinger, who left Foggy Bottom 38 years ago. The Archive filed suit in March.

The department on Friday asked U.S. District Court Judge Rosemary Collyer for a six-month extension to turn over the documents. State said there's been a huge "surge" in FOIA lawsuits in the last year alone, suits that "have grown increasingly burdensome and complex."

"These exceptional circumstances are compounded" — here it comes — "by the fact that a significant portion of [State's] FOIA-processing resources are currently devoted to reviewing for public release the collection of approximately 55,000 pages of emails that were recently provided to State by former Secretary Hillary Clinton. . . and to making those documents available to the public by posting them on a department website."

Clinton tweeted in March that the State Department "said they will review them for release as soon as possible." And Secretary of State John Kerry told reporters the agency would "undertake this task as rapidly as possible" — though another official cautioned the process could be time-consuming.

Call it the "Hillary Dodge?"

Clinton facing new ethics questions on role in Boeing deal // Fox News // Dan Springer – May 13, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Hillary Clinton was America's top diplomat, she also appeared at times like a top salesperson for America's biggest airplane maker, Boeing.

Traveling abroad on official business as secretary of state, Clinton often visited Boeing facilities and made a pitch for the host country to buy Boeing jets. During one visit to Shanghai in May 2010, she boasted that "more than half the commercial jetliners operating in China are made by Boeing."

A sales plug in Russia in 2009, though, may have proved especially fruitful. While touring a Boeing plant, Secretary of State Clinton said, "We're delighted that a new Russian airline, Rossiya, is actively considering acquisition of Boeing aircraft, and this is a shameless pitch."

In 2010, Boeing landed the Russian deal, worth $3.7 billion. And two months later, the company donated $900,000 to the Clinton Foundation.

This chain of events is raising new questions for Clinton, and Boeing, as the former secretary of state launches her 2016 presidential campaign. The Boeing deal only adds to a growing list of business deals involving Clinton Foundation donors now coming under scrutiny.

Boeing shareholder David Almasi recently confronted CEO James McNerney about the ethics of it.

"That opens the door to charges of honest services fraud, that there was a quid pro quo between the Clinton Foundation, the State Department and Boeing," Almasi said.

In prepared answers to questions posed to Boeing by Fox News, a spokesman defended the company's actions.

"Our contribution to the Clinton Foundation to help the people of Haiti rebuild was a transparent act of compassion and an investment aimed at aiding the long-term interests and hopes of the Haitian people," the spokesman said. The company also pointed out that it gave the American Red Cross $1.3 million after the devastating 2010 earthquake.

Clinton defenders say there is no smoking gun. "There's zero evidence that Hillary Clinton went to bat for Boeing for any reason other than to benefit the U.S. economy and U.S. workers," said former Clinton/Gore adviser Richard Goldstein.

But the financial connections don't end there. Boeing also paid former President Bill Clinton $250,000 for a speech in 2012. It was a speech that was approved by the State Department's Ethics Office -- which according to an Associated Press report often approved the ex-president's speaking engagements within days.

And in another potential trouble spot, Boeing's chief lobbyist and former Bill Clinton aide Tim Keating hosted a fundraiser for Ready for Hillary, the political action committee raising money to help fund a run for the White House. Boeing took no issue with Keating doing so.

"Employees are free on their personal time and with personal resources -- as was the case here -- to support candidates and causes of their choice," Boeing wrote in its statement.

The Clinton campaign told Fox News in a statement, "She did the job that every Secretary of State is supposed to do and what the American people expect of them -- especially during difficult economic turmoil."

Bill Clinton: path to citizenship is just common sense // POLITICO // Annie Karni - May 12, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton on Tuesday promoted his wife's robust call for immigration reform during a paid appearance at the Univision upfront presentation.

"If I were advising candidates, I would say you've got to have a credible position on immigration reform," Clinton said in a brief Q-and-A session with Fusion anchor Alicia Menendez. "I think the only thing that makes sense is a path to citizenship and adequate support for children in a much more discriminating way than enforcing the law."

His comment came one week after Hillary Clinton, speaking at a campaign stop in Las Vegas, vowed to expand on President Obama's executive actions to allow millions of more undocumented immigrants obtain legal protection and work permits.

Hillary Clinton also challenged the entire Republican field for failing to support a path to citizenship. "When they talk about legal status," she said, "that is code for second-class status."

Bill Clinton has said he plans to continue giving paid speeches while his wife runs for president. The appearance before Univision, however, was the product of a long relationship between the Clintons and the Spanish language network. Haim Saban, who with a group of investors acquired Univision in 2007, is a Hillary Clinton megadonor, and threw her a fundraiser last week. Univision and the Clinton Foundation are also partners on an education program, "Too Small To Fail," and the network praised Hillary Clinton's stance last week on immigration.

Bill Clinton, fresh off a Foundation trip to Africa, spoke for about 15 minutes about how cooperation must triumph conflict as the country's population becomes more diverse.

"The only thing that makes sense is to have a policy of radical inclusion," he said. "If you look at the world today, everywhere people are practicing inclusive governance ... good things are happening. Everywhere people are practicing divisive politics, unequal economic opportunities, and unequal exclusive governance arrangements good things are not happening. This is not rocket science."

Speaking briefly about the criminal justice system, he evoked the death of Eric Garner last July, but appeared not to remember his name.

"Remember when the fellow was dying in New York, who was selling the illegal cigarettes in the street and he had a bunch of kids and he was very much overweight and was put in a chokehold and his cardio-vascular system failed," Clinton said.

He contrasted the tragedy of his death and the protests it sparked with the death of Ezell Ford, a civilian, by police hands in Los Angeles days later, where there were no protests because a system of "community decision makers" was instituted to review every police incident.

"There weren't riots," Clinton said. "People felt like they were part of a process that treated them like they mattered. That their children's lives were not insignificant...that's the big test of the entire world."

His message to the growing population of millennial Hispanics: “be upbeat and relentlessly forward looking,” he said. “Every country, every company, every person needs to be in the future business. You may think that’s funny for a guy that’s older than everybody in this audience, but you have to live in the future.”

Clinton was the first former President to participate in the media company’s upfront presentation.

“I’m well aware I’m just a warm up act for Ricky Martin,” said Clinton. “At my age, you just take these changes when you get them.”

Another Busy Day for Bill Clinton, the Noncampaigning Campaigner // New York Times // Amy Chozick - May 12, 2015

Bill Clinton will not (repeat, not) be campaigning for his wife in the early stages of her 2016 presidential campaign.

He will, however, be discussing Hillary Rodham Clinton’s policies and vision for the country in front of live audiences of thousands of likely voters and in television interviews with the country’s most influential talk-show hosts.

On Tuesday, when Mr. Clinton discussed immigration reform, climate change, Middle East policy and economic policy before a crowd of nearly 2,000 people in New York, the fuzzy gray area of a preternatural campaigner who insists he is not campaigning began to come into focus.

“If I were advising candidates, I would say you’ve got to have a credible position on immigration reform,” Mr. Clinton said at a presentation to advertisers for the Univision network. He went on to endorse a path to citizenship and “adequate support for children,” policies that Mrs. Clinton presented at a campaign event in Las Vegas last week.

Later, Mr. Clinton planned to appear on CBS’s “Late Show With David Letterman,” as one of Mr. Letterman’s final guests (along with George Clooney and Oprah Winfrey) before the longtime host retires.

Both the late-night chat and the Univision question-and-answer session are unrelated to Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, and Bill Clinton’s camp insists he will not campaign or raise funds for the campaign this year. But any appearance by Mr. Clinton is intrinsically linked to his wife’s campaign, and his schedule on Tuesday gave the widely popular 42nd president an enormous platform to push policies Mrs. Clinton is advocating and to generally advance Brand Clinton.

Just before Mr. Clinton took the stage at the Lyric Theater in Times Square for the Univision event, the sultry salsa song “Suavamente Besame” blared. “I’m well aware I’m just the warm-up act for Ricky Martin,” Mr. Clinton joked of the former Menudo member who would perform later.

He’s the first former president to speak at a network upfront — the annual ritual of television networks pitching airtime to marketers — and Mr. Clinton was paid to participate in the event, a question-and-answer session with Alicia Menendez, an anchor on the Fusion channel.

(A Univision spokesman would not comment on how much Mr. Clinton was paid, but according to previous disclosures, similar corporate appearances generally pay upward of $200,000.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Then there were the less tangible upsides. Sitting in front was the media magnate Haim Saban, the biggest shareholder in Univision and a major donor to the Clintons' political and philanthropic causes. Last week, Mr. Saban hosted Mrs. Clinton at a fund-raiser at his Beverly Hills mansion.

Univision, the No. 1 network for Latinos, whose audience often surpasses English-language broadcasters among viewers 18 to 34, gives any candidate (or their spouse) enormous reach among a critical part of the electorate. Ms. Menendez pointed out that there are 59 million Latinos in the United States, compared with 29 million when Mr. Clinton was president. (According to people close to the former president, Mr. Clinton has become particularly fixated on the demographic and on how Latinos could affect his wife's political fortunes, particularly if she finds herself running against one of two Florida Republicans, Senator Marco Rubio, a Cuban-American, or Jeb Bush, whose wife is Mexican.)

Without mentioning Mrs. Clinton or her campaign, Mr. Clinton said a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants would improve the economy and alleviate poverty.

"Putting people in the workplace legally would raise their wages and it would make our overall economy more prosperous," he said.

The topics, in typical Bill Clinton manner, transcended immigration. On a day when an economic adviser to the Clinton campaign, Joseph E. Stiglitz, presented a proposal to make companies less focused on short-term profits, Mr. Clinton endorsed the idea and called for increases in profit sharing with employees.

"We need to move away from so much financial trading to more old-fashioned investing," he said.

Mr. Clinton also said he worried about climate change and that United States foreign policy should support Lebanon and Jordan as they welcome refugees who have fled the conflict in Syria. He said he worried about farmers in Africa if there was ever a global food supply shortage, and he expressed concern about the growing distrust of police officers in the United States ("By the way, the time that fellow died in New York who was selling illegal cigarettes on the street … ").

And, finally, when he started to talk about his recent visit to the Ngorongoro Crater in Tanzania, where life is said to have begun some 200,000 years ago, when "man first stood up on our planet," Ms. Menendez cut him off. "President Clinton, I've been told we've got to wrap it up," she said.

The applause and music started just as the former president was in midsentence. An omniscient upfront voice chimed in. And just moments after Mr. Clinton departed the stage, lime-green money signs flashed against a black backdrop, and Univision's executive vice president of advertising sales took the microphone.

Hillary Clinton has spent her nascent campaign staking out positions to the left of where President Clinton stood on free trade, crime prevention and same-sex marriage. As of last week, we can add immigration reform to the list.

Bill Clinton, you might recall, was a vocal proponent of border enforcement. "We must say 'no' to illegal immigration so we can continue to say 'yes' to legal immigration," he remarked in July 1993 before asking Congress for an additional $172 million to launch Operation Hold the Line. Mr. Clinton said his multiyear plan would "protect our borders, remove criminal aliens, reduce work incentives for illegal immigration [and] stop asylum abuse." Within a year, the administration had erected miles of fencing and increased border patrols by 40% along the most popular corridors in California, Texas and Arizona.

There was no emphasis on border enforcement when the former first lady sat down with illegal immigrants in Nevada last week. Mrs. Clinton said she would give comprehensive immigration reform a try if elected, but don't expect her to try very hard. She was more interested in emphasizing her admiration for President Obama's executive action approach. "If Congress refuses to act," she said, "as president I will do everything possible under the law to go even further" than Mr. Obama, who bypassed the legislative branch last year and unilaterally shielded millions of illegal aliens from deportation.

Mrs. Clinton claims to want to "work across party lines" on immigration, which is how her husband operated. But lawmakers have little incentive to deal with a president who announces publicly before negotiations even begin that Congress's input will have no impact on the outcome, which is how Mr. Obama has operated. She is promising to humor Republicans, not bargain in good faith. And when she is not humoring them, she will be painting them as anti-Hispanic. "When they talk about 'legal status,'" said Mrs. Clinton, describing Republican presidential candidates who may be open to allowing some illegal immigrants to live and work here without being eligible for citizenship, "that's code for 'second-class' status."

Of course, second-class status is exactly what Mr. Obama has offered undocumented immigrants through his executive action, which is legally suspect, temporary and easily reversible by the next president. The GOP candidates have an opportunity to respond to Mrs. Clinton's pandering with a more permanent bipartisan solution to the problem, but so far most of them don't see much urgency.

Whit Ayers, a Republican pollster and strategist, says merely attacking illegal immigration—which is viewed by many Hispanics as an attack on their entire community—isn't enough for a candidate, and that the GOP's immigration-reform complacency could be costly in 2016 and beyond.

"The demographics in our country are changing so rapidly—with whites declining and nonwhites increasing about three percentage points each presidential election—that it becomes exceedingly difficult to win a majority of the popular vote just by increasing the share of the white vote going to the Republican candidate," Mr. Ayers told Forbes last month. Trying to gain a larger share of a shrinking proportion of the electorate is a losing strategy, he added. "It makes far more sense—in 2016 and certainly for elections after that—for Republicans to focus on dramatically increasing their share of the nonwhite vote, especially among Hispanics who are the fastest-growing minority group."

Among the Republican front-runners, Marco Rubio has been the most outspoken and specific. Rather than passing one large bill dealing with border security, worker visas and the legal status of people already here, Mr. Rubio favors passing smaller chunks of legislation sequentially. This approach both bows to reality—larger bills, including one formerly backed by Mr. Rubio, have repeatedly stalled—and polls well with Republican primary voters in early states. Jeb Bush and Rand Paul seem open to a similar strategy but have offered fewer details. Too many of the other Republicans, however, including the otherwise impressive Scott Walker, seem to think that "No Amnesty!" will suffice as an immigration platform.

Hillary Clinton needs to distance herself from her husband's handling of illegal immigration two decades ago in order to accommodate a Democratic Party that has since moved much further to the left. But what the GOP ought to have learned from Bill Clinton's experience is that focusing on border enforcement to the exclusion of economic factors that affect illegal immigration has its limits.

Operation Hold the Line and similar efforts like Operation Blockade and Operation Gatekeeper initially were successful. Illicit border crossings fell in areas where physical barriers were erected and patrols were added. But after a spell, people from south of the border found new ways to enter undetected, often across less-forgiving terrain. The more difficult journey allowed human smugglers to increase their fees. The cost and difficulty of crossing the better-fortified border gave illegals an incentive to remain in the U.S. after the harvest instead of returning home as they had in years past. Between 1990 and 2000, the illegal immigrant population in the U.S. grew by 5.5 million.

Illegal immigration is primarily a function of too many foreign nationals chasing too few work permits. Executive amnesties won't solve that problem, and neither will militarizing the Rio Grande.

Dear Hillary, Do Illegal Immigrants Pay More Taxes Or Get Bigger Refunds? // Forbes // Robert Wood – May 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton claimed at a roundtable in North Las Vegas that illegal immigrants pay more taxes than some big corporations: "In New York, which I know a little bit about because I represented it for eight years and I live there now, our undocumented workers in New York pay more in taxes than some of the biggest corporations in New York."

Even the Washington Post awarded Mrs. Clinton Four Pinocchios for her claim. To be fair, Mrs. Clinton was speaking generally. Plus, she can find some thin support in an opinion column that says corporate giants often get huge tax breaks. In contrast, poor, undocumented immigrants have paid billions in state taxes. Even so, WaPo tracks this back to the website of Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and an Institute for Taxation and Economic Policy report.

It turns out that Mrs. Clinton's comparison conflates state and local taxes, including property and sales taxes, with federal income taxes. If you look at property and sales taxes, the big companies to which Mrs. Clinton alludes pay a lot, more, in fact, than undocumented individuals. WaPo mentions Verizon and Citicorp. Mrs. Clinton's spokesman Josh Schwerin stated that:

The point she was making is that undocumented immigrants pay more in state and local taxes alone than some of our biggest companies pay in either state or federal corporate income tax. That is a striking fact. And that's why she raised it.

Undocumented immigrants pay sales taxes. Moreover, one estimate says that illegal immigrants paid $12 billion in Social Security taxes in 2010–using false or duplicative Social Security numbers. Even companies that pay little or no federal income tax pay lots of other taxes. It is also not clear how much illegal immigrants take out. President Obama's aggressive executive action on immigration is still being litigated in the courts.

Tax refunds for the affected illegal immigrants have become controversial. The IRS says that illegal immigrants can file and claim refunds for the last three years under the Earned Income Tax Credit. That is the same refundable tax credit that is responsible for billions in fraudulent refunds. IRS Commissioner Koskinen confirmed this, explaining the seemingly bizarre result to Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa). What if you never reported any income or never filed a return?

Under President Obama's executive action, an illegal immigrant can: (1) get a Social Security number; (2) claim the Earned Income Tax Credit for the three open tax years; and (3) IRS sends three years of tax refunds. No matter that you never paid taxes, never filed a return, worked off the books, etc. The IRS says this is the way the Earned Income Tax Credit works. IRS Commissioner Koskinen says the IRS is following a 15-year-old opinion that "a taxpayer may claim the Earned Income Tax Credit for a taxable year using a Social Security number acquired in a later taxable year."

Calling the three year tax refund perk a mockery of the law, Senator Grassley noted that illegals would be able to claim billions of dollars in tax benefits. Sen. Grassley vowed legislation to overturn the IRS position. "The tax code shouldn't reward those who broke our immigration laws," he said. So far, the President hasn't backed down, so U.S. Rep. Patrick McHenry has introduced a bill to keep undocumented workers from receiving the Earned Income Tax Credit, a benefit for low- to moderate-income taxpayers.

"My bill is a direct result of the (IRS) announcement," said McHenry, a Republican who represents the 10th

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

District, which includes Gaston County. “It’s very simple. If you’re not here legally, you should not be able to access the Earned Income Credit. It’s for the American taxpayers who are trying to make ends meet.”

Illegal immigrants in the U.S. covered by President Obama’s executive action can apply for tax breaks going back three years. Rep. McHenry thinks there is a great chance for fraudulent returns, noting that even if undocumented workers were employed in the past, many may have used Social Security numbers that didn’t belong to them. That in itself is fraud.

Rep. McHenry says illegal workers who broke the law should not benefit from the U.S. tax system. “If you’re here counter to the law, you should not be able to recoup from the taxpayer that which you were fraudulently getting,” he said. Rep. McHenry introduced the No Free Rides Act. The bill would not stop illegal immigrants from filing tax returns, but would prohibit those workers from using Earned Income Tax Credit.

“President Obama’s immigration action giving millions of illegal immigrants Social Security numbers marked an unprecedented executive overreach,” said McHenry. “Now, we learn that these same people, whose first act on American soil was breaking our laws, might be eligible for up to $24,000 in tax credits. This is simply unacceptable. By introducing the No Free Rides Act we ensure these illegal immigrants will not receive any more benefits intended to help American families.”

How Bill Clinton’s Library Promotes Hillary Too // TIME // Philip Elliott - May 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton worked to expand health care, improve failing schools and served as “America’s foremost ambassador.” And that was just during her time as First Lady.

That’s the portrait painted by the William J. Clinton Presidential Library, which despite the name has no shortage of material on Hillary. Around every corner of the Little Rock museum is another testimonial to Hillary’s role in his administration and a reminder that—as he put it in the 1992 campaign—voters got “two for the price of one.”

These days, Hillary Clinton is running as her own woman, stressing her time as U.S. Senator from New York and Secretary of State in the Obama Administration. She’s also moving away from her husband’s record on issues as varied as trade deals, gay rights and policing.

(Bill Clinton can hardly take offense. He even does a bit of that in his own library. In one display, the library tries to distance him from the now-scrapped Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell policy that barred gays and lesbians to serve openly in the military. “The law was never applied as intended,” reads a placard.)

Throughout the modern and spacious library, Bill Clinton offers nothing but the predictably glowing account of his wife’s skills and experience as a public servant. Even in failure, as was the case in her push to overhaul the nation’s health care system, Clinton’s library pitches success. “The effort to expand coverage, led by the First Lady, set the stage for step-by-step improvements to our health care system over the next seven years,” reads one caption.

Similarly, Hillary Clinton was tapped to “spearhead” education reform. And in describing her landmark address in China, in which she declared women’s rights are human rights, the library’s displays lauded her: “As America’s foremost ambassador, she brought to Beijing a message of hope, empowerment and social development.”

An inquiry to the library about how the former First Lady is represented and how the exhibits might have changed since they opened in 2004 was referred to a public relations adviser, Jordan Johnson. He did not return phone messages.

Yet not all depictions of Clinton are exactly flattering. After all, it isn't every museum that has depictions of a spouse on needlepoint or on a quilt. Or includes a pair of cream cowboy boots emblazoned with her initials in gold leather, a gift from a Houston admirer. Or a stitched blanket from a California supporter that includes not just the Clintons' October wedding date but also daughter Chelsea's birthday.

At the same time, the scandals of the 1990s are obviously whitewashed and political scores are settled, as is the case at most presidential libraries. The Clintons single out House Speaker Newt Gingrich as pushing the "politics of personal destruction." The museum reminds visitors that in 1994, shortly before becoming Speaker of the House, Gingrich publicly described Clinton Democrats "the enemy of normal Americans."

In describing the government shutdowns the followed GOP takeover of Congress, the Clinton library describes Republicans as "rejecting compromise" and bringing "an ideological agenda."

The library's take on independent counsel Kenneth Starr, who discovered Clinton's relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky? "A conservative activist who had never before prosecuted a case." The resulting impeachment had "no constitutional or legal basis."

And on the failed land deal known as Whitewater that set off the string of scandals that threatened Clinton's presidency, the library is terse: "No evidence of wrongdoing was ever found."

But there is no escaping some of the awkwardness that crept into the Clinton presidency amid the tumult. In a 1998 holiday portrait taken in the White House's formal Blue Room, the pair is not touching or even looking at each other. Bill Clinton admitted to having an affair with Lewinsky during the summer of that year.

By the following year, facing a shared Republican enemy and the threat of impeachment, the Clintons again were embracing and working as political partners, as the library is fond of portraying them.

Chelsea Clinton could take on role of first lady if Hillary wins, White House expert says // Daily Mail // Francesco Chambers - May 12, 2015

If the Clintons were to move back into 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, the first daughter, Chelsea, would presumably take on the traditional responsibilities of the first lady, an expert on the White House tells Daily Mail Online.

'There is a social function to the first lady's role, and that will not go away,' C-SPAN co-CEO Susan Swain said. 'Diplomacy' is conducted through social settings, 'and it is important to have somebody in that role.'

Several first daughters have filled the role of hostess in place of their mothers throughout American history, Swain, the producer of C-SPAN's acclaimed series on America's first ladies and the author of a book on the same subject, said, noting that there is precedent for such an arrangement.

'The best guesstimate with the Clintons is that Chelsea Clinton would take over that role,' Swain said.

The last White House to have a hostess who was not the wife of the president was exactly a century ago during the tenure of Woodrow Wilson.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Wilson's first wife, Ellen, died a year and a half into his presidency, their daughter, Margaret Woodrow Wilson, formally took on the role of first lady at age 28 for more than a year until the president remarried in 1915.

The only daughter of Benjamin Harrison, Mary McKee, also became the face of the East Wing after her mother Caroline died. She was 34 when she assumed the role, which she held until the end of her father's time as the nation's chief executive.

Likewise, Martha Jefferson Randolph's mother, also named Martha, had already passed away when her father, Thomas Jefferson, was elected to serve in the Oval Office. That left the 28-year-old daughter of the nation's third president to manage the East Wing.

In other instances, daughters-in-laws, sisters and even a niece fulfilled the duties of the first lady when the position was otherwise vacant.

A recluse who didn't want her husband to win his bid for the White House, Margaret 'Peggy' Taylor shunned the role of hostess and instead bestowed it on her daughter, Mary Elizabeth 'Betty' Bliss.

Hillary Clinton's first South Carolina campaign visit is May 27 // Post and Courier // Schuyler Kropf - May 12, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton will make her first campaign trip to South Carolina on May 27 - a Wednesday two weeks from now.

No list of sites or schedule of appearances was immediately released by the campaign, but Charleston and Columbia are likely to be included.

Both areas are home to large pockets of traditional Democratic voters.

“It will be the first of many conversations with South Carolinians about making sure the economy works for everyday Americans,” her campaign said in a news release Tuesday.

“As she has said before, Hillary Clinton will work to earn every vote, run hard in the 2016 South Carolina Primary and take nothing for granted,” the announcement also said.

In 2008, Clinton lost her previous primary run here by a wide margin when Barack Obama collected 55 percent of the vote in the multi-candidate field.

She finished a distant second, with 27 percent.

As a declared 2016 White House hopeful, Clinton has previously visited the other early voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada. During those stops she mostly favored small-scale events, such as roundtables with local officials or students and other private gatherings.

But during her Las Vegas stop she gave her most comprehensive statement on immigration reform as a presidential candidate, advocating “a full and equal path to citizenship” for undocumented residents now in the U.S.

In advance of her South Carolina visit, Clinton supporters have been meeting in grassroots events across the state. Nearly a dozen house parties are scheduled in the upcoming weeks.

On Wednesday, the Hillary for South Carolina campaign will host its first phone bank in the Midlands region, from 6-8 p.m.

Other house parties include Greenville on Saturday and Charleston on Sunday. More events will follow in Spartanburg, Columbia and Rock Hill in the next week, the campaign said.

Banks brace for Bernie Sanders // The Hill // Kevin Cirill - May 12, 2015

Wall Street is worried that Sen. Bernie Sanders's vigorous calls for banking industry reform will pull Hillary Clinton to the left, as the two presidential candidates battle for the 2016 Democratic nomination.

Sanders (I-Vt.) last week unveiled new legislation designed to break up the nation's largest banks, declaring that "if an institution is too big to fail, it is too big to exist."

Though it stands virtually no chance of passage in the GOP-controlled Congress, the bill has industry leaders fretting.

"The prospects of it becoming law are nil," said one banking lobbyist, who described Sanders's legislations as "shrill, bombastic and misaligned."

"But we care about whether this impacts Hillary and whether she'll try to pander to the far left."

Business and banking groups, and their lobbying forces on K Street, are quickly lining up against the legislation.

"Misses the mark," said Tom Quaadman, vice president of the U.S. Chamber Center for Capital Markets Competitiveness.

"I fully expect Senator Sanders's third attempt to break up banks to have the same impact as the previous two: zero," echoed Tony Fratto, a partner at Hamilton Place Strategies, which does communications work with big banks.

Despite the vocal opposition from the business community, Sanders's ability to activate progressive outside groups could mean he may be able to move Clinton to the left — even if, as conventional wisdom says, he poses no real threat to the former secretary of State's eventual nomination.

Sanders's rhetoric signals that, seven years after the 2008 economic collapse, progressives still see tapping into anger about the taxpayer bailouts to big banks as a winning political strategy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“When it comes down to it — he’s doing this not just because he’s trying to demonize the industry but this populist stuff is popular with his base,” a second banking lobbyist said.

Groups like MoveOn.org and Democracy for America (DFA) have already launched campaigns to get Clinton to adopt a more progressive platform and to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) into the race, despite her declarations that she’s not running for president.

Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.), who is sponsoring similar legislation in the House, said that any criticism of the legislation is coming from “top executives who control the biggest banks.”

“This isn’t about an election cycle,” Sherman said. “I am much more interested in what Hillary Clinton does as president in office than in a campaign. Campaigns are fun but governing is what matters.”

Still, Sherman said that he hopes the legislation, which even he conceded isn’t likely to become law this Congress, might move the needle for his party.

“I’m hoping that some time in the next few years we will have ‘too big to fail is too big to exist’ policy either by using existing laws or by passing new statutes,” Sherman said.

Paul Merski, an executive vice president at the Independent Community Bankers Association, said many smaller community banks support Sanders’s effort.

“It may force [Clinton] to speak about ‘too big to fail,’ ” Merski said.

Clinton is under pressure from Sanders, Warren and other liberals to take a harder line on financial issues as she looks to rally Democrats behind her campaign. But at the same time, too forceful a stance could cause her a headache in the general election.

In other areas — such as immigration, gay marriage and campaign finance —Clinton has taken liberal positions on issues since launching her campaign.

But she has yet to release any specific type of economic policy agenda, something that she is certain to be asked about in the coming months.

Meanwhile, Warren, Sanders and other progressives have raised criticism about former President Bill Clinton’s economic policies during the late 1990s. Chief among them is his support for — and signature on — the repeal in 1999 of the Glass-Steagall banking law requiring commercial banks to split their investment banking operations.

Sanders was one of eight lawmakers to vote against Glass-Steagall’s repeal.

“Bernie Sanders is a long-time champion of these issues,” said Neil Sroka, spokesman for the DFA. “This is about Democrats putting forward very early on in the cycle big progressive ideas.”

Quaadman was less convinced.

“Continuing to politicize the debate about our financial regulatory system will not produce the thoughtful, forward-looking leadership and smart regulation we need to grow our economy,” Quaadman said.

O'Malley plans 4 stops in NH Wednesday // WMUR // May 11, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. —Former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley has four New Hampshire stops planned for Wednesday. The Democrat will begin the day with a diner stop in Manchester at a location to be announced, followed by a visit to the Alpha Loft, a business incubator, also in Manchester.

O’Malley will attend a private fundraiser for the New Hampshire House Democratic Caucus at midday and then attend a party at the Durham home of former executi

O'Malley Returns to New Hampshire this Week // Cocord Patch // Tony Schinella - May 12, 2015

Potential first-in-the-nation Democratic primary presidential candidate former Gov. Martin O’Malley, D-MD, will be in New Hampshire beginning on May 13, according to a statement.

O’Malley will be making a diner stop in Manchester at around 8:30 a.m. He’ll also be visiting Alpha Loft on Elm Street.

He’ll be participating in a private fundraiser for the House Democratic Caucus at the New Hampshire Democratic Party headquarters.

Later, he’ll be participating in a house party hosted by Dudley Dudley in Durham. O’Malley will then be campaigning with Maureen Mann, candidate for NH House of Representatives.

Bill de Blasio proposing national paid family leave that his own employees don’t get // WaPo // Reid Wilson - May 12, 2015

When New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio rolls out his liberal response to the Contract with America today in Washington, his 13-point plan will call for a $15 minimum wage, universal pre-kindergarten programs — and paid family leave.

That left some New York City employees scratching their heads: The half a million people who work for the city don’t receive paid maternity or paternity leave through their own health plan.

In fact, New York City’s health plan lags far behind even the most basic Affordable Care Act plans when it comes to maternity care. The health-care plan is one of a number of plans grandfathered into the ACA, which means it doesn’t have to meet standards the law requires of other plans.

So while the Affordable Care Act requires plans competing in Health Insurance Marketplaces to cover things like contraception, breastfeeding supplies and screenings for gestational diabetes and domestic violence, the grandfather clause allows New York’s health plan to avoid offering any of those.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

De Blasio has proposed broadening the city's health-care plan to cover those expenses, but the city council and the state legislature in Albany have yet to act.

"Mayor de Blasio supports a national paid family leave policy as the most comprehensive way to achieve this vital goal. We are also studying what we can do locally, including how best to provide paid family leave to City employees," Amy Spitalnick, de Blasio's spokeswoman, said in an e-mail.

In March, he signed legislation requiring companies with more than five employees to provide paid sick leave, a measure his office estimated will extend to about half a million New Yorkers working for the private sector.

The grandfathered rules in the Affordable Care Act were designed to protect health-care plans that existed before March 23, 2010, the day President Obama signed the Affordable Care Act. More than half of all companies offered at least one grandfathered plan in their range of options, according to a 2013 Kaiser Family Foundation survey.

But enrollment in those plans is dropping, from 56 percent of covered workers in 2011 to 36 percent in 2013, according to the Bell Policy Center.

New Hampshire Poll: 2016 Republican Pack Has No Breakout Candidate Yet // Bloomberg // Margaret Talev - May 12, 2015

Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush may have money and name recognition, but voter enthusiasm for Senators Rand Paul and Marco Rubio and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker is fueling a wide-open contest in New Hampshire, nine months before the state's first-in-the-nation presidential primary.

More likely Republican primary voters in a new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm New Hampshire Poll said they had either a "very favorable" or "somewhat favorable" opinion of Paul than any other GOP contender, 62 percent. He's followed by Rubio at 60 percent, Bush at 59 percent, and Walker and Texas Senator Ted Cruz at 54 percent. Rubio's popularity with New Hampshire primary voters represents a surge, up from 52 percent in February, suggesting a good bounce off of his formal entry into the race last month.

Bush has the highest unfavorable rating from likely Republican primary voters among the party's leading contenders, with 35 percent saying they had either "somewhat unfavorable" or "very unfavorable" opinions of him. Paul's unfavorable rating is 27 percent among primary voters, while Rubio's is 18 percent and Walker's is only 14 percent.

Regardless of who wins the primary, the general election may pose problems for Republicans in New Hampshire. No Republican has a higher favorability rating among likely general-election voters than Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, who stands at 46 percent.

The poll, conducted May 2-6 by Washington-based Purple Insights, found that the four leading Republican candidates are neck and neck: Paul and Walker each were the first choice of 12 percent of likely GOP primary voters, while Bush and Rubio took 11 percent. While Cruz scored a high favorable mark, he was the first choice of just 6 percent of GOP primary voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is incredibly fluid, and all of these underlying numbers point to that fluidity,” said Purple Insights' Doug Usher.

“It's four people, all at about the same level, with no clear front-runner,” Usher said. “So the next question: Is one of them better liked? And the answer is, there are three of them who are better liked: Paul, Walker, and Rubio,” when their unfavorable ratings and the intensity of voters' favorable feelings toward them are taken into account.

When only the “very favorable” category is measured among likely Republican primary voters, Walker leads with 25 percent, followed by Rubio at 24 percent, Paul at 22 percent, and Bush, Cruz, and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 19 percent. Usher said Bush's perceived fundraising advantage may even out the dynamic to some degree.

“Jeb's got the money, and these folks have popularity. If you're Jeb and you look at these numbers, you're thinking, 'I've got to bolster my strength, and I've got to bring them down a peg.'”

Among likely general-election voters, Paul enjoys the highest favorability rating of the Republican contenders, with 40 percent expressing either “very favorable” or “somewhat favorable” opinions of him. Rubio and Bush follow, at 37 percent. Behind them are former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, at 34 percent; New Jersey Governor Chris Christie at 32 percent; Cruz at 31 percent; and Walker at 30 percent.

Many Republicans–including Paul and Bush–have higher unfavorable ratings than favorables among likely general-election voters.

Bush's unfavorable rating among likely general-election voters–53 percent–is the highest of the four leading Republicans. Only businessman and TV personality Donald Trump and Christie had worse unfavorables, at 64 percent and 54 percent respectively.

Among independent voters—a barometer of general-election dynamics—Paul again enjoys an advantage among the four leading Republicans, with a favorable-to-unfavorable ratio of 44 percent to 39 percent. Rubio also is in positive territory, 36 percent to 32 percent. Walker gets a 27 percent favorable rating from independents and a 29 percent unfavorable rating, while Bush's rating is 38 percent favorable to 51 percent unfavorable.

Underscoring the fluidity of the race, the poll found that the Republican presidential hopefuls have yet to distinguish themselves from one another when it comes to specific leadership traits.

Likely Republican primary voters were asked which of five candidates—Bush, Cruz, Paul, Rubio, and Walker—were best described by the phrase “cares about people like you.” Nearly half of the respondents didn't pick a specific candidate. Among the individual candidates, Walker fared best, at 15 percent.

Similar results for other questions on leadership, honesty, values, and vision suggest that all five have room to grow as the state's voters get to know more about them.

Les McKechnie, 68, of Freedom, N.H., a retired sales engineer and Army colonel who responded to the poll, said Rubio is his leading choice because “he's young; he's got new ideas.” But in a reflection of just how much opinions can change, McKechnie jokingly added: “That was last week.”

“You never know what's going to happen,” he said. “We're so far away from the ultimate determination.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll included 500 general-election voters as well as oversamples to have 400 Republican primary voters and 400 Democratic primary voters. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points on general-election questions and plus or minus 4.9 percentage points on primary-election questions. The margin of error in subgroups such as independents voting in the general election may be higher.

Jeb Bush Backpedals Again // New York Times // Maggie Haberman -May 12, 2015

Jeb Bush on Tuesday sought to arrest a chorus of criticism from Democrats and some conservatives after he told an interviewer that, knowing what history has since shown about intelligence failures, he still would have authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

Calling in to Sean Hannity's syndicated radio show, Mr. Bush said he had misunderstood a question that one of Mr. Hannity's Fox News colleagues, Megyn Kelly, had asked him in an interview shown on Sunday and Monday nights.

"I interpreted the question wrong, I guess," Mr. Bush said. "I was talking about, given what people knew then."

The attempt at mopping-up was quick, but it did not bring the controversy to an immediate end: When Mr. Hannity asked about the 2003 Iraq invasion again, in yes-or-no fashion, Mr. Bush said he did not know what the answer would have been, saying, "That's a hypothetical." Then, he seemed to go out of his way to absolve his brother, former President George W. Bush, who ordered the invasion: "Mistakes were made, as they always are in life," Mr. Bush said.

It was the third time in six weeks that Mr. Bush had to backpedal, offering a stark reminder that despite his deep political ties and his family's history in elected office, he remains a novice on the national campaign trail.

Allies believe that Mr. Bush, a former Florida governor, has had to contend with an unfair level of scrutiny that no other Republican has faced. Though his team still lacks formal structure, Mr. Bush is generally more visible than, say, Hillary Rodham Clinton, who entered the race for the Democratic nomination in mid-April but has not taken reporters' questions in three weeks.

But for Mr. Bush, the last six weeks have been a bracing reminder that helping a relative run for president is not the same as running yourself.

Mr. Bush, who is said to take a dim view of his Republican rivals' leadership qualities, prides himself on his candor, authenticity and ability to work without a script, and his skills as a candidate have noticeably sharpened. But he has repeatedly paid a price for straying from his briefing notes.

In a radio interview in late March, Mr. Bush praised an Indiana law billed as protecting religious freedom that was backed by Gov. Mike Pence, saying that if people read the law, they would find nothing discriminatory in it.

Less than 48 hours later, after a number of Republican donors complained to his advisers, Mr. Bush told donors in Silicon Valley that he believed Indiana would end up in "the right place" with a compromise fix that would offer greater gay rights protections.

People close to Mr. Bush later told allies that he had gone further than he had intended to in the radio interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Also in late March, Mr. Bush incurred the wrath of pro-Israel hawks by refusing to step in to prevent James A. Baker III — the former secretary of state who is on a long list of foreign policy advisers to Mr. Bush — from appearing before the liberal pro-Israel group J Street. Fulfilling the predictions of Mr. Baker's critics, Mr. Bush has faced questions about the episode at closed-door meetings with donors and party activists ever since.

As late as last week, in a meeting in Manhattan with more than 40 foreign policy-minded donors organized by the hedge-fund executive Paul Singer, Mr. Bush called Mr. Baker a "good man" but added that he was 85 — a remark several people in the room took to mean that he believed Mr. Baker's worldview was dated.

Still, Mr. Bush conceded that his rollout of such a broad array of foreign policy advisers had been "a mistake." He had pleased no one by putting so many people on the list, he said, instead giving all corners of the party something to criticize.

Mr. Bush's botching of the question from Ms. Kelly on the Iraq invasion — one that was eminently foreseeable for a brother of the president who ordered it — was seized upon by commentators across the political spectrum.

"Jeb's statement is likely to resonate until he either changes his position or loses the race for the Republican nomination," wrote Byron York, the chief political correspondent for the conservative Washington Examiner.

Not long before Mr. Hannity's interview with Mr. Bush was broadcast on Tuesday, one of Mr. Bush's potential rivals, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, sought to draw a contrast between himself and Mr. Bush.

"I want to directly answer your question, because that's what I do," Mr. Christie told CNN's Jake Tapper. "If we knew then what we know now and I were the president of the United States, I wouldn't have gone to war. But you don't get to replay history."

Jeb Bush, Ana Navarro and the Question That May Have Been Misheard // New York Times // Jason Horowitz - May 12, 2015

MIAMI — The media's preferred expert on Jeb Bush's inner thoughts tried to explain on Tuesday morning the likely Republican presidential candidate's much discussed remarks to an interviewer that, even knowing what he knows now, he would have authorized the invasion of Iraq.

"I can tell you that I emailed him this morning, and I said to him, 'Hey, I'm a little confused by this answer so I'm genuinely wondering, did you mishear the question?'" Ana Navarro, an oft-quoted dial-a-zinger, said Tuesday on CNN, where she is a political pundit. "And he said, 'Yes, I misheard the question.'"

Ms. Navarro, 43, is often identified as a "confidante" of Jeb Bush or a "Republican strategist." But her chief qualification is that she, better than anyone in the 2016 presidential cycle, hits the sweet spot of the Republican Party's hunger for Hispanic female validators, the political media's craving for an aura of access, and the overall dearth of wit in the talking point echo chamber.

Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)?

Well liked in political media circles, Ms. Navarro visits primary states and skewers Mr. Bush's potential opponents. ("I don't need her to drown me in estrogen every time she opens her mouth," she said of Hillary Rodham Clinton on CNN.) Her rollicking commentary and willingness to criticize Republicans on same-sex marriage and immigration issues make her a favorite of TV bookers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How much of a confidante she is of Mr. Bush, however, is open to question. She never worked as a strategist on any of his campaigns, and she had to leave a job as Florida's director of immigration policy when he was governor after it was discovered that she did not have a law license. Still, her connection to Mr. Bush has been decades in the making.

"She's a friend" who "hangs out in South Florida" and "had been around the political world," said Jeb Bush Jr., a son of the former governor. "We've known her for a long time," he said, adding that having "more Hispanic or Latina conservatives out there" is good "for any Republican, especially Dad."

Bush père et fils both keep offices in Coral Gables's Biltmore Hotel, the president of which is Ms. Navarro's boyfriend, Gene Prescott, 71, a Democratic fund-raiser. On a recent afternoon, Mr. Prescott sat in the courtyard of the hotel's Fontana restaurant scooping the froth off his cappuccino with a biscotto. Ms. Navarro herself talks often of her afternoons spent among the faux Grecian statues around the pool of the Spanish colonial-style hotel.

Ms. Navarro at first declined to comment for this article. "She said, 'Do Not Cooperate,' in big, bold flashing letters," said Donna Brazile, Ms. Navarro's Democratic counterpart on CNN, with whom she enjoys drinking wine and shooting back oysters-on-the-half–shell. But after her remarks on Tuesday morning, which were not authorized or entirely appreciated by Mr. Bush's nascent campaign, Ms. Navarro wrote: "I'm often described as Jeb's adviser. It's the opposite. Jeb has helped me and doled out words of wisdom and advice throughout my adult life. I am grateful for that."

The daughter of a Nicaraguan businessman who opposed the rise of the leftist Sandanistas, Ms. Navarro came to Florida in 1980 at age 8. She went on to graduate from the University of Miami and then St. Thomas University Law School. As an activist in the Nicaraguan community, she befriended Mr. Bush as he lobbied Congress on an immigration law to benefit others fleeing her home country. She joined Mr. Bush's transition team and then his administration.

"I am passing on your email to ana navarro who just came on as our immigration lawyer/advisor," Mr. Bush replied to a constituent in an email on Jan. 31, 1999.

Ms. Navarro said her initial job did not require a law license. But after being reassigned to another one that did, she left state government.

"We parted amicably," said Ms. Navarro, adding that Mr. Bush helped set her up with a public affairs firm. From that perch she communicated with him frequently, according to emails that have since become public.

In one email she told him that he was "looking verrrry gubernatorial" and asked him if he could make some remarks for a "primera pagina" Wall Street Journal article about a client of hers. She told him that the Ryder company, a major employer in Florida, was going through a rough patch that could lead to its scaling back in the state, and that the article could help the company avoid that. It would be "enormemente" appreciated, she wrote.

Mr. Bush wrote back, in an email peppered with sideways smiley faces, "I will speak highly about Ryder which I will do with gusto."

More emails sprinkled with Spanish and smiley faces followed, and Ms. Navarro became an expert at leveraging her access to the governor to benefit her clients. And she made sure her clients knew she had access. In 2002, she wrote to Mr. Bush explaining that she had helped persuade Nicaragua's president, Enrique Bolaños, to take in Cuban refugees intercepted by the American authorities at sea, in part by assuring him that such a measure would be appreciated by Mr. Bush and his brother, President George W. Bush.

Hillary Clinton-Aligned Group Gets Closer to Her Campaign 3:27 PM ET

In the fall of 2003, she wrote to Mr. Bush that “all the commies are coming to town” for an event at the Biltmore Hotel promoting a normalization of relations with Cuba. She wrote that she had “persuaded” the Biltmore to allow her to stage a counterevent attended by prominent opponents of the Castro government.

“Ana, you are right on target with the counter event,” Mr. Bush replied. “I will try to make it.”

Mr. Bush’s senior staff was less enthusiastic. “Please tell me he is not doing????” Arlene DiBenigno, a top aide to Mr. Bush, wrote to his scheduler, adding, “bottom line I think everyone has agreed because they think Gov is going to be there.”

The Biltmore is a concrete connection between Ms. Navarro and Mr. Bush, but it was once a source of tension. In a 2004 email with the subject line “budget request,” Ms. Navarro asked Mr. Bush to look with a “very kind and generous eye” at proposed funding for the hotel.

But Mr. Bush later vetoed the item, prompting another email from Ms. Navarro.

“My boyfriend hates you,” she wrote, referring to Mr. Prescott.

If Mr. Prescott “hates me,” Mr. Bush wrote back, “I am sorry about that.”

Since then, Ms. Navarro has stayed active in politics.

She joined Senator John McCain’s presidential campaign as a leader of his Hispanic advisory council in 2008, and she made a name for herself by criticizing fellow Republicans, especially former Gov. Charlie Crist of Florida. She attacked Governor Crist for endorsing the Obama administration’s stimulus plan and once upbraided him on a plane.

During the 2012 presidential campaign, she supported former Gov. Jon M. Huntsman Jr. of Utah and became a familiar face on television as a CNN political analyst, increasingly known for her candid assessments. That led in February 2014 to another job as a contributor to ABC News.

While Ms. Navarro has been a consistent and highly quotable booster of Mr. Bush in all places, she seemed to acknowledge that she had gone too far on CNN on Tuesday.

When pressed as to what Mr. Bush should have said regarding invading Iraq, Ms. Navarro answered, “That’s one for his spokesperson, not for me.”

But on this occasion, she seemed to have given Mr. Bush little choice about what to say.

“I interpreted the question wrong, I guess. I was talking about, given what people knew then,” Mr. Bush said in a Tuesday evening interview with Sean Hannity. He added, “Knowing what we know now, clearly there were mistakes.”

Jeb keeps it all in the family // POLITICO // Roger Simon - May 12, 2015

Would you let Donald Trump tell you where to get a haircut? Would you take driving tips from Lindsay Lohan? Or ask Sarah Palin's advice about ... anything?

Whom we seek advice from reveals a lot about ourselves, our judgment, our common sense.

So it was a shock over the past week when presidential candidate in training Jeb Bush divulged that his closest adviser on Mideast and Israeli affairs is George W. Bush.

I actually blinked when I read that. George W. used to make jokes about his own intelligence. Or lack thereof. This was one of his favorite anecdotes:

"Don't try to be charming, witty or intelligent," Laura Bush told her husband as he began his campaign for president. "Just be yourself."

As the years went by, that got less and less funny. And today, many look at George W. Bush and see the man who launched a disastrous war in Iraq that killed thousands and squandered trillions.

But not his brother Jeb. "If you want to know who I listen to for advice, it's him," Jeb said of George W. last Tuesday at a secret meeting for fat-cat investors in New York.

Which leads me to wonder just how many times Jeb was dropped on his head as a child.

History will record that George W. Bush's most significant contribution to world history was invading Iraq under the totally false notion that Iraq had stockpiled weapons of mass destruction.

The Iraq War of 2003-11 resulted in 4,488 U.S. dead and 32,222 U.S. wounded, and cost more than $2 trillion.

According to the Costs of War Project by the Watson Institute for International Studies at Brown University, the war also "killed at least 134,000 Iraqi civilians and may have contributed to the deaths of as many as four times that number."

Well, stuff happens. You want an omelet, you've got to break some eggs. And at least we got something out of the war, right?

Well, not so much.

The Brown report said, "The United States gained little from the war while Iraq was traumatized by it. The war reinvigorated radical Islamist militants in the region, set back women's rights, and weakened an already precarious healthcare system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Meanwhile, the $212 billion reconstruction effort was largely a failure with most of that money spent on security or lost to waste and fraud."

According to Robert Costa and Matea Gold of The Washington Post, one attendee of the fat-cat meeting in New York "was 'stunned' to hear Jeb Bush specifically mention George W. Bush as his go-to adviser. 'I started looking around and wondering if people were recording it. It was jarring,' the attendee said. 'If video of it got out, it'd be devastating.'"

Maybe. Maybe not. A few days after the New York gathering, Jeb Bush told Fox News' Megyn Kelly: "I would have [authorized the invasion of Iraq], and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody."

And "just for the news flash to the world, if they're trying to find places where there's big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those," Jeb said.

Yeah, what the heck. It was just a war. And some really, really smart people were all for it. People like Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld.

When you're president, you pick the people you want around you and then you listen to them.

Some 71 percent of Americans believe the Iraq War "wasn't worth it," according to a June 2014 NBC/WSJ poll. But it's easy to criticize after the fact.

Back before the war started, it was the men and women gathered in the Situation Room and the Oval Office who advised the president on the war-or-peace, life-or-death decisions.

And choosing those people is one of the most important things a president does.

So to fully appreciate the importance of Jeb's revelation that George W. will be his chief adviser when it comes to the Mideast, you've got to keep in mind that Jeb's entire campaign is built around one selling point:

Jeb is the smart one in the family.

No Iowa Straw Poll for Jeb Bush // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs - May 12, 2015

The likely Republican presidential candidate will instead attend a competing event, the RedState Gathering in Atlanta, the day of the Iowa event, GOP sources in Iowa told The Des Moines Register Tuesday. A spokesman for Bush confirmed the report.

Bush, a former Florida governor, is the first among the Republican 2016 presidential field to officially opt out of the straw poll, a nationally-renowned event that has drawn significant criticism over the years.

The Republican Party of Iowa, which hosts the Iowa Straw Poll, has been working to shore up the event's reputation and lure candidates by addressing some of the most prevalent complaints. Last week, Iowa GOP officials announced they'll provide free tent space and utilities for the campaigns. The straw poll has been bashed as having outsized importance, even to the point of having losing candidates drop out of the race. Campaigns sometimes spent hundreds of thousands of dollars at the straw poll as a sort of dry run for the Iowa caucuses.

But for the GOP presidential contenders, the straw poll provides more of a risk-reward analysis. For those who compete, the aim is to do better than expected. This cycle, some contenders have said, they intend to focus instead on the caucuses, which will take place in precincts across the state on Feb. 1.

Recent polling has shown that Iowa isn't exactly friendly territory for Bush. He ranked in seventh place out of 14 GOP contenders tested in a April 25-May 4 Quinnipiac University poll. When asked if there is any candidate they would definitely not support, 25 percent of likely Iowa GOP caucusgoers named Bush. That put Bush at the top of that negative list.

Late Monday, the founder of the RedState blog, Erick Erickson, announced that Bush, former CEO Carly Fiorina, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker would speak during the three-day RedState Gathering Aug. 6-8. The Register was first to report that Bush will address the GOP activists in Georgia on Aug, 8, the same day as the straw poll.

Fighting the Last War // Slate // John Dickerson - May 12, 2015

What does Jeb Bush think about Iraq? It's not clear. When he's asked about it, he is quick to note that it's an issue where people won't find much daylight between him and his brother George W. Bush. "Just for the news flash to the world, if they're trying to find places where there's big space between me and my brother, this might not be one of those," he told Megyn Kelly, the Fox News host.

There's no evidence that was what Kelly was going after, but there is an endless obsession with measuring him relative to his brother and father, so he's naturally wary. But he's also trying to twist any questions about his brother's foreign policy legacy in Iraq into gotcha journalism (see Mark Leibovich), making inquiries into the topic seem like a low-rent effort to sow filial discord. The implication is that if it weren't for that media fixation, there wouldn't be so much poking around on where he stands on Iraq.

That's obviously not the case. Or it shouldn't be anyway. Iraq and what went right and wrong are a part of any intelligent conversation about America's foreign policy posture, particularly the posture as Republicans see it. Republicans in the main believe that President Obama has been weak. GOP presidential candidates promise they will be strong. If Obama is at the weak end of the continuum, then George W. Bush's actions in Iraq and Afghanistan represent the opposite—resolute strength and risk-taking. So where do the various 2016 candidates fit on that continuum? That requires a thorough discussion of Obama's foreign policy—and also the policy he inherited.

These are the events that give shape and details to abstract discussions. We could allow ourselves to use vague words like weak and strong about the largest military intervention America has launched since the Vietnam War, but then we'd just blunder forward. So it's in everyone's interest to get specific, especially since we're going to spend so much time together in this presidential campaign.

It's hard to know what Bush believes not just because he doesn't seem to want to talk about Iraq, but when he does, it's confusing.

Knowing what he knows now, would Jeb Bush approve of the Iraq war? This is the question he was asked by Megyn Kelly. He seemed to answer a different one. Bush said, "I would," but then went on to say, "So would Hillary Clinton, by the way."

That's not quite right. Clinton would not. She has said that given what transpired after giving President Bush the power to go to war, she would not give him the authority again to wage it. She's said her vote was wrong. This raises questions about her judgment that she'll have to answer. Jeb Bush's answer suggested that perhaps he heard a different question than the one he was asked. He seemed to think he was asked to answer what he would have done in 2003 before the invasion. (A request for clarification from the campaign on Monday did not bring clarity, which suggests that the former governor will be revising and extending his remarks.)

So which does Bush believe? If there is no distance between Jeb and his brother, then he believes that the decision to invade was "the right decision," given all that has happened. That raises political and policy questions. First, the political one: What are voters going to think about this position given that the war's costs have been so high—nearly 4,500 Americans dead and 32,000 injured—and the promises of the invasion—a cache of weapons of mass destruction and democracy-spreading through the region—did not materialize.

Laura Ingraham, a conservative who is no Jeb Bush fan, found the claim outlandish. "You can't still think that going into Iraq, now, as a sane human being, was the right thing to do," Ingraham said on her radio show in response to Bush's remarks. In a recent piece in National Review, Jim Geraghty asked the question, "Regardless of how you feel about George W. Bush, the pre-war intelligence, Michael Moore and the anti-war left, or the opportunistic flip-floppers like Hillary Clinton and John Kerry, is there anyone who would argue that the price America paid in its battle in Iraq was NOT too high?"

In June of last year, a CBS News/New York Times poll found that only 18 percent of the country thought that the Iraq war was worth the cost. So a candidate who holds that view would seem to have some explaining to do if he is to convince voters that he should be the next commander in chief.

Given what we know now, if Jeb Bush believes that he would not have authorized the war, then he will find himself at odds with members of his brother's administration, such as Dick Cheney and Karl Rove, who say America should be proud of removing Saddam Hussein from power. In other words, that the war was still worth it. If Jeb Bush has a different view, then he'll be asked if the war was a mistake. Bush may want to put it in the category that Hillary Clinton now puts her own war vote: an error made in good faith. Though unlike Clinton, Bush doesn't have to defend whether he did his homework before making that mistake.

But let's leave aside the topography of views. As a policy matter, the Iraq war and a candidate's position on it raises a host of important questions. Bush has said in deflecting questions about Iraq that he doesn't want to relitigate the past. But explaining what we've learned from the past and how we understand it is central to human experience; it's not some gotcha question. Also, as a practical matter, Republicans don't want to treat the past as off limits; doing so would rob them of an iconic example of strength from the past: Ronald Reagan's treatment of the Soviet Union.

Republicans also have an interest in maintaining conversations about U.S. obligations to countries where we have had a hand in blowing things up. That's in part what justifies rigorous questioning of Clinton and the misadventure in Libya that led to the Benghazi attacks. The country is a mess. The former secretary of state should explain why it is and why that outcome wasn't inevitable given U.S. policy.

Candidates collude to avoid the type of hypothetical questions they must rigorously engage once they take office. When they go on foreign trips organized by their campaign staffs, they only learn things that affirm their existing beliefs, which is what happened when Obama, then a senator, went to Iraq in 2008. So there is a conspiracy among all politicians to show us very little about their thinking on foreign affairs. Questions about history are all we have to go on to investigate how a candidate understands the relationship between action and consequence.

The U.S. military has studied the last decade of war and found 11 enduring lessons. What does the Iraq war tell Jeb Bush or any presidential candidate about the limits of U.S. military power, the possibility of nation-building in the Middle East, or our ability to predict outcomes when large-scale operations are launched? What does it teach about the limits of U.S. popular support for a process that certainly will last longer than civilian patience, and what doctrine should emerge from these lessons that guides the United States in the future? The Bush brothers agree that the security vacuum in Iraq after the invasion created the conditions that led to destabilization. How did that happen? Didn't people predict that might happen before the invasion was launched? Why weren't they listened to? Where did the process break down?

It is possible that after doing a careful assessment one could conclude that the United States should never have gone to war in Iraq in 2003 and should not have withdrawn from Iraq in 2011. Arguing that position or any position that seemed the product of hard thinking would inform a lot of voters about a candidate's worldview. Then voters would know what to expect if that candidate ever gave one of those grim addresses from the Oval Office explaining the rationale for the next U.S. military action. If we knew what the men and women seeking the presidency really thought, then there'd be no gotcha questions left to ask.

Chris Christie hits Jeb Bush on Iraq War // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe - May 12, 2015

"I think President (George W.) Bush made the best decision he could at the time, given that his intelligence community was telling him that there was (weapons of mass destruction) and that there were other threats right there in Iraq," he told CNN's Jake Tapper on "The Lead."

"But I don't think you can honestly say that if we knew then that there was no (weapons of mass destruction), that the country should have gone to war," he said.

The comments were a direct response to Bush's support for the Iraq War during a Fox News interview. Though Bush was asked by host Megyn Kelly whether, "knowing what we know now," he would've authorized the war in Iraq, he responded affirmatively to a slightly different scenario.

"I would have (authorized the invasion), and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody. And so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got," Bush said in the interview.

The remarks drew widespread criticism from Bush's left and right flanks, and caused a close ally, GOP strategist Ana Navarro, to backtrack on the comments, saying Bush told her he had "misheard" Kelly's question.

But the comments gave Christie -- who is actively contemplating a presidential bid, and would compete with Bush for establishment Republican support if both run -- an opening to differentiate himself from Bush, and an opportunity for attack.

Christie jabbed at the former Florida governor, who's brother and father have served in the White House, saying that Americans should "avoid ... continuing to go backwards in this country."

"We need a forward-looking foreign policy that talks about how to reassert American authority and influence around the world," he said.

Clinton's "pandering ... disgusts people"

Bush wasn't the only potential opponent that drew fire from Christie in the broad interview with Tapper conducted in New Hampshire, where Christie had delivered an economic speech and was planning a town hall meeting.

In response to a question on his own position on immigration reform, Christie took direct aim at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, accusing her of "pandering" with her recent speech promising to go further than President Barack Obama in giving illegal immigrants legal and citizenship rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The pandering that's going on by Secretary Clinton is really the kind of thing that disgusts people about American politics," he said. "The fact is that, all of a sudden, she's had this epiphany: She wants to go to the left of President Obama. I didn't know there was room to the left of President Obama on an issue like this -- but that's apparently where she's headed."

Christie pointedly didn't answer whether he believes legal status for immigrants creates a second-class citizenship, promising to "give a thoughtful and complete answer on immigration" if he becomes a presidential candidate.

He also issued a veiled jab at Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul for his efforts to rein in government surveillance programs, arguing that a major lesson from the Iraq War was that "there is almost nothing more valuable to a strong national defense than a strong, empowered intelligence community."

"I'm very concerned about those who want to weaken our intelligence community. The President has done it already. And there are those that are running for president now that want to weaken the intelligence community even more," he said.

Can't be responsible for "people who wind up in your employ"

Despite his sharp words for his potential opponents, whether Christie will actually pull the trigger on a run remains an open question -- and political observers have increasingly begun to question his viability in the race. Three of his former associates were hit with criminal charges related to the scandal surrounding lane closures on the George Washington Bridge this month; New Jersey's economy continues to struggle and Christie has stalled in the polls.

Christie sounded unswayed from an expected run during his Tuesday interview with Tapper. He defended his economic record as one of improvement, declaring that in New Jersey he "inherited a wrecked ship and we've now made it seaworthy," and promising to "make it even better than that" by the end of his term.

Christie also insisted that the act of political retribution from his former allies that landed them criminal charges was not evidence of a cultural issue within his administration.

"I think, unfortunately, there are going to be times when people that work for me do things that are completely out of character," he said.

The governor also said he bore no responsibility for the situation, declaring, "You can't be responsible for the bad acts of some people who wind up in your employ."

Republican voters "could change their minds"

And he's continuing his preparations for a potential run, visiting New Hampshire this week to deliver an address on the economy, with another address on national security planned for next week.

Though a recent NBC News/WSJ survey showed 57% of Republican primary voters said they couldn't back Christie -- the highest opposition faced by any potential candidate in the field -- Christie told Tapper on Tuesday that his polling position has no bearing on his decision to run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you determine what your commitment is to your country by what your poll number is on any particular morning, then I'd suggest to you that you have no business running for President of the United States," he said.

That's because, Christie said, that 57% of Republicans "could change their minds."

"The job of campaigns -- if we were to engage in one -- is to change minds. And the job of leaders is not to follow polls, it's to change polls," he said. "If I decide to run for president, I'll run, and my job would be to convince people to vote for me."

Jeb Bush's eloquent defense of Christianity // WaPo // Kathleen Parker – May 12, 2015

It is nearly axiomatic that presidential contests tend to shine a harsh light on conservative Christians — inasmuch as they are viewed as the Republican Party's base and are, therefore, deemed fair game.

Of course, religious folks come in a variety of stripes, checks and polka dots. Many are Democrats. But it is the members of the Christian right — evangelicals and Catholics, especially — who are treated every four years to the sneers of lefties, academics, proud atheists (allow me to quote myself: "There's no dogma like no dogma") and certain but not all media.

Kathleen Parker writes a twice-weekly column on politics and culture. She received the Pulitzer Prize for Commentary In 2010. View Archive

Roger Ailes's Fox News has succeeded in no small part because he doesn't treat Christians as though they're Darwin's missing link.

Fortunately for Western civilization, Christianity has survived worse insults. Lately, conservative Christians in the country that codified freedom of religion have been placed on the defensive. Often viewed as obstructionists to progress, a secular world wonders: What's wrong with those people? Why can't they just get with the program?

Why can't the Little Sisters of the Poor suck it up and sign off on the Affordable Care Act's demand that their insurance policy include contraception funding? Ditto Hobby Lobby, the family-owned craft business that prevailed in its Supreme Court fight to not fund insurance covering contraception that destroys embryos.

Hobby Lobby detractors argued that the company was trying to impose its religious beliefs on others. In fact, the family was resisting the government's insistence that they render those beliefs unto Caesar. (The Supreme Court granted the Little Sisters an injunction pending their appeal in the 10th Circuit that protects them from enforcement.)

These issues, I'll admit, can seem arcane and are tiresome at times. But I'm convinced, as Alan Dershowitz and Ken Starr agreed during a debate last year on these two cases, that the state should always go to extra lengths to protect religious liberty whenever possible.

If only more Democrats and Republicans were as agreeable.

Recent history and more recent comments by the likeliest presidential candidates make it clear, however, that Democrats and Republicans will take very different approaches in future state/religion entanglements.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Hillary Clinton becomes president, she has more or less promised that the state's interests will crush the individual's as necessary to advance women's rights. Giving a fiery speech last month at Tina Brown's "Women in the World Summit," Clinton plainly said: "Deep-seated cultural codes, religious beliefs and structural biases have to be changed" so that women can have unfettered access to "reproductive health care and safe childbirth."

One would like to imagine that Clinton was speaking only about primitive cultures where children are forced into marriage and childbearing, or where genital cutting is common. But we know that she also meant religious conservatives closer to home whose beliefs get in the way. She explicitly criticized Hobby Lobby for not paying for its employees' contraception.

By contrast, Jeb Bush, who will become the GOP nominee if Republicans are smart, assumed a much different tone and direction in his recent commencement address at Liberty University.

"How strange, in our own time, to hear Christianity spoken of as some sort of backward and oppressive force," he said. "It's a depressing fact that when some people think of Christianity and of Judeo-Christian values, they think of something static, narrow and outdated. . . . I cannot think of any more subversive moral idea ever loosed on the world than 'the last shall be first, and the first last.' "

He also spoke of what our world would have been like without the "unalloyed compassion, such genuine love, such thorough altruism," as Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. described Christianity.

It would be defined, Bush said, by "power without restraint, conflict without reconciliation, oppression without deliverance, corruption without reformation, tragedy without renewal."

In a culture more attuned to the grits-'n'-gravy style of a Mike Huckabee, it is rare to hear Christianity discussed in such elevated terms. Indeed, Huckabee can be expected to go after Bush as a blue-blooded elite who can't relate to everyday Americans. Well, yee-haw, one can hardly wait. But I suspect that even conservative Southern Christians, who can absorb more than one-syllable words, might appreciate hearing their beliefs so eloquently described as by Bush.

To be fair, Clinton likely would have reframed her comments — and maybe even her beliefs and accent — had she been speaking to a Christian audience. But her spoken words can't be deleted and her thinking is clear: Religious beliefs have to be changed.

Or else what, pray tell?

Paul opposes granting Obama fast-track trade authority // WMUR // John DiStasso - May 12, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. —Frustrated by being required to find his way to a private "dungeon" to read the Trans Pacific Partnership agreement, Rand Paul said Monday he is a "no vote" on a provision to allow President Obama to complete the deal on a fast track.

It may well be a first in the world of political tracking, the increasingly common practice of shooting and posting video of political opponents, trying to find a gaffe, a point of controversy or just an instant of vulnerability.

The Republican presidential candidate said in an interview in Manchester he will vote against granting Obama trade promotion authority, which limits Congress to only up or down votes on trade deals. A vote on “TPA” is expected as early as Tuesday on the Senate floor.

The Kentucky senator spent part of the day in New Hampshire before heading back to Washington for a late afternoon vote.

He held a town hall at the Londonderry Lions Club, an event that was at least partially overshadowed by a top New Hampshire staffer licking the camera lens of a pro-Democratic video tracker. The video of David Chesley quickly went viral on social media.

Paul told WMUR.com the Trans Pacific Partnership agreement “is being held under lock and key” by the Obama administration “because they’re afraid that if the public knows what we are going to vote on, that somehow that would destroy the republic.”

Members of Congress must go to office of the U.S. Trade Representative to see a copy of the agreement, but are not allowed to take notes, make copies or bring any members of their staffs.

“I’ve told leadership I’m a ‘no’ vote” on trade promotion authority, Paul said. “I’m hesitant to give blanket authority on stuff we haven’t seen. I’m not saying there wouldn’t be a time I could be for it, if I’d seen the trade agreement, and it’s fine,” Paul said.

“I still might vote for the trade agreement, but I hate giving up power. We give up so much power from Congress to the presidency, and with them being so secretive on the treaty, it just concerns me what’s in the treaty,” he said.

"The text of the Trans-Pacific Partnership negotiations has been available for members of Congress to read since 2012 at their request. Earlier this year, the administration took the additional step of placing copies of the text in the Capitol building for members of Congress to review at their convenience.

"Members of Congress can bring staffs and take notes when they review the document. A number of Senators have chosen to read the text. In addition, once the negotiations are complete, the full text of the agreement will be available for the public and members of Congress to review for two months before the president even signs the agreement in the first place and many more months before any vote in Congress is ever taken."

McAlvanah continued, "It is simply untrue that members of Congress must go to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative to see the text. The procedures that are followed regarding TPP are consistent with the procedures of the Senate for handling other classified material.

"Trade Promotion Authority cedes no authority to the president whatsoever. It is a law that provides the adminstration instructions on what to negotiate, imposes requirements on the administration for congressional consultation, and reiterates that Congress must approve any agreement before it can enter into force.")

Paul supports court ruling on NSA

Paul has been a leader in the Senate to do away with the NSA’s power to engage in mass collection of phone data. Last week, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals ruled the program “exceeded the scope of what Congress has authorized” in the Patriot Act.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul said he hopes the case eventually goes to the U.S. Supreme Court, although that is not certain based on the status of the case. He said it is significant that the appeals court did not rule on the constitutionality of the NSA collection program.

"They ruled it illegal, and that may be lost on people but it's a big difference," Paul said. "However, it's a pretty important ruling to be illegal. The court said the Patriot Act does not authorize this. But I also think the Constitution doesn't authorize this."

He said the Fourth Amendment requires specific names to be on warrants, "and you have to have probable cause and a judge has to sign it. So there are a lot of reasons to say this is an overstep by the government.

"But I would end it all," he said. "On day one if elected president, I would stop the bulk collection. And when people say, 'How would you stop terrorism?' I would say, 'The old-fashioned way. We'd use the Constitution.'"

The ability to "look into everyone's house and into everyone's records is antithetical to what our founders wanted," Paul said.

At the town hall, Paul said Republicans have been equally responsible as Democrats in increasing the national debt.

"We borrow $1 million a minute, and it's not pretty," he said. "It's going to end in calamity if we're not careful.

Paul also talked about his goal of broadening the GOP.

"You're going to have other Republicans who are conservative," he said. "But New Hampshire is a purple state now. Republicans don't always win. We need somebody who is going to bring new people into the party.

"People who are not just business owners, but the people who work for them,' he said. "People who are not just part of America's rich, but people who are poor or black or brown."

Paul said the United Nations "should not have any power or authority over anything that happens inside the United States.

"I'm not against having some type of international forum where we try to work things out rather than have war," said Paul. "I'm not against dialogue. I'm just against paying for people to come and attack America and tell us what a terrible country America is."

On immigration, Paul said, "Let's figure out a lawful way to do it. Let's figure out how many immigrants we can absorb each year and let's do it in as lawful manner. When you get past the politics of it, the only thing that will get us started in doing something about it is we have to have a will in the leader of the country, and we also have to have the laws to enforce the border and have border security."

Rand Paul tweets fake Hillary Clinton to-do list // POLITICO // Adam B. Lerner - May 12, 2015

on Hillary Clinton.

After the Clinton campaign tweeted an image of a “to do” list for campaign manager Robby Mook with a list of items for the next two months of the campaign, Paul tweeted his own fake “to do” list for Team Clinton.

The Clinton campaigns list included six relatively banal campaign functions like “Sign off on office contracts” and “Set staffing plans June-Dec.”

Paul’s note had four items: “Sign off on new private server location”; “Hire next stage of reporters to avoid real questions”; “Finalize plan to evade Benghazi testimony”; and “Final update of foreign ‘contributions’ list.”

The Kentucky Republican has played the role of Twitter troll on other occasions. He has directed jabs at Marco Rubio for wanting to “build a moat” around Cuba and at Jeb Bush and Mitt Romney who he joked have exchanged friendship bracelets.

He has also targeted Hillary Clinton before, once posting a fake recorded conversation between her and Jeb Bush in which the two discuss their families’ ambition to take turns occupying the White House.

Paul says he can run for White House and do day job, questions whether rivals can multi-task // NH1 // Paul Steinhauser - May 11, 2015

LONDONDERRY – Rand Paul says he can run for the White House and still do his day job in the U.S. Senate.

“I get paid by the taxpayer and I figure I need to vote, so I’m working very hard to do this and also vote at the same time,” the Republican from Kentucky and presidential candidate told NH1 News Monday in Londonderry, after wrapping up a town hall event.

Moments after speaking one-on-one with NH1 News, Paul jumped into a waiting vehicle, to rush to the airport for a flight back to the nation’s capital, and his job as senator.

“I think the job’s a pretty important job and taxpayers are paying me so I take it very seriously. I’ll not only be back there for voting this afternoon, I’ll be leading the vote and the effort against the Patriot Act, handling the vote to try and end bulk collection of your phone records,” Paul said.

Paul’s missed a lower percentage of votes than two other GOP senators also running for the White House, Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida, according to data compiled by GovTrack.US. Asked about his rivals voting track record, Paul appeared to question whether they could multi-task as well, saying “I think the people will have to judge that.”

Paul’s latest visit to New Hampshire came just a few days after a federal appeals court ruled that the National Security Agency’s collection of Americans’ phone records was illegal under the Patriot Act. Paul was happy to talk about Thursday’s ruling, saying “I sued the NSA about a year ago, and the President, because I think it’s illegal and unconstitutional. The fourth amendment says your name has to be on the warrant and you can’t put something like Mr. Verizon on a warrant and get all of the customers for millions of millions of phone records. I think that goes against the spirit and the letter of the fourth amendment.”

Asked if the ruling justified Paul’s actions, the senator said “the ruling justifies what I’ve said all along. It’s a message to the President. The President, if he’s serious, the court has now said it’s illegal. He should stop it. He started it by executive order. He can stop it tomorrow.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During the town hall, Paul took a shot at another rival, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. Discussing the federal appeals court ruling on the NSA, Paul said "we have one candidate, I won't mention any names but he's a former governor of Florida, who says that the best thing the president is doing is collecting all of your phone records without a warrant. I say your phone records are yours. They're none of the government's business."

Last month, in a radio appearance on the Michael Medved Show, Bush said that "there has been a continuation of a very important service, which is the first obligation of our national government, which is to keep us safe. And the technology that now can be applied to make that so, while protecting civil liberties, are there and he's (President Barack Obama) not abandoned them even though there was some indication that he might."

The Paul campaign used the Londonderry town hall to announced the endorsement of 20 state representatives, with eight of those state lawmakers at the town hall. The event was the last of three stops on Monday for Paul in the first-in-the-nation primary state. He headlined a business roundtable at Aspen Insurance in Manchester and met separately behind closed doors with business leaders, state lawmakers and GOP activists.

A new poll released Sunday indicated Paul tied with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at the top of a crowed pack of candidates and potential GOP contenders. According to a Bloomberg Politics/St. Anselm College survey, Paul and Walker were at 12% support among likely GOP primary voters in New Hampshire, with Bush and Rubio at 11% and Donald Trump at 8%, New Jersey Gov. Christie at 7% and Cruz at 6%. Everyone else tested in the survey stood at 5% or lower.

Rand Paul Promises To Fight On Against Patriot Act // NHPR // Josh Rogers - May 11, 2015

Campaigning in Londonderry, GOP presidential candidate Rand Paul went after fellow republican Jeb Bush on privacy issues, and said he will lead the filibuster effort against any extension of the Patriot Act.

The Kentucky Senator Paul ask voters to be wary of would-be presidents who, as he put it, don't support 'the entire bill of rights.'

"We have one candidate — we won't mention any names, but he was a former governor of Florida — who says the best thing the president is doing is collecting all of your phone records without a warrant, "I say your phone records are yours, they're none of the government's business."

Last week a federal appeals court ruled that the National Security Agency's bulk collection of phone records is illegal.

Paul told reporters he's the only candidate, Democrat or republican who said he'd end the program on day one. He also says he'll fight its reauthorization.

"I'll be leading the vote and the effort against the Patriot Act and also leading the vote to try to end bulk collection of your phone records."

Senate's majority leader, Mitch McConnell hopes to extend of the Patriot Act and is expected to put a bill before the senate to reauthorize bulk collection of phone records by month's end.

Paul calls for limited government in Londonderry visit // Eagle Tribune // Doug Ireland - May 12, 2015

LONDONDERRY — Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul is known for his outspoken support for a limited federal government.

He stopped off at the Londonderry Lions Hall on Monday afternoon to voice his opposition to the USA Patriot Act and the need to preserve Americans' constitutional rights.

But the Republican presidential candidate's visit was overshadowed by what quickly became known as "LickGate." It occurred just as Paul began to address the crowd of more than 100 people.

David Chesley, the New Hampshire political director for Paul's campaign, apparently licked the video camera lens of a tracker from the group American Bridge 21st Century. The video was widely circulated in the media and on social media.

Paul's stop in Londonderry came as his campaign announced that 20 Republican state representatives in New Hampshire, or 8 percent of the GOP caucus, are endorsing the senator for president.

Some of those supporters came to back Paul at the Lions Hall, including state Sens. Andy Sanborn of Bedford and Kevin Avard of Nashua.

On a wall in the background were signs that said "Unleash the American Dream" and "Defeat the Washington Machine."

Paul, 52, began by telling the crowd that Americans are asked to pay too much to the federal government in taxes.

"If I'm elected, I will let you keep your money in New Hampshire," he said. "We will send a lot less to Washington."

Rand Paul: Advocates for the Disabled Should Help Brainstorm Ways to Cut Social Security Spending // Bloomberg // David Weigel – May 12, 2015

Every election cycle, candidates who want to burnish their fiscal hawk credentials warn that entitlements are going to run out of money. This election cycle is different: The Social Security disability trust fund really is in danger of running low before it's over. According to Social Security's actuary, if nothing is done by late 2016, the fund that paid $141 billion to disability beneficiaries will be able to meet just 81 percent of its obligations.

Most Republicans want to use this crisis to reform Social Security, arguing that a disability system that's seen enrollment nearly treble over 30 years is simply unsustainable. Some have talked about this more elegantly than others. In a January visit to New Hampshire, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul half-joked that "over half the people on disability are anxious or their back hurts."

Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, who is running a populist, pro-entitlement campaign– far out of step with most Republicans–said last week that the disability program needed to be treated sensitively. "We should approach it that people are innocent until proven guilty, not the other way around," he told Bloomberg. "You should make the government prove that a person isn't in need, rather than the person having to absolutely prove that they are."

"There are people who are truly disabled, so the program should first of all prioritize those who are truly disabled."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul

On Monday, after another event in New Hampshire, Paul expanded on his disability position by arguing that advocates for the disabled needed to collaborate on cost-cutting ideas.

"I think the first thing to acknowledge is that there's not money for all of these Social Security disability programs," Paul told Bloomberg in an interview. "It runs out of money this year. [The program does not hit a shortfall until late 2016, according to the actuary.]

"The overall Social Security system pays out more than it takes in. So I think it's really without question that all of these programs need to be reviewed to make them financially sound. There are people who are truly disabled, so the program should first of all prioritize those who are truly disabled."

Paul's solution: Persuade advocates to stop just clamoring for more funding and start thinking about efficiency. "I think it's important that all the advocates for disability realize that it's in their best interest to make sure that people who are disabled are receiving money," he said. "So, there's a lot of reforms that we've talked about–having more certainty in annual exams, having the exams done by doctors who have not seen the patient and can be objective in confirming the disability. There's a lot of reform we can do, and the key is getting the advocates involved."

Rand Paul tries to get younger voters in Granite State // Boston Herald // Chris Cassidy - May 12, 2015

LONDONDERRY, N.H. — GOP presidential contender Sen. Rand Paul is leaving nothing to chance in New Hampshire, a top campaign staffer told the Herald yesterday — lining up 20 state rep endorsements, with plans to open a Manchester campaign office in a few weeks and visit Granite State universities in the months ahead to mobilize college students.

“In any of the races I've worked on, people go, ‘Young people don't vote.' I go, ‘Oh no, they vote — they just don't vote for us.' Let's not mince words,” said Tammy Simmons, Paul's New Hampshire operations director, referring to the GOP's troubles attracting young voters. “We have to make sure they're voting for us this time.”

The campaign is seeing signs of support at liberal Dartmouth College, and also picking up Granite State backers of former Sen. Rick Santorum's 2012 campaign and are counting on those who backed his father, Ron Paul, previously, Simmons said.

In a “Live Free or Die” state stop yesterday, Paul took a shot at former Gov. Jeb Bush on civil liberties and vowed to fight a controversial extension to the Patriot Act.

“We have one candidate — we won't mention any names, but he was a former governor of Florida — who says the best thing the president is doing is collecting all of your phone records without a warrant,” the Kentucky senator told the crowd, which booed Bush. “I say your phone records are yours, they're none of the government's business.”

New Hampshire state Rep. Jim McConnell, who has endorsed Paul, said his candidacy has some GOPers on edge.

“There are at least a couple of Republicans in this race who are here because they can't stand him,” said McConnell, naming South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, New York Rep. Peter King and “probably” former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton. “If Lindsey Graham can't stand him, that's got to say a lot for him.”

Both Santorum and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie are in New Hampshire today, and Donald Trump — who finished just 4 points off the lead in a poll released yesterday — will visit here Thursday.

The poll shows a razor-thin GOP race in New Hampshire with as many as six candidates within 5 points of the lead. Paul and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker both sit at the top, but barely, with 12 points. Right behind them are Bush and Florida Sen. Marco Rubio with 11 points. Trump finished with 8 points, and Christie came in with 7 points.

Christie defends use of $85,000 in public funds to entertain guests at sporting events // Boston Globe // May 12, 2015

AMHERST, N.H. (AP) — New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie says he made the decision to stop billing taxpayers for the cost of entertaining guests in luxury boxes at three New Jersey sports venues in part because he was worried about the appearance of impropriety.

Records show that Christie spent $85,000 in public money to entertain in the boxes between 2010 and early 2012, when the state Republican party took over those expenses and reimbursed the state for those already incurred.

Speaking to reporters after greeting breakfast diners Friday in Amherst, New Hampshire, Christie said he thought it was "completely justifiable" to use a discretionary fund for the entertaining, but decided to end the practice so that nobody could accuse him of spending taxpayer dollars on politics.

"Quite frankly, in today's world where everything is kind of twisted and turned to look like it's something wrong when it isn't, I just said in 2012 to my folks, 'Listen, let's just have the state party pay for this, so to the extent there's anybody there who's political, people can't make the argument that we're using taxpayer money for anything that even looks like politics,'" he said.

The change was made less than a year after Christie came under fire for using a state helicopter to attend one of his son's baseball games and the year before he ran for re-election.

Christie, who is in the early-voting state as he prepares for a likely presidential campaign, said that most of his sports box entertaining is done at football games, and that he invites people from both parties and different interest groups to spend time speaking with him privately.

He said that since 2012, the state party has been paying for all entertaining done in the box — even it's not political.

"I just think it was just the right thing to do and that's why we decided to do it," he said.

The state money in question comes from an account, worth $95,000 a year, allocated to New Jersey governors to pay for official entertainment or other expenses associated with their job. Much of Christie's spending from the account is used to pay for entertaining at the governor's mansion.

Two Democratic lawmakers introduced a bill Thursday that would require the governor to file a written report with the State Ethics Commission about use of the funds each year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The spending details were obtained by The Associated Press via the state's open records law. The documents obtained by the AP cover expenses like food and drinks, but do not list at which events, including those at the sports venues, the governor was entertaining and who was present.

The expenses, which are allowed by state law, also do not include the cost of using the luxury boxes at MetLife Stadium, Prudential Arena and the Izod Center, which are provided to the state for use by the governor.

Christie, who says he'll make a decision about his 2016 plans by the end of June, has come under scrutiny in the past for not reimbursing the state for his security costs when he's traveling for political purposes and for accepting expensive gifts such as Dallas Cowboys tickets.

Rare NH visit for Rick Santorum // NH1 // Paul Steinhauser - May 12, 2015

CONCORD – The numbers tell the story.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania's made 13 trips to Iowa since the 2012 election.

Santorum, who fought eventual GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney deep into the 2012 primary and caucus calendar and who's all but certain to run again in 2016, has made one trip to the Granite State during the same time period.

That's the least visits to the first-in-the-nation primary state of any of the approximately 20 GOP presidential candidates and likely contenders. Last month, Santorum and famed neurosurgeon Ben Carson were the only two Republican White House hopefuls to not attend a major NHGOP summit that was held in Nashua.

Tuesday evening Santorum briefly returns to the Granite State, to keynote a major fundraising dinner for Cornerstone Action, a Granite State focused conservative group, which is celebrating it's 15th anniversary.

"He has one of the best family values focused messages being shared today," said Cornerstone director Bryan McCormack, in announcing that Santorum would headline their event.

The Santorum campaign spent a lot of time and money on his efforts in the NH primary four years ago. After narrowly edging out Romney in the Iowa caucuses, Santorum finished a disappointing fourth in the New Hampshire primary.

This time around it appears that Santorum, who's expected to announce his candidacy for president later this month, is devoting much more of his time and resources to Iowa, which kicks off the primary and caucus calendar, and South Carolina, which holds the first southern contest in the race for the White House.

But a source close to the Santorum campaign tells NH1 News that they are in the process of putting together a small campaign team in the Granite State. The hope, it seems, is to build on any momentum gained out of Iowa.

Fiorina Grabs Attention In Iowa // Oskaloosa News // May 12, 2015

Waukee, Iowa- Hundreds of GOP activists recently descended on Waukee for the Iowa Faith and Freedom Coalition Freedom Summit. On hand that evening were a total of nine declared and possible presidential candidates. Of all the candidates who spoke, one in particular appeared to steal the show: former Hewlitt Packard executive Carly Fiorina.

Fiorina is no stranger to politics. She served as an advisor to 2008 GOP Nominee John McCain during his campaign for the White House, and in 2010 made her first bid for elected office when she challenged California Democrat Barbara Boxer for the US Senate. Despite a large democratic advantage in the state, Fiorina led in some polls but ultimately lost by 10 points on election day. Fiorina now is making her debut as a national candidate.

At the Freedom Summit, Fiorina started off by comparing herself to likely democrat nominee Hillary Rodham Clinton. “I too have traveled 1200 miles, but unlike Mrs. Clinton, I know mileage is not the same as going the distance,” Fiorina quipped.

Fiorina mentioned her improbable rise from secretary to CEO of one of the largest technology companies in the world. “Only in the United States of America is it possible for a young woman to start as a secretary and become CEO and maybe just maybe run for president,” Fiorina said.

Talking about faith, Fiornia told personal stories of her battle with cancer as well as her daughter’s battle with addiction. Fiorina said it was her faith in God that got her and her husband through that time. “It was my husband Frank’s and my personal relationship with Jesus Christ that saved us from a desperate sadness,” Fiorina said.

Talking about her convictions, Fiorina told a story of how she refused to back down from her pro-life stance as well as other conservative stances and not turn “towards the middle” after winning a tough GOP primary. Fiorina noted that she went on to win more democrat and independent votes than any other candidate in the nation, largely because of the size of California. “That race taught me something: only a conservative can unify this party and we do not have to change our beliefs and our convictions to reach independents and democrats either,” Fiorina said bring the crowd to their feet.

Fiorina said during her recent trip through Iowa she could “sense a deep disquiet.” Fiorina elaborated. “It’s not political and it is not partisan, but I think people are disquieted because they fear we are losing something. And I think they believe we are missing something.” Fiorina said that something is the limitless possibilities that have defined America. “We always knew that if something was worth doing, especially if it was hard to do, that we as Americans, we would do it,” she said. Fiorina said she had seen disquiet in business owners, saying the country is now for the first time ever destroying more businesses than it is creating. Fiorina cited taxes and other red tape as reasons why this was happening. “We are crushing the potential of this nation,” she said.

Talking about foreign policy, Fiorina said she had met more world leaders than any other candidate or possible candidate for President this cycle, with the exception of Democrat Hillary Clinton. “Unlike Hillary Clinton, I did not do photo ops,” Fiorina said. In regards to Israel relations, Fiorina said the United States should stop talking with Iran. “We should immediately impose as punishing a set of sanctions as we can and we should not talk again until they submit to full and unfettered inspections,” she said to a roar of approval from the crowd. “The world is a dangerous place when the world does not stand with our allies and does not stand strong against our adversaries,” she also said.

Fiorina announced her candidacy for the Presidency on May 4th.

Rick Santorum: Odd man out? // POLITICO // James Hohmann - May 12, 2015

INDIANOLA, Iowa — In 2012, Rick Santorum came out of nowhere to win the Iowa caucuses.

In 2015, he’s back in nowhere again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Story Continued Below

As he prepares to announce his second run for president at the end of the month, he is staring up at many rivals for his base of religious conservatives, while many of his former senior staffers and high-profile supporters are working for rival campaigns.

A Quinnipiac poll of likely GOP Caucus goers last week showed him tied for 10th place, garnering just 2 percent, with social conservatives moving on to fresh faces like Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and former neurosurgeon Ben Carson or coming home to Mike Huckabee, who won the 2008 Iowa caucuses.

“It’s going to be extremely difficult for Rick,” said Iowa activist Sam Clovis, who backed Santorum’s 2012 bid and for whose own U.S. Senate campaign Santorum cut a commercial last year. “He’s been out here quite a bit, but I’m not sure that he has retained a lot of the infrastructure he built in ’12 … and this is a much stronger field.”

Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky. is questioned after a town hall meeting at the Loins Club hall with area residents, Monday, May 11, 2015, in Londonderry,

Clovis, who said he considers Santorum “a good friend,” nonetheless believes he has a steeper hill to climb than any other candidate. “It’s literally like starting over,” said Clovis. “It will be very difficult for him to make up ground here.”

Mike Biundo, his 2012 campaign manager, now works for Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul. So does John Yob, his national delegate director.

Jill Latham Ryan, his deputy campaign manager, and her husband, Nick Ryan, who ran the pro-Santorum super PAC, are now running the pro-Huckabee super PAC. Ryan said he decided to help Huckabee because, “He’s the best communicator in the Republican Party, and that’s what we need.”

Hogan Gidley and Alice Stewart helmed Santorum’s communications operation last time; this time, they have those roles on the Huckabee campaign.

When Santorum’s special needs daughter, Bella, was sick during the 2012 primaries, the Duggar family filled in for him at several events. The stars of the TLC reality show “19 Kids and Counting” were constantly at his side or caravaning in their RV as his surrogates. This time, they’re all in for Huckabee.

Nineteen members of the Duggar clan were in the audience at the former governor’s announcement in Hope, Arkansas, last week. “He has the communication skills of Ronald Reagan … and being a governor is like being a president of a state,” Jim Bob Duggar, who served in the state Legislature back then, said in an interview at the event. “You’ll probably see us helping out quite a bit.”

It’s a dreary picture that would prompt many politicians to take a pass, but Santorum — who turned 57 on Sunday — relishes the role of underdog. He likes to point out that he’s been written off repeatedly throughout this political career, only to resurrect himself.

“I certainly didn’t expect everybody who was with me last time to uniformly stay with me, because as you know, we had a lot of people who came in at the last minute,” Santorum said in a brief interview after an event at an ice cream parlor here recently.

He believes he has a reservoir of grass-roots support that doesn’t show up in polls, and by again outworking everyone else in the field, he will surge late, just like last time. “You don’t get committed volunteers by running TV ads or appearing on Fox News,” he said.

Still, there are constant reminders that 2016 will be much more difficult for Santorum than 2012 — despite all the exposure he gained last time around.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a cattle call in a Waukee church two weekends ago, the emcee recalled how Santorum became famous by traversing the state in “the Chuck Truck,” while other candidates flew private jets, in 2011. Chuck Laudner, who owns the now legendary pickup and who drove Santorum around, now works for Donald Trump’s presidential exploratory committee.

When Ted Cruz rolled out his Iowa Leadership Team last week, he announced Matt Schultz as chairman. The former Iowa secretary of state was the only statewide official who backed Santorum last time.

Santorum campaigned for Schultz during an unsuccessful bid for House last year.

Bob Vander Plaats, the evangelical leader who threw critical support behind Santorum in 2012 and Huckabee in 2008, said he’s told both men that “2016 is not 2008, and it’s not 2012.” His group, The Family Leader, has already hosted several events for other candidates. He expects to endorse someone around Thanksgiving and says the group might too; he worries that social conservatives will splinter among several candidates, empowering someone like Jeb Bush.

“Sen. Santorum has had a history of defying the odds, so maybe he’ll defy the odds again,” Vander Plaats said Friday, “but for Santorum and Huckabee, and maybe to a degree Gov. [Rick] Perry, they need to persevere during the early phase of the campaign when everyone’s attracted to the new car smell — and then, hopefully they’re willing to come back.”

After losing in 2008, Mitt Romney retained some of the key people he wanted to have back in senior roles for his 2012 bid, such as campaign manager Matt Rhoades. Partly because Santorum needed to make money, he didn’t use the past three years to build the same kind of campaign-in-waiting that Romney did.

Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky. is questioned after a town hall meeting at the Loins Club hall with area residents, Monday, May 11, 2015, in Londonderry,

To be sure, there are holdovers. John Brabender, Santorum’s highly respected chief strategist, has been with him since his first House bid in 1990 and will continue to play a top role in 2016. Rob Bickhart, who went to Penn State with Santorum, was finance director for his U.S. Senate campaign committee and PAC. Also on the senior staff will be Terry Allen, who has experience working for Oklahoma Republicans and advised Santorum during his 2012 victory in the state; Jessica Colon, a member of the national finance team last time, is now political director for Patriot Voices PAC; and Matt Beynon, deputy communications director in 2012 is now leading communications.

Brabender said in an interview that some of the people who are working for rival campaigns in 2016 were not invited back to join the Santorum team. Santorum’s PAC has about two dozen staff, and there will be some 30 employees or consultants signed on to the campaign, assuming he goes forward.

“One of the fortunate things about the campaign this time is that we have much greater demand and interest in working for our campaign at this stage,” Brabender said Monday. “There are a number of people who were with us last time who were invited back and accepted. … There are others we would like to have had but because of demand and, frankly, the pay scale, chose to go elsewhere. And then there are people who were with us last time who got replaced this time by people who are better at those jobs. So it’s a mixture.”

Santorum also retains the support of billionaire Foster Friess, the biggest donor to his 2012 super PAC, along with some of his most loyal grass-roots supporters. Kim Lehman, a former Republican National committeewoman, said she will stick with him because he’s proven.

“Sometimes people want to try out the new guy because they don’t see his weaknesses yet,” she said. “I’m going to stay by him because he’s been tried, he’s been tested and he’s true. He’s got that compass. As much as he would like to win, he doesn’t change his positions to win."

Santorum himself has put in as much time as anyone else in the Hawkeye State. Since the start of this year, he's been to at least 16 of the state's 99 counties — including here in Warren County, a half hour outside Des Moines.

On a recent Saturday morning, Santorum sipped a chocolate shake from a Styrofoam cup as eight people gathered around a table in a corner sundry store. He spoke and took questions for more than an hour.

The county GOP chairman, Rick Halvorsen, introduced him by recalling how he emerged as the social conservative favorite in 2012. "It's a crowded field this time," he told the small group. "I hope Sen. Santorum can gain some traction."

Santorum, who has some gray hairs he did not have four years ago, gulped when he said this. He's still angry that the state GOP declared Mitt Romney the winner on caucus night in 2012, only to say nearly two weeks later that he actually had won.

The senator has convinced himself that if he had been declared the winner on caucus night, he would have gotten enough momentum to win the nomination and the White House. He told the group that his message would have resonated with blue-collar voters in states like Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Wisconsin, all of which were won by Obama in his race against Romney.

"They didn't want to run against me," Santorum said of Obama's reelection campaign.

Because there are so many socially conservative candidates this time, Santorum — a Catholic — is trying to broaden his appeal with greater emphasis on economic populism and foreign policy. He brags about appearing in an online magazine that ISIL publishes.

About 20 minutes after Santorum started into his spiel, two women excused themselves so that they could drive to Urbandale to check out Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's appearance at the Machine Shed restaurant.

Will Scott Walker's budget troubles hurt his potential 2016 bid? // WaPo // Jenna Johnson -May 12, 2015

As Gov. Scott Walker travels the country ahead of a likely presidential campaign, he boasts about how quickly he transformed this state's finances — weakening unions, eliminating a shortfall and pushing through $2 billion in tax cuts.

But back home in the State Capitol, a new round of partisan fighting has erupted over the lingering impacts of Walker's policies and the amount of time he is spending away from Wisconsin in preparation for his expected White House bid. The standoff could have repercussions in 2016 as Walker's fiscal record comes under scrutiny.

The promised revenues from Walker's previous budget moves have not fully materialized, leading Walker and GOP lawmakers to propose another round of reductions — including cuts in funding for public schools, the university system, health-care programs and a slew of other programs. The Republican-controlled legislature says it won't be raising taxes no matter what, though it might increase fees for registering a car or visiting a state park.

"We're all are going to have to scratch and claw and figure out how to get through this budget," said Wisconsin Senate President Mary Lazich, a Republican from the Milwaukee suburbs who once car-pooled with Walker. "When I listen to my constituency that elects me and puts me here, they see government as having plenty of money."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats are attempting to derail many of the cuts, and they accuse Walker of using the state's budget to advance his own political interests as a likely presidential candidate. They note that Walker wants to retain a tax break on manufacturers and farms and to issue $220 million in bonds for a Milwaukee Bucks basketball arena, even as he's pushing for cuts in education and health care.

They also complain that Walker — currently on a tour of Israel sponsored by political allies — spends too much of his time traveling in anticipation of a 2016 bid.

"He's running for president, and he has checked out of here and has used people here in this state to further his political ambition," said state Sen. Jon Erpenbach, a Democrat from Middleton. "He lands in Wisconsin, does his laundry, gets back on the plane and leaves."

Laurel Patrick, a spokeswoman for Walker, said the governor has continued to meet each week with legislative leaders and is in regular contact with lawmakers, his staff and others, regardless of his location.

"The bottom line is Governor Walker's focus is on making sure Wisconsin is a great place to live, work, and raise a family," Patrick said in a statement.

In the four years Walker has been governor, Wisconsin has become a petri dish for fiscally conservative policies. Walker campaigned using his daily brown-bag lunch as a symbol of how he and his family live within their means and that the state should do the same.

But during hours of budget-related hearings last week, Wisconsin Democrats argued that Walker's tax cuts for the wealthy, corporations and property owners have yet to help many middle- and working-class families or jump-start the state's stagnant economy.

Although Wisconsin's unemployment rate is well below the national average, its rate of private-sector job growth is one of the worst in the nation, and wages have remained stagnant while other states see substantial gains. A recent study by the Pew Charitable Trusts found that Wisconsin's middle class — those earning between about $34,500 and $103,000 — has shrunk at a faster rate than any other state in the country.

"When does this trickle-down economics kick in?" asked state Sen. Robert W. Wirch, a Democrat from southeast Wisconsin, during a hearing on repealing a law that helps set a minimum wage for state construction jobs. "Maybe it's time we try something else . . . . Your philosophy, with all due respect, is not working."

Republicans argue that the state's economy is doing much better than Democrats say it is and that Wisconsin's problems mirror a slow national recovery.

"When the economy does pick up across the country, I think we will really be able to kick it into gear and probably outpace a number of other states," said Sen. Stephen L. Nass, a Republican from southern Wisconsin.

Wisconsin sets its budget every two years, and Walker has said he will not make any announcement about running for president until after the task is done, likely in June. But his expected run has loomed large over the budget process — and several of Walker's initiatives are the type that could play well in early primary states.

Walker has proposed cutting $300 million over two years from the public university system, which some Republicans describe as too flush with cash and bloated with bureaucracy. He also calls for cuts to elderly prescription assistance, rural health centers, transportation projects and public schools — although lawmakers are hopeful they will find cash for the latter.

Meanwhile, Walker wants to allow an unlimited number of children to take their share of public school funding to a private school, an idea that lawmakers from both parties have been slow to embrace. Walker has called for major reforms to welfare programs, including mandating drug-testing for those who receive benefits, and says his primary goal is to continue to lower property taxes.

“Now, I get a kick out of this: In my state, I’m proud to say we’ve cut the tax burden on the hardworking people of our state by some $2 billion over the past couple years,” Walker said in a speech Saturday in South Carolina. “In fact, property taxes today in my state are lower today than they were four years ago. What governor can say that? ”

GOP lawmakers have reversed many of Walker’s cuts, ranging from funding for the removal of roadkill from the side of highways to money for groups that interview children who have been sexually abused.

Republicans had been holding out hope that tax revenue estimates were too conservative and that the state might collect more money than expected in coming years. But the state’s top budget analyst formally announced last week that more revenue is unlikely, prompting Republicans to scramble for a Plan B.

Walker took a break from tweeting about Hillary Rodham Clinton’s immigration policy and President Obama’s spending habits to write on Twitter: “In Wisconsin, we’ve lowered taxes by $2 billion for individuals, employers, and on property. #WIForward.”

The partisan acrimony was clear at one point last week when lawmakers on a newly formed welfare reform committee fought over Walker’s proposal to require recipients of state assistance to undergo drug testing. Democrats responded by introducing amendments to require the governor, legislators and chief executives whose companies receive tax breaks to undergo similar testing.

“If we want the people of Wisconsin to pee in a cup . . . we should pee first,” said Rep. Andy Jorgensen, a Democrat from southern Wisconsin.

Republicans quashed the effort by refusing to discuss the amendments, prompting Jorgensen to angrily accuse them of pursuing a “right-wing agenda.”

Rep. Mark Born (R), the committee chairman, said that Republicans are reforming the social welfare system because it’s a top priority for their constituents — not because it bolsters the governor’s résumé.

“What the governor is doing in the state or anywhere else, I don’t think that impacts what we’re doing here,” Born said. “There are some things where the governor is talking about them and that’s great, because we are working together on this stuff, but I don’t really view any of his other activities as impacting this.”

This Is Where Liberals Have Gotten Us // Medium // Marco Rubio - May 12, 2015

For conservatives especially, we are facing a defining moment. The failure of government-centered, command-and-control liberalism to lift the poor and sustain the middle class is apparent as never before. Whether we are able to step forward with our own solutions — and not simply rail against the expansion of the state — will determine our future as a movement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our recent history in this regard is not encouraging. President Barack Obama was elected on a promise to fight for poor and middle-class Americas. During his campaigns for president, he talked directly to the American people about the girl who's worried she can't go to college because she can't afford it, about the dad who doesn't know if his wages will cover the winter heating bill, about the single mom who's stressed about what her children are doing after school while she's at work. Meanwhile, my party talked about tax cuts and waited for the American people to punish the president for the economy. They didn't. He won. We lost.

And yet seven years into his presidency, struggling Americans are — by every measure — worse off today than they were before he took office. Why has a president elected as a champion of the disadvantaged failed so miserably at helping them? Because, like most liberals, he doesn't understand the real causes of the erosion of equal opportunity we are experiencing today. He has raised taxes, increased regulations and taken over health care — all according to the outdated liberal theory that Americans struggle when government doesn't tax the rich enough and spend on the poor enough. But the results, such as they are, speak for themselves. After seven years of old-school liberalism, fewer Americans are working than at any time since the Great Recession in the first quarter of 2014.

It's getting harder for millions of Americans to get ahead, not because our taxes are too low or our government is too stingy. The poor and the middle class are struggling because while our economy is undergoing a dramatic and disruptive transformation, our policies have not changed with it. Our economy is no longer producing well-paying jobs, not enough people have the skills they need for better-paying jobs and the values needed for success are eroding at an alarming rate.

It's time for A New American Century. Join our fight and help lead American in a new direction.

Marco Rubio Shifts Rightward on Foreign Policy // TIME // Philip Elliott - May 12, 2015

Moderate-sounding views go by the wayside as Rubio shifts rightward to curry favor with GOP base

When Sen. Marco Rubio sat down for a Q&A session at a Council on Foreign Relations event, one participant noted that his differences on foreign policy with President Obama were "very modest" and asked where he disagreed. The Florida Republican chuckled in response.

On Wednesday, when Rubio returns to the Council on Foreign Relations three years later, that question won't be asked again.

Now a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, Rubio has traded in a moderate pitch on international affairs for an aggressive, hawkish approach. In his first policy speech as a declared White House hopeful, he will be pushing a muscular stance for the United States and trying to calm the worries of those who think he is too squeamish to use America's might.

For Rubio, its both a natural evolution on his thinking in an era of Islamic State fighters and new threats from Russia, as well as a shift rightward to match his party's demands of its next presidential nominee. Republican voters and caucus participants in early nominating states demand an orthodoxy from their presidential candidates, and Rubio's earlier flirtation with moderation—even if not entirely moderate—would prove disqualifying inside the party.

For instance, the now hawkish Rubio previously backed negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program in 2012. Now, as an increasingly vocal member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he unsuccessfully sought to derail Obama's still-gelling agreement with Tehran over its nukes. He unsuccessfully tried to attach one amendment that would have made it impossible for the United States to reach a final agreement with Iran; leaders in his own party kept the measure far away from the final bill that gives Congress oversight of any deal.

And in 2012, Rubio intimated that the United States has limited capacity to guide the world. “Let’s stop and remember that the world America made is better, but it is not perfect,” Rubio said. “But it is vastly more peaceful and prosperous than any other age in recorded history.”

Rubio’s rivals are hoping the charismatic, 43-year-old son of Cuban immigrants has already sullied his conservative credentials with such statements, along with acknowledging a role for the United Nations in foreign policy. As the crowded field of White House hopefuls lurch rightward over each other, Rubio’s earlier, moderate-sounding views are unlikely to win him many friends.

“Until recently, the general perception was that American conservatism believed in robust and muscular foreign policy,” Rubio said during a 2012 appearance at the centrist Brookings Institution. “That was certainly the hallmark of the foreign policies of both President Bushes and of President Reagan. But when I arrived in the Senate last year, I found that some of the traditional sides in the foreign policy debate had shifted.”

It proved to be a temporary shift, fueled in part by the libertarian-leaning Tea Party movement that gave the GOP great wins in 2010’s midterm elections.

Now, Rubio is facing a Republican electorate that is itching for a tougher stance against Vladimir Putin’s Russia, stronger sanctions against Iran and improved relations with Israel. Rubio’s advisers are looking at Wednesday’s speech to assure voters that he can deliver on that wish list.

Rubio offered a preview of it last weekend when he went before conservatives in South Carolina. Channeling Liam Neeson’s character in the film “Taken,” the senator promised an audience in Greenville he would have a tough message for America’s enemies: “We will look for you, we will find you and we will kill you.”

It’s quite the change from a figure who earlier in his career called for restraint in military engagements; he now backs unlimited authority for Obama to chase Islamic State fighters across the globe.

Rubio also shifted positions on military spending. In 2013, he said any increases to the military budget had to be accompanied by cuts to other spending. With the campaign approaching, Rubio in March called for more military spending without corresponding reductions elsewhere.

Rubio and his advisers are banking his foreign policy experience and interest will set him apart from a field that is likely to include Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey and Scott Walker of Wisconsin, as well as former Govs. Jeb Bush of Florida, Rick Perry of Texas and Mike Huckabee of Arkansas. Rubio tells crowds that senators are more qualified than governors when it comes to foreign policy.

“The next president of the United States needs to be someone that has a clear view of what’s happening in the world, a clear strategic vision of America’s role in it and a clear practical plan for how to engage America in global affairs,” Rubio told reporters in January. “And I think, for governors, that’s going to be a challenge, at least initially, because they don’t deal with foreign policy on a daily basis.”

As they race for the Republican Party's presidential nomination, the senators in the running are also in a battle for the title of most-conservative.

Ted Cruz of Texas wins. But not by much.

The new legislative ratings by the American Conservative Union, a leading grassroots conservative organization, gave three senators perfect 100 scores: Cruz, Mike Lee of Utah and the just-retired Tom Coburn of Oklahoma.

Another five senators were bunched together with ratings of 96. Included were Marco Rubio of Florida and Rand Paul of Kentucky.

Cruz, Rubio and Paul are all declared candidates for president and will compete in a Republican primary season where conservative credentials will be a major selling point.

Another Republican senator who has all but declared a run, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, had a far-more moderate score of 74.

Florida's other senator, Bill Nelson of Orlando, was one of 16 Democrats to score a zero in the conservative group's rating system.

The group's ratings were based on an analysis of votes cast or positions taken on 25 key issues. The group's ratings are designed to test the issues and votes that "serve as a dividing line to help separate those members of the U.S. House and Senate who protect liberty as conservatives and those who are truly liberal."

Rubio only went afoul of the group's positions once: his vote against an amendment that would have phased in a reduction in government subsidies for flood insurance.

Lindsey Graham to Hold Senate Fundraiser Days After Planned Launch of White House Bid // WSJ // Reid Epstein – May 12, 2015

Senator Lindsey Graham, shown at the annual Milken Institute Global Conference in Beverly Hills, California, on April 27, would be joining a crowded field of Republican presidential candidates.

Sen. Lindsey Graham is planning to announce his presidential campaign June 1. The next week he will be raising money for his Senate war chest.

Taking time from what will then be a nine-day-old presidential campaign to appear at a fundraiser for his Senate PAC may not indicate the South Carolina Republican is laser-focused on winning the White House.

"I don't know where the presidential campaign might go, but crazier things have happened," said Dave Barron, a volunteer for Mr. Graham who sent the invitation Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. Graham's presidential campaign-in-waiting said he will appear at the June 10 fundraiser in Washington for the Fund for America's Future, his Senate leadership PAC. The fundraiser will be held at the Pennsylvania Avenue offices of the law firm Balch & Bingham LLP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Graham's presidential aspirations are no secret. In January he formed a presidential exploratory committee called Security Through Strength and is planning a June 1 campaign launch. Federal Election Commission rules limit the amount that can be legally transferred from his federal leadership PAC to a presidential campaign to $5,000 per year.

Brittany Bramell, a spokeswoman for Mr. Graham's presidential committee, said the Senate PAC fundraiser will not distract from his White House aspirations.

"The Fund for America's future is an organization that supports other Republicans running for office throughout the country in order to keep a Republican majority in Washington, which would surely help a Republican president in the coming years."

Mr. Graham is considered a longshot in the increasingly crowded field of Republicans running or considering running for the party's 2016 presidential nomination. Last month he told the Journal he needs to raise $15 million to be competitive in the early primary states and advance to the "final four" of candidates.

In an interview Tuesday, Mr. Barron said Mr. Graham could use the money raised on June 1 to support fellow Senate Republicans who share his hawkish foreign policy vision. He said none of the funds raised at the June 10 event would go toward Mr. Graham's re-election campaign.

"Regardless of what presidential path he takes, Lindsey will be involved in keeping and expanding a Senate majority and this fundraiser is to help us in that regard," Mr. Barron said. "If he's not president of the United States, in four years he'll be announcing for re-election in South Carolina."

Senate Democrats vote to block Obama on trade // WaPo // Mike DeBonis and Steven Mufson – May 12, 2015

President Obama collided with his own party Tuesday when Senate Democrats stalled consideration of a trade measure that would give the administration greater authority to negotiate more freely with other countries.

The Senate vote was a sharp blow to the president's efforts to win approval for a new Asia-Pacific trade bill that has emerged as a top agenda item for Obama. Only one Democratic senator, Thomas R. Carper of Delaware, voted with the president Tuesday.

Administration officials and Republican leaders immediately said they would bring a measure back to the Senate floor.

But the setback highlighted the president's failure to convince Democratic lawmakers, labor union leaders and environmental groups that the 12-nation trade deal known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership would help the U.S. economy. Obama has argued that the pact would open markets, promote better labor conditions abroad and protect endangered species and the environment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama has made the trade deal one of his top priorities, and to bolster his ability to finish negotiating the still-secret terms of the accord, he has asked Congress to give him “fast track” trade authority. But a procedural motion to open up debate of the fast-track legislation failed by a 52-to-45 vote, falling short of the 60 votes needed to begin consideration of the complex Pacific trade accord.

Senate Democrats blocked legislation on Tuesday that would have given President Obama the power to grant “fast-track” authority to move trade deals quickly through Congress. (Reuters)

Ahead of the vote, White House press secretary Josh Earnest played down crumbling support for the legislation as a “procedural snafu” — a phrase he repeated 10 times — that could be worked out in the coming days. Earnest said fast-track authority was “critically important to the future of our economy.”

But in the Senate, the measure’s failure seemed to be more than a procedural glitch. The trade accord has sparked a Democratic revolt and laid bare a spat between Obama and liberal Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.). And it has embittered labor union leaders who feel they helped elect Obama and have received little for their efforts.

Moreover, Senate Democrats — including the handful who have supported Obama’s trade push — said they were not inclined to move forward with debate unless Republican leaders provided assurances that related pieces of legislation would move in tandem.

[Obama, Warren feud breaks open as trade legislation blocked by Democrats]

That group included Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), who negotiated the trade package with top Republicans in the House and Senate and who has been a rare ally of Obama’s trade agenda inside the president’s party.

“Until there is a path to get all four bills passed,” Wyden said after a lunchtime meeting with fellow pro-trade Democrats, “we will — certainly most of us — have to vote no.”

As the vote was faltering in a midday roll call, the bloc of 10 Democrats willing to support the trade legislation was summoned to the White House for a meeting with Obama and top deputies to try to forge a compromise, according to congressional and administration officials. But it was too late.

As President Obama's trade legislation was facing likely defeat Tuesday on its first vote in the Senate, White House press secretary Josh Earnest was ready with a talking point: "procedural snafu." (Tom LeGro/The Washington Post)

Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said Tuesday that Republicans were willing to attach “trade adjustment assistance” — which would provide funding authority for worker assistance programs — to the fast-track bill. But he made no pledge to include a trade enforcement bill — which would, among other things, take aim at alleged Chinese currency manipulation and is opposed by the administration — or a fourth bill concerning trade with Africa.

McConnell said those provisions could be attached by amendment to the bills under consideration.

“We want to pass this and get this to the president’s desk,” he said. “It’s the Democrats who are standing in the way of what is one of the president’s prime domestic policy plans for the economy of this country.”

[Clinton hedge on trade leaves Obama without political cover in Warren feud]

Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), one of the Senate's fiercest opponents of free trade, said late Monday that the vote to proceed would fail unless Republicans made a more solid commitment to take up the related bills.

"It's a betrayal of workers and small business in our communities to pass fast track, to put it on the president's desk without enforcement . . . and without helping workers," Brown said. "It's a betrayal of what we should be standing for."

But Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said Monday that there was "no compromise that can be reached that is going to link all four bills together."

Hatch, who for months negotiated with Wyden, the committee's top Democrat, over the trade legislation, betrayed frustration at the latest Democratic demands.

Moving all four trade bills in tandem, he said Tuesday, is "not what we agreed to, it's not what we went forth on, it's not what everybody understood, and it's strange to me that they would change their commitments at the last minute."

"Everybody will have a chance for their amendments within reason," Hatch added. "If they win on currency . . . that's the way it is."

[Why Obama went to Oregon to push Congress on trade agreements]

The challenge for Obama is not convincing anti-trade hard-liners such as Brown, but rather persuading a core group of pro-trade Democrats, such as Sen. Christopher A. Coons (D-Del.), to back trade promotion authority (TPA), the formal name for the fast-track bill. TPA gives the president the power to negotiate an international deal that Congress can either approve or reject, but not modify.

"I don't think today's vote is a death knell for TPA," Coons said Tuesday. "But it is a very strong warning shot to the majority leader and those who would advance TPA that without worker protections, without enforcement provisions, they will likely not move forward."

The provisions the administration is negotiating are difficult to assess. Although not open to the public, lawmakers are allowed to see them in a secure room without taking notes or electronic devices.

Nonetheless, the administration has dispatched Cabinet members and the president to a variety of staged public events around the country meant to highlight the benefits of increased trade. Obama has argued that the Trans-Pacific Partnership would make American goods and services more competitive by opening up markets such as Japan's auto market and improving labor conditions in places like Vietnam.

Still, a variety of unions and liberal groups hailed the president's defeat Tuesday. AFL-CIO President Richard L. Trumka said the trade bill "would have led to undemocratic trade deals that lower wages and eliminate jobs."

"I'm not sure they can fix it because I think the administration has indicated it is willing to go so far and no further in fixing the real problems of our trade agenda," said Bill Samuel, head of government relations for the AFL-CIO.

“They need to demonstrate what they’re doing. They have asked people to take it on faith.”

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), the majority whip, said the expected vote was a “failure” of the president’s influence, and he urged Obama to do more to convince wavering Senate Democrats.

“Does the president of the United States have enough clout with members of his own political party to produce enough votes to get this bill debated and ultimately passed?” Cornyn asked.

Earnest said, “I would withhold judgment about the president’s persuasion abilities until we’ve had a chance to advance this legislation through.”

McConnell was the only Republican to vote against proceeding, a tactical move giving him the ability to quickly hold another vote later if circumstances change. Whether that would happen later this week or whether the standoff could extend through next week and into a week-long Memorial Day recess remained unclear Tuesday.

Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and his presumptive successor, Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), have tendered a compromise offer to Republican leaders, according to a Democratic aide who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss internal maneuverings. Under their proposal, the currency manipulation measure would be stripped from the broader trade legislation, but it would have to get a Senate vote before the rest of the package moved forward.

Schumer said in a news conference after the vote that he was “not insistent” that the currency manipulation provision be part of the fast-track bill. “But it ought to move together as a package, concurrently, alongside it,” he said.

Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), the minority whip, said he doubted the trade impasse could be quickly overcome and noted other major pieces of legislation — such as a renewal of highway funding and a possible extension of telephone surveillance authority — must be addressed before month’s end.

“If you look how much has to be done, there’s not very much time left to do it,” he said.

At least 5 dead in Amtrak crash in Philadelphia // USA Today // Melanie Eversley - May 13, 2015

At least five people died Tuesday night when a passenger train carrying 238 passengers and five crew members derailed in Philadelphia.

The tragedy that took place some times after 9 p.m. EDT forced Amtrak to shut down all service between New York City and Philadelphia.

"It is an absolute disastrous mess," Mayor Michael Nutter said late Tuesday night. "Never seen anything like it in my life."

Fifty-three people with injuries were taken to hospitals and six people were taken to hospitals with critical injuries, officials said.

The train appeared to go off the tracks, Paul Cheung, an Associated Press employee, said. Cheung said he was fortunate to be at the back of the train, and that the front of it "looks pretty bad." Cheung said he saw "some people mangled up."

Former U.S. representative Patrick Murphy tweeted that he was on the train, that he was OK, but that others were hurt. "Helping others. Pray for those injured," Murphy tweeted.

The effect that the accident will have on major rail traffic in the Northeast corridor remains somewhat unclear, but Amtrak did announce late Tuesday that it was canceling all traffic between New York and Philadelphia for the time being. Philadelphia is a major hub along the Northeast corridor, one of the most heavily traveled in the nation.

Shortly after 10 p.m. ET, Amtrak issued a statement saying that it was aware of the derailment involving Northeast Regional Train 188 and that it would provide updates as soon as they are available.

"It is a devastating scene down there," Nutter said during a late night news conference. "We walked the entire length of the train area. The engine completely separated from the rest of the train and one of the cars is perpendicular to the rest of the cars. It's unbelievable."

Police in Philadelphia issued a statement asking members of the public not to go anywhere near the scene of the derailment to allow first responders to do their jobs.

One person, a woman, was being transported to Temple University Hospital, and three other people were being taken to Jefferson University Hospital, according to 6ABC.

EMS reported that Temple advised it could take no more patients late Tuesday.

Others were being taken to Frankford Hospital-Torresdale Division, according to Philadelphia police.

Representatives at Amtrak's media relations line for emergencies could not immediately be reached late Tuesday.

AOL, a Digital Pioneer, With Another Chance to Reshape Itself // New York Times // Emly Steel and Michael j. de la Merced - May 12, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Soon after Tim Armstrong was named chief executive of AOL in 2009, he started reading the management book "You're in Charge, Now What?"

Mr. Armstrong was 38 at the time, a charming, hard-charging Google ad sales executive who had never before been a chief executive, let alone the head of a company in complete disarray.

Six years later, he could write a management book of his own.

He has steered the company through its divorce from the media giant Time Warner, hundreds of millions of dollars of sales and acquisitions, management clashes, a proxy battle with an activist fund and cost-cutting measures that led to highly publicized public apologies by him. All those changes came as AOL continued a rocky transformation into an ad-supported digital media company from its roots as a subscription-based service for connecting to the Internet.

AOL had been the frequent subject of takeover speculation by Yahoo, another early giant of online media.Verizon Bets on Video Ads in $4 Billion Deal for AOLMAY 12, 2015

Pedestrians in Midtown, communicating the modern way.

On Tuesday, Mr. Armstrong announced that AOL was selling itself to Verizon for $4.4 billion, a deal that he billed as the creation of a next-generation media company but that also rescued AOL from having to continue its turnaround alone.

AOL, the one-time king of media, is a shadow of its former self. Its deal for Time Warner is regarded as the high-water mark of the dot-com bubble.

"I wasn't totally prepared for this," he said on Tuesday about taking on the top post at AOL, noting that his top three lessons as a first-time C.E.O. had been the importance of the right talent, the need for grit and persistence and the value of dedication to a long-term plan.

"The short-term bumps in the strategy don't matter as much as the long-term destination that you end up at," said Mr. Armstrong, a 6-foot-4 former captain of the Connecticut College lacrosse team who is known for peppering his speech with sports metaphors. "AOL has become a more valuable company because we stayed on strategy."

The value of AOL shares has increased nearly 120 percent since the company spun out from Time Warner in 2009, as it has steadily transformed into a digital-media and ad-technology company. But some analysts have questioned whether AOL's growth was sustainable on its own. Over the years, the company has gradually increased its advertising revenue, but its subscription group, which includes its Internet service, continues to provide almost all of AOL's profit.

Now, even with the Verizon merger, the prospect for transforming AOL into a 21st century media conglomerate remains an open question.

Mr. Armstrong, who is one of AOL's biggest individual shareholders outside of big investment firms, will see the value of his shares rise to about $84 million as a result of the Verizon deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He made the best of a hand that he was dealt,” said Anthony DiClemente, a media analyst with Nomura. “As an executive, he did the best job he could balancing the growth opportunity for shareholders and a business that definitely is declining.”

When Mr. Armstrong first stepped into the job, AOL had long since been cast aside as the dinosaur of the Internet. It was the pioneering company that in the 1990s introduced millions of people to the web. It was also the acquiring company in the colossal 2000 merger, in which AOL used its high-priced stock to buy Time Warner, which at the time was the smaller company, at least in terms of stock market value. That deal is now regarded as the biggest merger failure in history. But it struggled to adapt as consumers abandoned its dial-up Internet service for faster broadband connections.

A revolving door of high-profile executives had tried to turn AOL into a digital media powerhouse, but it had been eclipsed by new digital darlings like Google and Facebook. Questions loomed as to whether the company could be rescued at all.

At $4.4 billion, AOL is valued at a fraction of the worth of younger and more successful companies like Facebook or even WhatsApp, the messaging service that Facebook bought for $21 billion. Its price tag also values AOL at just a shade above Vice, the growing media power that has drawn adulation, and cash, from private investors.

Deal-making has featured prominently in Mr. Armstrong’s strategy. He has overseen roughly two dozen acquisitions, worth several hundred million dollars, aimed at bolstering the company’s media and ad-technology offerings.

“It is a totally different company than it was five or six years ago,” Mr. Armstrong said.

Most noteworthy have been the takeovers of content properties like TechCrunch, a technology news site. And none have surpassed the prominence of the news site The Huffington Post, for which AOL paid $315 million four years ago.

One of his most prominent missteps was Patch, a collection of local sites. Mr. Armstrong was a co-founder of the site and acquired the company weeks into his tenure. (He recused himself from the acquisition process.)

He was criticized by investors for pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into the struggling company, which some say he took too long to wind down.

Together, those properties have melded into what Mr. Armstrong has said he hoped would be a new-media empire that could command attractive advertising rates. The value of The Huffington Post alone has grown significantly since its acquisition, Mr. Armstrong said. (The single biggest acquisition that AOL has struck was its $405 million deal for Adap.tv, a specialist in video advertising.)

Yet the company has also been pressured to consider various deals. AOL agreed three years ago to sell a trove of patents to Microsoft for about $1 billion as it faced demands from an activist hedge fund, Starboard Value.

Perhaps the single biggest potential deal that has dogged Mr. Armstrong is one he has shown little interest in: Yahoo, another onetime Internet giant humbled by the dot-com bubble’s collapse.

The two companies have held multiple discussions about potential tie-ups over the years, and investors pushed for such a move as recently as last fall — though executives consistently said publicly that neither was truly interested.

Now with the Verizon deal, the fate of the digital-media content business that Mr. Armstrong built at AOL is up in the air.

Verizon's interest in keeping The Huffington Post and other prominent media brands is unclear. In recent months, AOL has considered spinning off The Huffington Post, according to people with knowledge of the plans who were not authorized to discuss them. Axel Springer, the German media group, and General Atlantic, the private equity firm, are among companies that have expressed interest.

Mr. Armstrong said that both AOL and Verizon were "big investors in content" and that "content is a huge part of the future."

Asked if Arianna Huffington, founder of The Huffington Post and an AOL executive, was planning to work for Verizon, Mr. Armstrong said, "Yes, definitely."

On Tuesday, Mr. Armstrong said that he also would stay on at Verizon and that he had signed a multiyear contract with the company. One friend has said that he aspires to be the Rupert Murdoch of the digital age. Mr. Armstrong said that he was living his dream now.

"If you want to talk about building the next great global media platform," he said, "the deal accomplished that goal, and that is what I am here to do."

Nepal earthquake: Rescue resumes after latest deadly tremor // BBC News // May 12, 2015

Rescue work has resumed to find victims and survivors of the latest deadly earthquake to hit Nepal.

At least 65 people died in Nepal and nearly 2,000 were hurt in Tuesday's 7.3 magnitude quake, with fears the figures could rise. At least 17 died in India.

A search continues for a missing US aid helicopter with eight people on board.

Thousands of Nepalis spent the night in the open. Many have not returned to their homes since a 7.8 magnitude quake on 25 April that killed over 8,000.

Tuesday's earthquake was centred about 76km (47 miles) east of the capital, Kathmandu, near the town of Namche Bazaar.

A second tremor of 6.3-magnitude hit Nepal 30 minutes later and numerous other aftershocks continued into Wednesday morning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The main quake was felt in northern India, Tibet and Bangladesh. India's home ministry said 16 people had been killed in the state of Bihar, and one more in Uttar Pradesh. Officials in China said one person was confirmed dead in Tibet.

Nepal's districts of Dolakha and Sindhupalchowk, east of the capital, were initially listed as the worst hit, with officials confirming 26 fatalities, 20 of them in the town of Charikot.

The latest earthquake in Nepal triggered a landslide in Dhunche near the country's border with China.

But the true extent of the casualties and damage remains unclear.

Home Minister Bam Dev Gautam said: "Many houses have collapsed in Dolakha... there is a chance that the number of dead from the district will go up."

Regine Kopplow, a German aid worker in Charikot said: "I saw a woman in the building opposite jump from the third floor who suffered injuries to her leg, elbow and hand.

"People stayed outside, the shaking continued. Some people were crying, hugging each other."

The US military said a Marine Corps Huey helicopter involved in disaster relief efforts had gone missing while working in the vicinity of Charikot.

The Pentagon said there were six US Marines and two Nepali soldiers on board. It said there was as yet no sign of a crash and the craft may have landed safely, amid reports of fuel issues.

The Red Cross said it had received reports of many casualties in the town of Chautara in Sindhupalchowk, where it has a hospital and which has become a hub for humanitarian aid.

Spokeswoman Nichola Jones said: "Hundreds of people are pouring in. They are treating dozens for injuries and they have performed more than a dozen surgeries."

At least two major buildings collapsed in Kathmandu, with at least three people rescued.

But there have been other reports of landslides and fallen buildings in towns and villages outside the capital.

Save the Children said Gorkha, close to the epicentre of the 25 April quake, had been hit by new landslides. A spokeswoman told the BBC its staff had been "dodging huge rocks rolling off the hillside".

Residents of Namche Bazaar said there was some damage there but no reports of deaths.

The BBC's Navin Singh Khadka says local officials in the Everest region report very few tourists are still in the area following the 25 April quake.

Many residents of the capital and other towns spent Tuesday night outdoors, too scared to return to homes.

Dipak Koirala, who lives in Ramechhap district, told AFP news agency: "I was thinking of moving to a rented room, but today was so scary I can't risk my family's life."

Sulav Singh, who lives in Kathmandu, told the Associated Press: "I thought I was going to die this time. Things were just getting back to normal, and we get this one."

Politicians on Tuesday fled Nepal's parliament chamber in Kathmandu as the quake hit.

Prime Minister Sushil Koirala said later: "At an hour of a natural disaster like this, we have to face it with courage and patience."

The BBC's Yogita Limaye, who was in Nepal's mountains when the latest earthquake struck, said: "The earth shook and it shook for a pretty long time.

"I can completely understand the sense of panic. We have been seeing tremors - it's been two-and-a-half weeks since the first quake. But this one really felt like it went on for a really long time. People have been terrified."

line

In April, we saw the fault boundary rupture eastwards for 150km (93 miles). And the immediate assessment suggests Tuesday's tremor has occurred right at the eastern edge of this failure.

In that context, this second earthquake was almost certainly triggered by the stress changes caused by the first one.

The US Geological Survey's modelling suggested there was 1-in-200 chance of a M7-7.8 event occurring this week.

Quake experts often talk about "seismic gaps", which refer to segments of faults that are, to some extent, overdue a quake. Tuesday's big tremor may well have filled a hole between what we saw on 25 April and some historic events - such as those in 1934, that occurred further still to the east.

China Lashes Out Over U.S. Plan on South China Sea // WSJ // Eva Dou And

James Hookway - May 13, 2015

Beijing strongly condemned on Wednesday a proposed U.S. military plan to send aircraft and Navy ships near disputed South China Sea islands to contest Chinese territorial claims over the area.

“Do you think we would support that move? We are severely concerned about relevant remarks made by the American side. We believe the American side needs to make clarification on that,” said Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Hua Chunying.

The unusually strong comments came after U.S. officials said Defense Secretary Ash Carter had asked his staff to look at options to counter China’s increasingly assertive claims over disputed islets in the South China Sea. Those options, officials said, include flying Navy surveillance aircraft over islands and sending U.S. Navy ships within 12 nautical miles of reefs that have been built up in recent months around the Spratly Islands.

“We always uphold the freedom of navigation in the South China Sea,” Ms. Hua said. “But the freedom of navigation definitely does not mean the military vessel or aircraft of a foreign country can willfully enter the territorial waters or airspace of another country. The Chinese side firmly upholds national sovereignty and security.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ms. Hua said Beijing urged “relevant countries to refrain from taking risky and provocative action.”

The proposed U.S. military maneuvers and China’s swift response have raised the stakes in an already tense regional showdown over who controls the disputed waters. Six governments–China, Vietnam, Brunei, Malaysia, Taiwan and the Philippines—claim the South China Sea waters, islands, reefs and atolls in whole or in part.

The Philippines, the country in the region that has taken the most confrontational stance against China, quickly welcomed the news of the U.S. plan.

The rest of Southeast Asia was holding its tongue, at least for now. Privately, many diplomats and leaders in the region say they worry about the potentially destabilizing impact of a confrontation between Washington and Beijing.

Manila has mounted a legal challenge of China’s claims at the United Nations, much to Beijing’s annoyance, and the country’s foreign secretary, Albert del Rosario, said Tuesday in Washington that the Philippines is seeking more help from the U.S. in pegging back China’s land-reclamation efforts in disputed waters.

“The Philippines believes that the U.S., as well as all responsible members of the international community, do have an interest and say in what is happening in the South China Sea,” said Charles Jose, spokesman for the Philippine Department of Foreign Affairs, early Wednesday, citing freedom of navigation and unimpeded flow of commerce among other factors.

The Philippines has tried to nudge the 10-member Association of Southeast Asian Nations closer to a firmer stand against China’s continuing land-reclamation projects, but many countries are wary. A recent statement from Asean criticizing land-reclamation programs in the South China Sea, for instance, didn’t specifically name China.

ENLARGE

The biggest concern among some is that U.S. efforts to ensure free navigation in the region might be interpreted in China as an effort to contain Beijing’s growing influence, which could escalate tensions further.

Malaysia, which currently holds the rotating chairmanship of Asean, also lays claim to parts of the South China Sea, but officials there said it was too soon to say anything about the U.S.’s new direction.

Officials in Vietnam, another claimant, didn’t immediately respond to requests for comment.

Australian Foreign Minister Julie Bishop told The Wall Street Journal that Canberra doesn’t take sides on competing territorial claims in the South China Sea, but is in close contact with the U.S. on regional tensions.

“We are concerned that land reclamation activity by China and other claimants could raise tensions in the region,” Ms. Bishop said.

The expansion of South China Sea shoals has put Canberra in an uncomfortable position between Washington, its longstanding security ally, and China, its largest trade partner. Defense Minister Kevin Andrews is expected to discuss regional tensions with his U.S. counterpart, Ash Carter, in Singapore in a few weeks.

U.S. military commanders have in recent months urged Australia to consider joining multinational patrols in international waters north of Indonesia, while also increasing the frequency of U.S. warship and aircraft visits through Australian bases on the periphery of regional tensions.

Other U.S. allies in the region had little to say.

A South Korea Foreign Ministry statement expressed hope China and Asean would agree on a code of conduct in the South China Sea, saying, “A guarantee of security and rights of free navigation in South China Sea, a major maritime route, is a very important issue for South Korea, which relies heavily on trade.” A ministry official said it is inappropriate for Seoul to comment directly on South China Sea territorial disputes.

Japan’s Chief Cabinet Secretary Yoshihide Suga refrained from commenting on the considerations by the U.S., its top ally, saying only that the Japanese government wasn’t aware of the matter.

Japan and the Philippines, which have beefed up security ties in response to China’s maritime assertiveness, on Tuesday conducted a joint naval exercise in the South China Sea. Japan sent two destroyers to participate in the drill, which it said took place in “the waters west of Manila.”

While the two navies have trained jointly before, the latest session featured for the first time an exercise focused on communications strategies to respond to “unplanned encounters at sea.”

Security experts are closely watching whether Japan will start sending surveillance planes and naval vessels to the contentious waters of the South China Sea to aid the U.S.’s efforts to patrol the region.

So far, Mr. Carter has only asked his staff to look into various ways to contest China’s claims to sovereignty in the South China Sea.

China, meanwhile, has consistently said it has uncontested sovereignty of the waters, which it maps out with a nine-dash line. It has also said that the reclamation projects are mostly for civilian purposes. U.S. estimates suggest that China has expanded the land it controls in the Spratlys chain to as much as 2,000 acres, up from 500 acres last year. Satellite images from defense intelligence firm IHS Jane’s also show that China has begun construction of an airstrip on one of the new artificial islands.

Manila’s challenge of China’s claims through a United Nations’ tribunal argues that the nine-dash line China uses has no legal basis. Beijing has said it “will neither accept nor participate” in U.N. arbitration.

Inspectors in Syria Find Traces of Banned Military Chemicals // NYT // Somini Sengupta, Marlise Simons and Anne Barnard - MAY 12, 2015

International inspectors have found traces of banned toxic chemicals in at least three military locations in Syria, four diplomats and officials said, less than two years after President Bashar al-Assad agreed to dismantle the country’s chemical arsenal.

Traces of sarin, a nerve agent, were found in drainage pipes and in artillery shells in two places, and traces of another banned toxin, ricin, were found in a third location, a scientific research center, according to a United Nations diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss confidential reports from the inspectors.

The discovery of the small amounts of banned materials, first reported by Reuters, comes as Syrian government forces are being accused of continuing to bombard insurgent-held areas with chlorine bombs.

Taken together, the recent events raised troubling questions for international inspectors about whether Damascus was violating the terms of a deal brokered by Russia and the United States in 2013 that forestalled an American military strike. The Syrian government was held responsible for a series of chemical weapons attacks, including a deadly sarin attack near the capital, before that accord.

A Western diplomat briefed on the findings by the inspectors from the global Organization for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons said that while there was no clear evidence of new use or production of forbidden chemicals, “the strong suspicion is they are retaining stockpiles which are being held back.”

“This, and the open defiance in using prohibited chlorine bombs, is indicative of bad faith from the beginning,” the diplomat said.

A violation of the deal struck to eliminate Syria’s chemical arsenal would undermine President Obama’s single claim to policy success in Syria, where four years of war has displaced nearly half the country, killed more than 200,000 people and shown no sign of abating. It could also embarrass Russia, Mr. Assad’s most powerful military and diplomatic patron.

Already there was mounting evidence that Mr. Assad’s forces had violated the terms of the international treaty banning use of chemical weapons — and signed as part of the deal facilitated by Washington and Moscow — by dropping jerry-built chlorine bombs on insurgent-held areas. While the Syrian government has denied using chlorine or any chemical as a weapon, only the government has access to the helicopters that witnesses say are being used, and rescue workers say the pace of such attacks has increased in some areas.

Now, inspectors are trying to determine the significance of the new findings of small amounts of banned agents, which do not necessarily indicate a lingering weapons program and were described by some diplomats as being perhaps less troublesome than the charges that the Syrian government is dropping barrel bombs loaded with chlorine. The inspectors, whose last tour ended on April 3, are expected to seek answers from Syrian officials during a visit beginning Sunday.

An investigation into both allegations could put even more pressure on Mr. Assad during a renewed push to find a negotiated settlement to the conflict that could lead to his removal from office. On Tuesday, President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, Mr. Assad’s most powerful ally, met with Secretary of State John Kerry in Sochi, Russia, to discuss Syria, and Staffan de Mistura, the United Nations special envoy for Syria, continued a new round of talks in Geneva. Both sets of talks are aimed at re-energizing the search for an elusive political solution.

At the United Nations, the Security Council has been hamstrung on chemical weapons, as Syria’s allies contend that the allegations are part of a political campaign against Mr. Assad by Western governments, including the United States, that have called for his ouster. Evidence of chemical weapons remains a fraught issue for global public opinion more than a decade after false claims of an Iraqi chemical weapons program were used to justify the American invasion that deposed Saddam Hussein.

The detection of traces of banned chemicals were revealed as the Security Council confronted the charges about the use of a more mundane chemical, chlorine, which is not a banned substance but whose use in weapons is forbidden under international law. Government opponents, doctors and rescue workers contend that Syrian forces are increasingly using chlorine in bombs dropped from aircraft.

Inspectors found last year that chlorine had been used in battle in violation of international law. But with Syria's ally Russia wielding a Security Council veto, the joint mission of the global monitoring organization with the United Nations was not mandated to investigate who had used it. In recent days, the United States has sought to establish a United Nations mission to determine who is responsible.

As for the new discovery of traces of banned chemicals, it is not necessarily a ground for punitive action by the Security Council, officials said. There is no evidence that banned materials were used in weapons after Syria signed the treaty, or that Syria possesses sufficient quantities to use in future weapons.

What is clear is that the Organization for the Prevention of Chemical Weapons, the international group that enforces the chemical weapons convention, has sent its team of inspectors eight times to Syria. The body is still seeking to clarify gaps in the government's required official declarations about the location and amounts of its toxic stockpiles and the nature and scope of activities at weapons sites.

What steps the Security Council might take depend on what the monitoring organization's inspectors conclude about why the traces were there.

"To have some gaps in the initial declaration is quite common," the diplomat said. "To have them persist after a year and a half I find a little odd. It should have been cleared up now."

At an executive council meeting of the international monitoring group on May 7 in The Hague, attendees were told that one or more facilities in Syria had not been inspected because the government said security problems prevented access, according to diplomats who attended.

The United States ambassador to the organization, Robert Mikulak, told the group that there were "gaps and inconsistencies" in Syria's declaration of its weapons, according to a copy of his speech.

"Progress continues to be agonizingly slow in destroying all of the remaining chemical weapons facilities," he said.

He added: "It is the duty of this council — and of its technical secretariat — to ensure that the facts about use of chemical weapons are determined and made known. Silent toleration is not an acceptable option."

Two other United States officials, speaking on condition of anonymity to discuss the reports, confirmed the United Nations diplomat's account that traces of two banned agents were used.

A former United States official added that small amounts of banned agents might be less problematic than large amounts of chlorine.

"Traces usually means just that — traces," the official said of the other banned chemicals.

A spokesman for the international monitoring organization in The Hague pointed out that the chemical weapons treaty, which Syria signed in October 2013, required Syria to declare the precise locations of facilities that were part of its chemical weapons program, as well as the nature and scope of the activities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The spokesman added that his colleagues were “continuing to work with the Syrian Arab Republic to clarify their declaration,” though he said he could not divulge details of the “operational verification matters” because of confidential provisions in the treaty.

Why Hillary Clinton Would Be a Weak Presidential Nominee for Democrats // Huffington Post // Eric Zuesse – May 12, 2015

If Hillary Clinton wins the Democratic Presidential nomination, then how strong a candidate will she be against a Republican nominee who, as a representative of the conservative party, is proudly and openly supporting conservative positions?

Taegan Goddard of The Week headlines on May 11th, "Is Hillary Clinton Flip-Flopping or Just Evolving?" and he notes several issues on which she has rhetorically veered to the left recently. He further notes that one of the things that probably shaved a crucial few percentage-points off the losers in previous Presidential general-election contests and caused them to lose, such as John Kerry and Mitt Romney, was the given candidate's primary-campaign rhetorical flip-flops that had been made during the Party's primaries in order to be able to wrap up that candidate's Party-base so as to win its Presidential nomination and so be able to become a participant in the general-election contest.

In other words, the record is clear: such flip-flops reduce the ardor of the given Party's voters to come to the polls and vote on Election Day. The opposite Party's nominee, who hasn't flip-flopped quite so blatantly, wins the general election because that Party's base then comes to the polls in droves on Election Day in order to ensconce into the White House someone whom they passionately want to be there, someone whom they strongly believe represents their values. Thus, George W. Bush and Barack Obama became Presidents, while Al Gore, John Kerry, John McCain, and Mitt Romney didn't.

Whereas today, some Republicans might not consider George W. Bush to have been a really conservative President, they strongly did believe him to be a really conservative Presidential nominee, both in 2000 and in 2004. And whereas today, some Democrats might not consider Barack Obama to be a really progressive President, they strongly did believe him to be trying and doing his best to be so against the ferociously conservative Republican congressional opposition, both in 2008 and in 2012.

So: in order for Hillary Clinton to be credible in the general election against whomever the Republicans end up nominating, she will need to out-compete that nominee on consistency, and not only on ideology. Polls show that the two Parties are overall fairly-equally close to the viewpoints of the American electorate on ideology; but, in the final election, what makes the decisive difference is usually instead the passion-factor: the devotedness of the given nominee's followers, and this means mainly the Party (but also independents who respect the given person's consistency or "honesty"). Flip-floppers don't get it, and they never can, especially when things become closer and closer to Election Day and the voters become more concerned about the issues than they were at the contest's start (i.e., before the debates and the advertisements).

The stakes at the end of a Presidential contest are more stark than they ever were before. The key factor then becomes trust: if you don't trust your Party's nominee, you're a lot less likely to go to the polls to vote for him or her. That's a major reason why the U.S. has one of the lowest of all nations' voter-participation rates.

If Hillary Clinton becomes the Democratic nominee, then how will she be able to attack the Republican nominee for being a tool of Wall Street -- which she will have to do (and do convincingly) in order to beat the Republican?

Here's her record, and here are its results:

How many Democrats will be too disheartened even to show up and vote? And how many of them will even be wondering whether perhaps some of the "private" emails that Ms. Clinton had wiped off her computer's (even off of her server's) hard drive, might have been emails with some of the Wall Street bigs (and their law and accounting firms) who were on that list of her top campaign contributors? Even the legality of her having destroyed those emails is far from clear. So: how will she be able to motivate her Party-base, when that final moment arrives?

If Hillary Clinton becomes the Democratic nominee, then trust will be the killer campaign-issue, even if it's not an issue that's being discussed in the campaign. The closer and closer to Election Day, the bigger and bigger that issue will be. We're as far from it now as we can be, but, with Hillary Clinton, it's already rising, and no one has any suggestion of a way in which it will likely recede. And this is only the start.

Regardless of whom Democratic voters select to become the Democratic nominee, and regardless of whom Republican voters select to become the Republican nominee, it would not be going out on a limb to predict, right now, that the Democratic nominee will be campaigning in the general election for the issues on which polls show that the public agrees mainly with the Democratic positions, and that the Republican nominee will be campaigning in the general election for the issues on which polls show that the public agrees mainly with the Republican positions. The silent but decisive killer-issue will be trust.

In primary elections, it's smart for voters to be concerned about ideology. But, if they really want to be voting for the next President of the United States, then the smartest voters in the primary elections will be even more concerned about trustworthiness. When the final election comes, that tends to be the determining issue -- more than ideology, more than "experience," more than anything else.

Time for a Conversation about Paid Sick Leave // Huffington Post // Jonathan Cohn - May 12, 2015

You've got a nasty head cold, or maybe your kid is home with the flu. If you're a waitress and you call in sick, should the law forbid your employer from withholding your day's wages?

A big debate over that question is taking place in Pennsylvania, pitting conservative state lawmakers in Harrisburg against liberal city officials in Philadelphia. It's the latest in a series of such clashes that have taken place across the country. Underscoring the high stakes of the outcome, the battle is also drawing attention from high-profile Democrats, including Hillary Clinton, in what could be the early stages of an argument that will play out during the 2016 presidential campaign.

Earlier this year, Philadelphia enacted an ordinance that will allow employees to earn up to five full days of paid sick time per year. Under its terms, employees can claim the days for their own illnesses or for those of direct family members, or they can use the days to deal with domestic violence incidents. The law goes into effect next week. Once it does, workers begin accruing paid sick time -- one hour for every 40 that they work -- as soon as they've been on the job for at least three months.

The law doesn't apply to seasonal employees or interns, or to companies where workers have unions. Companies with fewer than 10 employees must provide the time off, but not salary. Even so, as many as 200,000 Philadelphians who didn't have paid sick days before will now get them, according to the law's supporters. When Mayor Michael Nutter signed the measure in February, after vetoing two previous ones, these advocates were ecstatic.

"It's a great day for all of our workers and all of our businesses," said Marianne Bellesorte, an official with

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pathways PA, a nonprofit service and advocacy group that works on issues for women, children and families.

But city officials may not have the last word on the matter. As far back as 2013, when Nutter was still blocking the ordinance, conservative lawmakers in the state were talking about passing a law that would invalidate local sick day laws altogether. The clear target of that effort was Philadelphia, since it was the only city considering such a measure and, because of a quirk in the state's constitution, it may be the only city that has the legal authority to do so.

"I think we have an inherent problem with government trying to tell private business what they should do with their employees," John Eichelberger, a Republican state senator, told The Huffington Post in an interview last year. Eichelberger co-sponsored a preemption bill that the Senate passed last month; a similar measure is now before the state's House of Representatives. Tom Wolf, the newly elected Democratic governor, has promised to veto such legislation -- and that's where things stand now. It's not clear whether Republican leaders in the legislature could muster the votes to override him

A Familiar Fight With Familiar Faces

This isn't the first time conservatives have tried to leverage their superior numbers in state government to block or undermine paid sick days legislation in big cities, where liberals typically hold large majorities. Using a legislative template supplied by the conservative American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) and working closely with employers who oppose paid sick days mandates, conservatives have tried to enact preemption laws in more than a dozen other states. In Arizona, Georgia and nine other states, they have prevailed.

Perhaps the most highly publicized fight took place in Florida starting in 2012, after organizers in Orange County obtained the 50,000 signatures necessary to put paid sick leave up for a countywide vote. They faced stiff opposition from local employers, including Disney and Red Lobster, as well as from the county commission, whose members refused to put the measure on the ballot.

Although a judge eventually forced the commissioners to back down, the delay gave the Republican-controlled state legislature a chance to pass a preemption law -- which it did in April 2013. The delay was apparently the plan all along: In a text message later made public through state disclosure laws and reported in the Orlando Sentinel, the head of the Orange County Republican Party had urged county commissioners to find some way of slowing the local initiative's progress, so that state lawmakers could deliver their "kill shot" first.

The Central Florida debate put the human impact of paid sick time into sharp relief, since so many people work low-paying jobs in or at least tied to the big theme parks there. Nationally, more than 40 million Americans -- or roughly four out of every 10 private-sector workers -- have no paid sick days, according to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics. But it's people working in those low-paying hotel and restaurant jobs who by far have the least access to paid sick days.

That's rough on them, because they are the ones who can least afford to go without a day's pay. But it also has consequences for customers, who end up using the facilities and eating the meals these people are cleaning and preparing -- even while they may have contagious illnesses. In one survey sponsored by supporters of sick day legislation, more than 60 percent of cooks and waiters reported serving food while sick.

If the restaurant and hospitality industries are worried about this prospect, they haven't shown it. In Pennsylvania, Florida and pretty much every other part of the country where this debate has come up, these two industries have led the charge against paid sick days laws. Along with their conservative allies, they've made their case primarily on economic grounds, arguing that paid sick days are too costly -- and too burdensome -- for many employers to administer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The result of paid sick day requirements, business lobbyists and their conservative allies insist, will inevitably be some combination of higher prices and fewer jobs. Before New York City enacted its paid sick days law last year, opponents warned it would be a “de facto half-billion-dollar tax on small business.”

Proving or disproving such claims is difficult because most of the available evidence on the economic impact of paid sick days consists of employer or employee surveys, which are frequently unreliable. But while there are certainly some for whom paid sick days create real problems, there’s no sign of serious damage to business in cities like San Francisco, which has had a law requiring paid sick days in place for several years.

The evidence on the benefits of paid sick days laws is a bit clearer. One peer-reviewed study, published in the American Journal of Public Health, has shown that people with access to paid sick days are less likely to suffer on-the-job injuries -- perhaps because with prompt medical attention, nagging medical problems don’t get worse. A 2012 study from the same journal found that during the H1N1 crisis of 2009, workers without paid sick days were more likely to go to work while feeling flu-like systems, exposing co-workers to whatever illnesses they had.

In 2014, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released a report on the sources of foodborne norovirus outbreaks -- and found that contamination from infected restaurant workers was a major cause.

Aron Hall, the study’s lead author and director of viral diseases at the CDC, said, “Some food service workers understandably fear losing their job and also leaving co-workers short staffed if they don't go to work when they're sick. That's why it's so important that businesses consider using measures that encourage workers to stay home when they're sick. That includes paid sick leave and a staffing plan that includes on-call workers.”

Coming Soon To The Presidential Campaign

Whatever the policy reality -- and whatever the outcome of the political fight in Pennsylvania, which will likely drag on for at least a few weeks while the House considers legislation -- the issue of paid sick days is unlikely to fade away soon. In November, Massachusetts voters approved a ballot initiative guaranteeing most workers paid sick leave, making it the third state -- after California and Connecticut -- to do so. Vermont may be next, since the state House just passed a bill and its Democratic governor, Peter Shumlin, has said he supports the measure.

Those are all liberal states. But, in Washington, D.C., President Barack Obama has called for a national paid sick days law that would cover all states. Last month, Sen. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) introduced a budget amendment designed to test support for the concept. It got 61 votes.

Murray's proposal wasn’t an actual piece of legislation. A more detailed bill that made the costs and benefits explicit probably couldn’t get through the Senate, let alone the (even more conservative) House. But paid sick days are likely to generate more discussion in the coming months -- maybe even in response to the Pennsylvania debate.

When Nutter signed that measure in his state, Hillary Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, hailed it as an achievement. On Monday, campaign spokesman Josh Schwerin told HuffPost that Clinton was "disappointed to learn of the effort to overturn this hard-fought victory." Valerie Jarrett, senior adviser to President Obama, has also spoken out against the Pennsylvania preemption effort -- calling it "dreadful."

Clinton has hinted during the campaign that she will support a national paid sick days law, similar to what Obama has proposed. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is Clinton’s lone declared Democratic rival, has already co-sponsored such a bill in the Senate. As for the Republicans, the three presidential candidates who had a chance to vote on Murray’s amendment -- Ted Cruz, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio -- all voted no. Representatives of the campaign for Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, did not respond to questions about paid sick days laws.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That leaves Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who hasn't taken a public position on either Philadelphia's ordinance or a national proposal. But Walker has a history on the issue of paid sick days, and it's from an episode that looks a lot like the fight in Pennsylvania.

The very first statewide effort to preempt a local paid sick days law took place in Wisconsin in 2011, in response to an ordinance that voters in Milwaukee approved. Walker signed that law, saying "patchwork government mandates stifle job creation and economic opportunity." When asked to offer more detail on why he signed that bill -- or what he thought of the fight in Pennsylvania -- his press secretary, Laurel Patrick, said that Walker wanted "to ensure Wisconsin has a statewide standard for family and medical leave. This provides clarity and certainty for businesses operating across the state."

Of course, a national law guaranteeing paid sick days would eliminate the problem of "patchwork" regulations and provide the "clarity" that Walker and other opponents of local ordinances say they want. But it's possible that these conservatives will raise a more fundamental problem with legal requirements to provide paid sick days: They may oppose such laws on principle, no matter where the statutes apply. The 2016 campaign should help settle that question, maybe sooner rather than later.

America Doesn't Need Another 'Contract With America'—Not Even a Liberal One // The New Republic // Elspeth Reeve - May 12, 2015 ill de Blasio says he wants to do what Newt Gingrich did in 1994, but for progressives. Maybe he should stop saying that.

The New York mayor, joined by Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren and economist Joseph Stiglitz, rolled out his Progressive Agenda in Washington, D.C., on Tuesday; it's a 13-point plan calling for a higher minimum wage, universal pre-kindergarten, and higher taxes on the wealthy. De Blasio has explicitly compared it to Gingrich's 1994 "Contract with America," a set of legislative proposals often credited with helping Republicans win a majority in Congress for the first time in 40 years in those midterm elections, and which gave them the appearance of a sweeping national mandate for specific conservative legislation. On MSNBC's "Morning Joe" last week, de Blasio said, "I obviously disagree with Newt Gingrich on many things. But in 1994, he put forward the Contract with America. It had a crystallizing effect for his party and for conservatives. It was a clear, sharp set of ideas about how to change America—in my view, in the wrong direction. But as an organizational tool it was very effective."

That depends on your definition of "effective." The 1994 Contract was very effective in getting attention from the press. It was very effective in making Newt Gingrich famous. It was effective at setting the legislative agenda of Congress. It was kind of effective at getting legislation passed. It was kind of effective at making conservatives happy. It was not effective in electing Bob Dole president in 1996. And it was definitely not effective at solving many of the long-term social trends it was supposed to address.

De Blasio (and maybe Gingrich, too) might hope we don't go back and look at what the Contract with America actually proposed, because a lot of it is awful. Sometimes sifting through newspaper archives from just 20 years ago feels like you're stumbling through the remnants of an ancient barbaric civilization. What was wrong with you people? In the primitive writings of these strange humans (Americans in the '90s) we can find many lessons for today's progressive mayor of New York.

De Blasio suggests that "on the ground" it's clear there's a popular movement toward more progressive policies, a demand Washington address income inequality. There's a lot of evidence to suggest that's true. And that's what makes the comparison to the 1994 Contract a little uncomfortable. The Contract with America was designed to include only issues that had the support of 60 percent of the public—it was supposed to be a unifying agenda of things Americans with good common horse sense agreed on. Today, that good common horse sense looks dumb.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Contract with America had ten planks, and Republicans promised to vote on all ten in their first 100 days in office. The Personal Responsibility Act had many measures for reforming welfare, but the one clearly designed to capture the public's attention was the one that would punish poor teen girls for having sex: Women who had kids before they turned 18 would have been banned from welfare for life. Here's how the Heritage Foundation approvingly analyzed the political calculation of the Contract in 1995:

The items in the Contract were carefully selected in terms of issues that were of fundamental policy importance but also were "doable," that could be accomplished rather quickly because of the broad support they engendered.

The Personal Responsibility Act of the Contract sought to fundamentally revamp the role of the state in welfare policy by developing policies to reduce teenage pregnancies and illegitimate births by prohibiting aid to mothers under 18 who give birth out of wedlock and requiring them to name the fathers of their children, who would be held accountable for their actions. Such women would be required to live at home to receive any aid and would not get housing subsidies to set up their own apartments. The Act also required that aid be cut off if recipients did not work.

As if a teen would ever tell her boyfriend, "You are a good boyfriend who is sexually attractive and also nice. However, we cannot have sexual intercourse because if I were to get pregnant, I would not be eligible for government assistance in raising the child." Teen pregnancy did drop steadily in the '90s and the decades after. But it was not because of the Contract with America (the above provision never became law). It was because of sex education and greater birth control options. It turns out that shaming poor women for having sex works less well than low-cost long-term contraceptives.

Another major plank of the Contract with America is especially relevant right now: The Taking Back Our Streets Act. The legislation is kind of an All-Time Worst Hits of Law Enforcement, as it called for longer prison sentences and more prisons. States that could prove felons served at least 85 percent of their sentences would get more money. It would be harder to appeal a death sentence, and easier to admit evidence collected unconstitutionally in criminal prosecutions.

Again, these ideas were very popular at the time. The Washington Post noted on October 11, 1994, that "virtually all polls [are] showing that crime has replaced the economy as the top public concern." ("What is so wrong with giving the public what it wants, just for once?" GOP pollster Frank Luntz, who worked for Gingrich, said in the same Post story.) Then-President Bill Clinton had passed a 1994 crime bill; in 1995, the new Republican majority tried to make it tougher. In August 1995, Florida Rep. Bill McCollum of Florida told The New York Times, "If you can get these violent criminals to serve more time, you will inevitably reduce the violent crime rate... Anyone who is locked up will not commit a crime."

This turned out to be very bad analysis. Crime had peaked in 1991, and, as the Brennan Center's Inimai M. Chettiar wrote in The Atlantic in February, it was not because of the prison boom. Only about 5 percent of the drop in crime is attributable to increased incarceration, and the "growth of incarceration had no observable effect on violent crime in the 1990s or 2000s." Clinton has renounced his own crime bill: "We have too many people in prison."

So we are somewhat lucky, because the Contract with America failed to produce much new crime law, aside from making death penalty appeals more difficult. Despite all the polling on crime and the buzz about Gingrich, Republican changes to Clinton's crime bill faltered amid congressional bickering over funding for more police officers. Other parts of the 1994 Contract have been largely abandoned, or addressed inside baseball stuff about how Congress works, like term limits for members of Congress and rules about seniority on congressional committees.

Did conservatives get what they wanted out of the Contract? Not really. Edward H. Crane wrote in Forbes in November 2000:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There will always be a party that believes the coercive mechanisms of the state are the appropriate means for ordering societal affairs. The Democrats fill this role by instinct. But these days it appears the GOP has grown into it.

Consider: Over the past three years the Republican-controlled Congress has approved discretionary spending that exceeded Bill Clinton's requests by more than $30 billion. The party that in 1994 would abolish the Department of Education now brags in response to Clinton's 2000 State of the Union Address that it is outspending the White House when it comes to education. My colleagues Stephen Moore and Stephen Slivinski found that the combined budgets of the 95 major programs that the Contract with America promised to eliminate have increased by 13%.

The obvious point is the popular thing is not always the right thing. De Blasio is responding to years of middle class wage stagnation and a widening wealth gap. And he's got great enemies—last week The Wall Street Journal noted that society types are annoyed de Blasio's wife won't go to fancy socialite charity galas. (A publicist told the Journal, "They have made themselves socially irrelevant. It is a major shortcoming not to mingle with all classes.") What could possibly go wrong? Well, Gingrich and his fellow Republicans were also responding to troubling long-term social trends with popular proposals to punish the bad guys; it's not as if they called for 1.5 million black men to go "missing" due to early death or prison. Critics of de Blasio and other progressives say they are cynically trying to whip up a pitchfork-wielding mob, and their populist policies could have unintended consequences while failing to address the problems they're designed to solve. Imitating Newt won't dispel that.

The only thing the Contract has a rock-solid record on is the publicity it brought its author. Gingrich, naturally, is relishing the attention de Blasio's Progressive Agenda has given him after a few years out of the spotlight. On Twitter, he offered to debate contracts with the mayor. On Facebook, he said in a short video, "I look forward to debating him, and I think it's very important to recognize the original Contract with America had big ideas that were real, backed up by real legislation, that led to real change." Gingrich even wrote an op-ed in the New York Post, offering "advice" for de Blasio: "I'm flattered, Mr. Mayor. But allow me to offer a few cautionary thoughts. ... It's impossible for Mayor de Blasio to create a document in the mold of the Contract with America—ideas supported by large majorities of Americans—if it is based on far-left ideas."

On this count, the liberal Contract with America is clearly working for him. According to Topsy, de Blasio got a surge of mentions on Twitter after news broke of his Progressive Agenda. He appeared on MSNBC, his plan was discussed on NPR, and it got a "SIREN!" headline from Politico's Mike Allen. If that's what de Blasio wants for himself, following Gingrich's path is a fantastic idea. If he wants to lessen income inequality or pass laws or satisfy progressives or just generally make America a better place, he should try something else.

The Aggressive, Sometimes Bizarre Progressive Campaign Against Obama's Trade Agenda // BuzzFeed // Evan McMorris-Santoro - May 12, 2015

Behind the scenes, the tension is even higher: Progressive trade opponents have followed a pro-trade Democrat home to his house, sent anonymous emails to Hill staffers some thought came from the administration, leveraged political money in a way that's upset even their allies and suggested trade deals like the one favored by the president were among the causes of the civil unrest in Ferguson, Missouri.

The White House and its allies have been very aggressive, too. But the administration side of this fight is well-documented — partially because the toughest attacks on the left have come from the man with the loudest voice in the country: Obama, who recently flew to Oregon to attack progressive trade critics in a high-profile speech from Nike's global headquarters (a move unpopular with his critics: "I was appalled the president would go to Nike," said Larry Cohen, president of the Communications Workers of America). Obama is now openly sparring with Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

Those White House allies argue, however, that they are not alone here. The progressives, they say, have essentially gotten away with their incendiary tactics against the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the proposed Asian trade deal, and the fast-track authority that would limit Congress to simple up-or-down votes on trade deals.

An often-cited example is the treatment of Sen. Ron Wyden. The Oregon Democrat has been a long-time progressive on many issues, most notably his ongoing attacks on the administration's domestic use of bulk surveillance. But he supports Obama on trade. And since he said that, the left has gone after Wyden hard. Protesters have taken their efforts to Wyden's house in southeast Oregon, his family home in New York City, and the bookstore owned by his wife there, The Strand. The groups were small — never approaching a dozen people, according to someone familiar with them — but protesting a politician at his home did not impress even Obama's trade opponents back in Washington.

"I wouldn't pick that tactic, honestly. I do think that in democracy, people have a right to do things, but that wouldn't have been a tactic we would have suggested," Cohen said. "On the other hand, the president going to Nike? And giving the speech that he gave? … Ron Wyden and his connections to Nike is a lot more troublesome to me than the fact that some people may have gone overboard at his house. I mean, they didn't go overboard, but even showing up there. I don't think that that's a tactic that's going to build broad-based support."

For his part, Wyden hasn't publicly said the protests bothered him. But many of his and Obama's allies point to them when complaining about the progressive attacks.

"I have stood shoulder-to-shoulder with activists over and over again to push our government in a more progressive direction and stand up for Americans' rights, so I welcome their work to have their voices heard, even when we don't agree," Wyden told BuzzFeed News in a statement provided by his Senate office.

Wyden said the protesters' cause is already included in the current trade debate, a point Obama has tried to argue in his public statements lately.

"When it comes to trade, Activists have made valid points about the secrecy of trade agreements and a lack of enforcement, among other things," he said. "That's one of the reasons the president and I pushed so hard to ensure today's trade agreements are very different from those of the 1990s."

Cohen himself has upset pro-trade Democrats with his often impassioned rhetoric on the president's trade plans. Back in January, he drew a line between the '90s trade deals, the decline of Detroit, and the unrest in Ferguson, Missouri.

"Every one of our members in Detroit, high-tech or low-tech, know that the trade policies that devastated Detroit devastate their lives also — that they can't get a raise when people don't have a job," Cohen said at a Capitol Hill press conference with prominent trade opponents. "Our members in St. Louis and Ferguson know that the root causes of Ferguson lie in the shutdowns in St. Louis. And so we connect the dots in this coalition and with these members of Congress."

At the time, the comment drew little press scrutiny, but it got the attention of trade-supporting Democrats. "Obama administration officials were 'taken aback' by the level of rhetoric from Thursday's anti-fast track press conference," read a tiny item buried in a Jan. 9 Politico newsletter. The claim that trade policy can adversely affect communities of color pre-dates the Ferguson unrest. A policy brief on the CWA website, "TPA A Worry For Communities Of Color," made the case that fast track could hurt black workers in June 2014.

Months later, though, Cohen's argument that the "root causes" of Ferguson were in trade is still is angering pro-trade Democrats, who cast the comment as over-the-line at best, and illustrative of the progressive attacks.

Cohen doesn't think much of the controversy.

"I think the right [connection to trade] to make is Ferguson as a part of St. Louis, not Ferguson itself," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The president himself said that the loss of all the factory jobs in Baltimore is directly related to this. That's a quote from the president. He just doesn't tie it to trade."

Hilary Shelton, a St. Louis native and senior official at the NAACP, said the Ferguson comment was "just a little bit hyperbolic," but said his group also worries about the potential for trade policy to adversely affect communities of color.

Labor's full court press on trade has upset even their political allies. A freeze on all political spending by the AFL-CIO announced in March wasn't supported by all the unions in the labor confederation, and Democratic allies on the Hill say the move was a step to far.

"I think it was unnecessary, I don't think the labor unions needed to make that kind of nuclear threat to their friends. And we are their friends," said Rep. G. K. Butterfield, chair of the Congressional Black Caucus and a no vote on fast track. "It rises to the level of a nuclear threat and I think some of them have had second thoughts about making that statement."

Elsewhere in Washington, other antics have grated on the Democrats backing Obama. Public Citizen, the progressive activist group originally founded by but now longer officially associated with Ralph Nader, has been at the center of generating progressive talking points, opposition research, op-eds and other material often cited by lawmakers opposed to the trade deals. The group also has a 16 foot-tall horse-shaped parade float labeled "Trojan Horse Trade Agreement." In February, the group combined those two ideas into an email lobbying campaign that pro-trade Democrats labeled downright odd, and embarrassing for the TPP-opponents side.

On the Friday before Valentine's Day, an email from "michaelfromanustr@gmail.com " landed in the inbox of dozens of trade-focused Democratic legislative assistants across Capitol Hill. Michael Froman is the U.S. Trade Representative, Obama's top negotiator on the TPP trade deal, and if not the progressive enemy number one, probably somewhere between two and four. The email had no signature and directed to readers to an anonymous website, fromantics.com , which consisted of "Mike" begging forgiveness for having "not been faithful in this relationship."

Dearest Member of Congress,

Will you be my Valentine? If I have betrayed your trust, I am sorry that you feel that way. I've been so focused on convincing you to take the Fast Track trip with me and buy those trade deals I love, I've said some things that, in retrospect, were not true. :(Will you give me another chance? Will it help if I come clean with a little Valentine's Day poem for you and some sweet nothings on a special website just for you?

Neither the website or the email listed Public Citizen.

"There was lot of confusion at first about, 'Where did this come from?'" recalled one senior pro-trade Democratic Hill staffer. They asked the USTR, "Are you guys sending us candygrams right now?"

The anonymous email with the USTR-focused valentines was odd, the staffer said. "This falls in the more outlandish category," the staffer said. "Usually you get a letter with 6,000 groups signed on to it or something."

Lori Wallach, the director of Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch and a veteran of the trade wars stretching back decades, was behind the email. Her name was on the domain registration of the Fromantics website too, though neither her name nor Public Citizen's was anywhere on the site itself. Wallach was happy to discuss it in detail in an interview, and laughed off congressional staff who may have been confused.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Staff at Public Citizen were actually worried no one would open their email, not that many people would and would then be fooled.

"We were thinking we would have to print out paper Valentine's and bring them to the individual offices because basically anyone with any internet sanitation protocols would not think that was from the USTR and as a result they would not open the dang link," she said.

It was not the first time Wallach had heard congressional staff were surprised by the email.

"With that email, it did not cross our minds that anyone would think it was from Mike Froman. But in retrospect, I guess next we do what we thought was not a very subtle joke, we'll have to actually specifically say, 'this is not from USTR Froman!'" she said. "It didn't seem subtle to us. I mean for one thing, if we wanted to hide it, we wouldn't have sent it from here. You can track it back to us."

In some ways, this political dynamic was expected: Obama's allies in Washington have said all along that passing trade deals with Republican support is traditionally the way trade deals are done, and that the sometimes awkward fight amongst Democrats was always an expected part of the trade push. But pro-trade Democrats have clearly been impressed by the way the left has rallied, and stayed rallied, against the Obama trade agenda. On the Hill, Obama's allies watched in dismay as the left started applying real pressure against fast track while the White House focused its defense on a strategy of what one ally called "Let's get people facts and information." That meant dry and policy-heavy briefings many members didn't attend. And it certainly did not mean anything like a 16-foot-tall horse.

Now that Obama has fully engaged, really calling on his base to trust him on trade and to believe that he's not going to send a trade deal to Congress that runs counter to the rest of his agenda, his allies are starting to get more confident that he's rallied enough Democratic support to get his trade agenda through. Pro-trade Democrats recently sent around an NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll showing growing support for trade among Democratic voters, including big jumps among Latino and black voters.

Progressives say they've done enough damage to keep fast-track authority from passing the House, certainly. They've definitely quieted many Democrats when it comes to crossing them publicly: Democratic critics of progressive trade strategy contacted by BuzzFeed News generally preferred to stay off the record or speak without attribution about the groups that may prove to be valuable allies in future legislative fights.

Pro-trade Democrats say the progressives shot themselves in the foot with tactics and rhetoric — threats of primaries, an aggressive "you're with us or against us" mentality — that have turned many Democrats off.

"The sense is absolutely that the attacks cross the line," the pro-trade aide said. "It's frustrating to a lot of members when they really do want to get in the room and shape policy and make trade agreements more progressive."

Progressives say they don't mean to scare anybody off, and they're not trying to be in your face for in your face's sake. They just don't see room for wiggle room.

"This vote on fast-track and the TPP, it's not a close call. So if there is an issue where it's a sincere 'on the one hand, on the other hand' moment, then the kind of really pressured, pointed tactics and messages that apply for this campaign wouldn't be appropriate," Wallach said. "But in this instance, it's not a close call."

Lawmakers stuck in the middle of the fight between the White House and progressives don't see the heated rhetoric fading quickly from memories. Butterfield, the Congressional Black Caucus chair, has been lobbied by the president directly as well as all the progressive groups pushing to keep Democrats from standing with Obama on trade. For now, he's standing with the progressives. But he said the tactics of both sides have left a mark.

"The president feels very strongly about TPA and TPP. I haven't seen him this determined since the whole Affordable Care Act debate back in '09. He is fully invested in this debate, because he is convinced that he's right," he said. "This is not one of those issues that's a come and go issue. I've lived through and seen many of those, that seem kind of clenching but at the end of the day it passes over. But this is one of those that's going to be with us for a while. The proponents and opponents feel very strongly about their positions."

Sabotage! Will Bill Save Us from Hill? // PJ Media // Roger Simon - May 12, 2015

The more we read of the escapades or listen to the remarks of William Jefferson Clinton, the less it seems he wants his wife to be president. Even the court eunuchs at the Washington Post are starting to worry.

Now naturally, Bill cannot come out and say as much, not even to himself in the small hours of the morning. But the way he's behaving under fire — "I gotta pay our bills!" – does the talking for him.

As attractive as a Third Clinton Presidency may be in fantasy, I'd wager the reality of being First Man gives Bill Clinton the heebie-jeebies. What a crimp in his lifestyle — and that's not even the half of it.

Of course, that wasn't the agreement. Back when he humiliated Hillary in public, yet again, and to such an extraordinary degree, with that now middle-aged TED speaker "Miss Lewinsky," Hill didn't run off – like a "good feminist" or even a moderately self-respecting human being — into the welcoming arms of a celebrity divorce lawyer. Instead, she played the game, mouthing such howlers as blaming her husband's (serial) infidelity on the "great rightwing conspiracy." The deal was — I back you and you back me.... and back me... and... and... and...

But that was then and this is now, now being years into the Clinton post-presidency,a gaudy cocktail of goody-goody causes, multi-million dollar corporate shenanigans, various Hollywood star assignations (yes, I live here and there are rumors), not to mention myriad private jets of the 727 variety. (No namby-pamby Gulf Streams for our Bill. Power to the People! Right on!)

And of course there was and is the speechifying at 500K a pop and upwards. One wonders if at those rates he recycles old speeches (as most on the circuit do) or comes up with a new one for the occasion. If this is Tuesday, it must be Kazakhstan. (Who's the dictator in this joint and have you made your uranium deal already, Harry?)

Then there's the matter of Jeffrey Epstein, the king of teenage orgies, now once more on the loose. If Bill were in any way serious about a Hillary presidency he would have stayed on the far side of Pluto from that dude. What could he possibly see in Epstein? Intellectual stimulation? Perhaps a new reading of the Upanishads.

Now the drill is that this is all irrelevant. The mainstream media will not only cover for Bill and Hill as Bonnie and Clyde, as Peggy Noonan dubbed them in her column, they'd cover for them if they were Gilles de Rais and Elizabeth Báthory. And the American public is so anesthetized taking selfies while watching the Kardashians that the outcome of the election is nowhere near as important as when Bruce Jenner will make that final decision. Just keep the free goodies flowing.

Well, maybe.

But that's good and bad news for Bill. Can you imagine him sitting around the White House? I think he'd take ambassador to the Netherlands, if people wouldn't laugh. Amsterdam is his kind of town and it's only an hour from the Hague. And then there's always a possible posting to Bangkok….

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But he can't do it. He's trapped. And trapped, And trapped…. and he knows it. Poor Bill, a prisoner of his own making. And he doesn't even get to give the orders. She does that.

And that's the unfortunate part. Much as we hate to admit it, even the most right wing of us would prefer Bill to Hillary. But that's who were stuck with now.

Keep your fingers crossed that Bill will finally step over the line and sabotage her. He may be our only hope. Don't just sit there. Encourage him!

The Center-Right Moment // New York Times // David Brooks - May 12, 2015

The most surprising event of this political era is what hasn't happened. The world has not turned left. Given the financial crisis, widening inequality, the unpopularity of the right's stances on social issues and immigration, you would have thought that progressive parties would be cruising from win to win.

But, instead, right-leaning parties are doing well. In the United States, Republicans control both houses of Congress. In Israel, the Likud Party led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu pulled off a surprising win in an election that was at least partly about economic policy. In Britain, the Conservative Party led by Prime Minister David Cameron won a parliamentary majority.

What's going on here?

Well, there are some issues in each election specific to that country, but there are a few broader trends to be observed. The first is that the cutting-edge, progressive economic arguments do not seem to be swaying voters.

Over the past few years, left-of-center economic policy has moved from opportunity progressivism to redistributionist progressivism. Opportunity progressivism is associated with Bill Clinton and Tony Blair in the 1990s and Mayor Rahm Emanuel of Chicago today. This tendency actively uses government power to give people access to markets, through support for community colleges, infrastructure and training programs and the like, but it doesn't interfere that much in the market and hesitates before raising taxes.

This tendency has been politically successful. Clinton and Blair had long terms. This year, Emanuel won by 12 percentage points against the more progressive candidate, Chuy Garcia, even in a city with a disproportionate number of union households.

Redistributionist progressivism more aggressively raises taxes to shift money down the income scale, opposes trade treaties and meddles more in the marketplace. This tendency has won elections in Massachusetts (Elizabeth Warren) and New York City (Bill de Blasio) but not in many other places. Ed Balls, the No. 2 figure in the Labour Party in Britain, co-led the group from the Center for American Progress that wrote the most influential statement of modern progressivism, a report on “inclusive prosperity.” Balls could not even retain his own parliamentary seat in the last election.

The conservative victories probably have more to do with the public’s skepticism about the left than with any positive enthusiasm toward the right. Still, there are a few things center-right parties have done successfully.

First, they have loudly (and sometimes offensively) championed national identity. In this era of globalization, voters are rewarding candidates who believe in their country’s exceptionalism.

Second, they have been basically sensible on fiscal policy. After the financial crisis, there was a big debate over how much governments should go into debt to stimulate growth. The two nations most associated with the “austerity” school — those who were suspicious of debt-based stimulus — were Germany and Britain. This will not settle the debate, but these two nations now have some of the strongest economies in Europe and their political leaders are in good shape.

Third, these leaders did not overread their mandate. Cameron in Britain promised to cut the size of government, and he did, from 45.7 percent of G.D.P. in 2010 to 40.7 percent today, according to The Economist. The number of public-sector jobs there has gone down by 1 million.

But he made these cuts without going overboard. Public satisfaction with government services has gone up. And there have been some sensible efforts to boost those at the bottom. As The Economist pointed out, “The richest 10 percent have borne the greatest burden of extra taxes. Full-time workers earning the minimum wage pay a third as much income tax as in 2010. Overall, inequality has not widened — in contrast to America.”

The British electorate and the American electorate sometimes mirror each other. Trans-Atlantic voters went for Reagan and Thatcher together and Clinton and Blair together. In policy terms, Cameron is a more conservative version of President Obama.

Cameron’s win suggests the kind of candidate that would probably do well in a general election in this country. He is liberal on social policy, green on global warming and pragmatically conservative on economic policy. If he’s faulted for anything, it is for not being particularly ideological, though he has let his ministers try some pretty bold institutional reforms to modernize the welfare state.

Globally, voters are disillusioned with large public institutions. They seem to want to reassert local control and their own particular nationalism (Scottish or anything else). But they also seem to want a slightly smaller public sector, strong welfare state reform and more open and vibrant labor markets as a path to prosperity.

For some reason, American politicians are fleeing from this profile, Hillary Clinton to the further left and Republicans to the right.

A Million Missing Black Voters // The Atlantic // David A. Graham - May 12, 2015

Quick, what are the most racially charged elements of voting? There is a familiar roster of complaints: felon disenfranchisement, which, given the racial disparities in the justice system, disproportionately affects minorities. Voter-ID laws and other restrictions on voting hours. Gerrymandering, which concentrates minority voters into districts.

But what about mortality rates? It’s not something that enters the political discussion much, but a new paper,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Black lives matter: Differential mortality and the racial composition of the U.S. electorate, 1970-2004," argues that the racial gap in mortality rates could have a major impact on national politics.

The premise of the paper, by researchers at Mathematica Policy Research, the University of Michigan, Stanford, and Oxford, is simple: Unless you live in Chicago, you can't vote when you're dead. Since overall black health outcomes are worse than white ones, and life expectancies are lower for black Americans, that must have an effect on the results of elections. The team crunched the numbers from 1970 to 2004 and calculated "excess deaths" among African Americans:

The total number of black deaths would have been reduced from 8.5 million to 5.8 million if blacks faced the same mortality schedules as whites. Thus, 1 out of every 3 black deaths occurring within this time period was an excess death.

Of the 2.7 million black excess deaths, we project a total of 1.87 million hypothetical survivors to 2004, 1.74 million of voting age, about 1 million of whom would have been voters.

For comparison's sake, and to see how significant that is, 1 million is also the number of African Americans who have served time but remain disenfranchised, according to a 2010 analysis.

What effect would that have on elections? The researchers assumed those 1 million extra voters would have behaved similarly to the surviving black population in terms of both turnout and partisanship, controlling for gender, age, and geography. Their votes wouldn't have changed the outcome of the 2004 presidential election between George W. Bush and John Kerry—although Kerry would have netted more than 86 percent of the votes they cast. (As Andrew Prokop notes, but the authors do not, the 2000 election was close enough that the missing black voters would likely have swung the outcome in Florida and, with it, the national electoral vote.)

Black Turnout Matters

But it would have helped Democrats beat Republicans in seven close Senate elections and 11 close gubernatorial elections between 1970 and 2004. That would have handed Democrats continuous control of the Senate between 1986 and 2002—a pretty large impact.

One of the interesting things here is who the missing voters are. Although media attention has rightly focused on the deaths of young black men like Freddie Gray, the big difference in mortality has nothing to do with violent deaths from street violence, police brutality, or drugs. "In fact, the predominant and persistent driving force behind US black/white mortality disparities is the unequal distribution of chronic morbidity among young through middle aged adults," the paper notes:

Age of Death by Race

The 40-65 range highlighted in the graph above also happens to match up with the peak age of voting. (Naturally, the longer someone lives, the more opportunities they have to vote.)

There's a public-policy catch-22 at work here. The authors note that there is a range of factors that help determine racial disparities in mortality. Residential segregation and lower levels of public investment in black neighborhoods reduce lifespans. Black neighborhoods tend to have greater exposure to pollution, are less pedestrian-friendly, have higher food costs, and see more tobacco and alcohol marketing. Access to healthcare is also sharply divided by race. In short, there is a range of problems that could be addressed by public policy. But altering public policy requires voting, and the present policies have combined to remove a chunk of the voting-age population that would otherwise have benefited from their repeal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, there's an element of parlor game in this study—you, too, can play along at home, as long as you've got access to the General Social Survey, exit polls, and Microsoft Excel. There are all sorts of ways to design a different electorate. What if the voting age returned to 21? Or what about differences in mortality rates based purely on socioeconomics? Better-educated and wealthier people tend to live long. What if mortality rates among (more conservative) poor southern white voters were the same as those for (more liberal) wealthy Manhattanites?

But black votes are a particularly interesting and important area of focus, both because of the long history of efforts to prevent or suppress black voting, and because of the partisan homogeneity of African Americans. Electoral impact isn't the only reason to worry about racial disparities in health outcomes, much less the best one, but the vicious public-policy cycle described here makes a compelling case that mortality rates deserve more attention in conversations about race and voting.

Hillary 'Rewrites' the Economic Debate // Huffington Post // Richard Brodsky – May 12, 2015

One reason Hillary Clinton is a formidable politician is that she's very smart and very comfortable with ideas. Another reason is an uncanny ability to ignore the past, and its mistakes.

Both assets are now on display in the highly public effort by economist Joseph Stiglitz to "rewrite" the economic policies of the past 35 years, all in the name of reducing income inequality and revitalizing an economy that works for everyone.

Stiglitz is even smarter than Hillary. His particular ability is to fashion concrete policies that embody a more wishful and emotional sense that the American middle class is eroding. Even Republicans agree we have a problem. But there's been little out there other than tax the one percent and spend more on infrastructure and jobs.

The Stiglitz agenda has plenty of that, but it's got a whole bunch of interesting specifics that will extend the debate and put Hillary at the center of it.

New slogans abound. An end to "short-termism". That turns into policies that discourage rapid buying and selling of stocks, or corporate stock buybacks rather than expansionary investment. A much tougher take on finance and banking maneuvers as hurtful to free markets. Hmmmm.

"Pre-distribution" rather than "redistribution". Ending tax preferences that benefit the one percent, but do nothing for most working families. Also, hmmm.

The specifics are intriguing and worth a healthy debate. It's been more difficult than thought to put meat on the economic bones of a progressive agenda. Now, as Portnoy said, we can begin.

Sitglitz also goes head on into the interesting criticism that he and the Clintons were part of the failure of economic thought over the last 35 years. Sitglitz was Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers during Clinton I. Hillary was around too, I think.

Never mind. "I was there when some of the decisions were made, and some of them were made in good faith," Mr. Stiglitz said. "But, here we are, and let's not point fingers."

That kind of amnesia is fine, but ought not to be selective. (Imagine what happens when Jeb Bush revisits the Iraq

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

War decision. Wait, he just did and is getting roasted.)

Hillary could pull this off. Austerity economics have failed miserable all over the world and in the U.S. There's been no competing set of ideas. Now there is. They will be tested intellectually and politically, as they should. But, if they make as much sense as they seem to make on first impression, she can end her Elizabeth Warren/Bernie Sanders problem and then smack the Republicans over the head for the next 18 months.

This is why it's a mistake to underestimate Hillary. And it may be reason to hope for an end to 35 years of economic policies that have created concentrated wealth and power in ways that are truly un-American.

Mitt Romney to hit Hillary Clinton on jobs (WaPo)

By Jose A. DelReal

January 28, 2015

The Washington Post

Former GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney on Wednesday will lodge some of his sharpest attacks yet against likely Democratic candidate Hillary Clinton.

His comments, which come as speculation over a third Romney White House bid grows, suggest a strong push to orient his next campaign around economic issues facing the poor and to tie Clinton to the Obama administration's economic policies.

"Short term, our economy is looking up. But it is a lot better for the few, and pretty darn discouraging for the many," Romney will say in a speech at Mississippi State University Wednesday, according to a copy of his prepared remarks. "How can Secretary Clinton provide opportunity for all if she doesn't know where jobs come from in the first place?

Romney's comments appear to reference a Clinton stump speech from October, in which the former secretary of state dismissed "trickle-down" economic theory.

"Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs. You know that old theory, trickle-down economics. That has been tried. That has failed," Clinton said in a speech in October.

Critics seized upon her comments to paint her as anti-business and her team later said that she had intended to make a comment about tax cuts for corporations. Critics pointed to the botched line as evidence that Clinton would run into trouble appealing to the growing populists voices in her party.

This isn't the first time Romney has gone after Clinton on middle class issues. Earlier Wednesday, Romney's team criticized Clinton's "lifestyle of the rich and famous" in an effort to downplay the extent to which his own wealth may factor into another White House run.

"It's going to be hard for Hillary Clinton to make Mitt Romney's wealth a fruitful line of attack, with her multi-million dollar mansions in Georgetown and Chappaqua and her jet-setting lifestyle of the rich and famous," a Romney aide told the Boston Globe.

On Wednesday, Romney will also hit Clinton on her tenure as secretary of state, experience which Clinton touted in her most recent book, Hard Choices," and which will likely become a linchpin in her rationale for her White House run.

"Secretary of State Hillary Clinton cluelessly pressed a reset button for Russia, which smiled and then invaded Ukraine, a sovereign nation. The Middle East and much of North Africa is in chaos," Romney is expected to say. "Doesn't the President understand that some of what we are seeing in the world is in part the result of his timid foreign policy. … Strong American leadership is desperately needed for the world, and for America."

Romney aims at Clinton, Obama in Mississippi speech (USAT)

By Catalina Camia

January 28, 2015

USA Today

Mitt Romney plans to swing at possible rival Hillary Rodham Clinton and President Obama when he speaks Wednesday night at Mississippi State University.

The once-and-possibly-future presidential candidate will criticize Clinton and Obama on foreign policy, and jab at the former secretary of State on economics. In one line, Romney will make reference to remarks on job creation that Clinton had to clarify during the 2014 midterm elections.

“How can Secretary Clinton provide opportunity for all if she doesn’t know where jobs come from in the first place?” Romney will say, according to excerpts provided to USA TODAY. “We need a president who will do what it takes to bring more good paying jobs to the placement offices of our college campuses.”

At a campaign event in Massachusetts, Clinton suggested corporations and businesses don’t create jobs when making a point about the impact of trickle-down economics. She later said she “shorthanded” her point and was not clear in denouncing tax breaks for corporations that outsource jobs or stash their profits overseas.

The speech at Mississippi State University is only Romney’s third public appearance since the 2012 GOP presidential nominee told donors that he’s seriously considering a 2016 campaign for the White House. In the excerpts, Romney touches on foreign policy, economic opportunity and poverty — the topics he says that have concerned him the most since his 2012 campaign.

On foreign policy, Romney plans to hit Clinton on tense relations with the government in Moscow and say she “cluelessly pressed a reset button for Russia, which smiled and then invaded Ukraine, a sovereign nation.”

As he did in the 2012 campaign, Romney will charge that Obama has mishandled a wide range of threats in the Middle East. He’ll also criticize Obama for misreading the danger of terrorist groups such as the Islamic State, also known as ISIS.

“The president’s dismissal of real global threats in his State of the Union Address was naive at best and deceptive at worst,” Romney will. “ISIS represents a new level of threat, given its oil revenues, vast territory and ability to recruit even in the West. I don’t know how the president expects to defeat the jihadists if he won’t even call them what they are.”

Romney also plans to make the case that a new set of policies are needed to help end “chronic generational poverty” as a way to help people who find themselves in a cycle that goes from one era to the next.

“It’s finally time to apply conservative principles that improve America’s education system, promote family formation and create good-paying jobs," he will say, according to his speech excerpts.

Romney speaks at 7 p.m. ET as part of Mississippi State's global lecture series. He also plans to take questions after the event.

Republicans Have Finally Found Their Answer to Hillary Clinton (VICE)

By Kevin Lincoln

January 28th, 2015

VICE

America, we have our Benghazi candidate. Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina endeared herself to the right wing by invoking that most beloved of conservative hobbyhorses, positioning herself as the GOP's response to the Democratic heir apparent.

"Like Hillary Clinton, I too have travelled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe. But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something. Mrs. Clinton, flying is an activity, not an accomplishment," Fiorina told activists at the Iowa Freedom Summit Saturday. "I have met Vladimir Putin and know that it will take more to halt his ambitions than a gimmicky red Reset button," she boasted. "I know Bibi Netanyahu and know that when he warns us, over and over and over again, that Iran is a danger to this nation as well as to his own, that we must listen."

And then the kicker: "Unlike Hillary Clinton, I know what difference it makes that our ambassador to Libya and three other brave Americans were killed in a deliberate terrorist attack on the anniversary of 9/11 and that the response of our nation must be more forceful that the arrest of a single individual a year later."

It was a ballsy move for a potential candidate whose name is so far down the list of Republican 2016 favorites that most voters don't even know who she is, much less that she's thinking about running for president. But it worked: In a party desperate for female faces, Fiorina might be the Mitt Romney–Hillary Clinton hybrid conservatives have been waiting for.

Fiorina's origin story is a good one: Stanford-educated wanderer who ends up working as a secretary, then, with a little hard work and ingenuity, ascends the corporate ladder to take over Hewlett Packard in 1999, becoming the first woman in history to run a Fortune 20 company—a glass-ceiling milestone Time magazine described as "arguably more important" than "America's women winning the soccer World Cup." The parallels to Clinton and her own glass-ceiling-breaking are obvious—they even picked matching memoir titles.

But for Fiorina, unlike Clinton, the summit proved harder than the climb. Her career at HP was mired in corporate soap operas, during which time the company's stock lost more than 50 percent of its value and thousands of employees lost their jobs. Fiorina, meanwhile, became a CEO celebrity and an outspoken cheerleader for outsourcing, developing a reputation as an autocratic manager and generally terrible boss. She was eventually forced out in 2005, leaving HP with a $21 million golden parachute and an unenviable legacy. (InfoWorld listed Fiorina as one of "Tech's All-Time Top 25 Flops," calling her the "anti-Steve Jobs.")

Five years after being ousted, Fiorina attempted a comeback, running for Senate in California against veteran Democratic incumbent Barbara Boxer. This initial foray into electoral politics was a disaster, highlighted by what's known as the "Demon Sheep Ad," a breathtaking piece of incoherence that compared Fiorina's primary opponent to a demonic sheep. It's one of the worst/best political advertisements of all time, and it put Fiorina on national radar, at least until Boxer obliterated her in the statewide election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If Fiorina does decide to run for president, this is the record she will have to spin for voters: a controversial career as a real-life Bill Lumbergh, and a Senate campaign that reached its zenith by dressing a man up as a farm animal. But judging by her speech in Iowa and the elated response from right-wing activists, the idea of a Carly 2016 campaign may not be quite as ludicrous as it sounds.

Conservatives have always fantasized that the president is just "America's CEO," and Fiorina, despite her very mixed record as a business executive, seems to fill that role, at least for the kinds of people who show up at the Iowa Freedom Summit, a right-wing circus that exists mostly for the economic benefit of the state's Tea Party cottage industry. In addition to her Benghazi drum-beating, she staked out territory as a fervent opponent of abortion—"liberals believe that flies are worth protecting," she told the audience, "but that the life of an unborn child is not"—and a free-market conservative. Recently, she even went so far as to write an op-ed for the Washington Post defending corporate victims like Royal Dutch Shell, the 11th-biggest company in the world, against Greenpeace's "climate-change pressure campaigns."

The truth is, Republican voters have fallen for a lot worse. Herman Cain, for example. Or Fred Thompson. In time, Fiorina will almost certainly meet the same fate as these other Republican one-night-stands. But as the only potential female candidate in a vast sea of old, mostly white men, she's uniquely positioned to bash Hillary Clinton from the right—a priceless trump card that could give this Benghazi lemon more juice than anyone imagined.

An unnoticed part of Hillary Clinton's record -- her work for foster kids (PennLive.com)

By Ann F. Lewis

January 28, 2015

PennLive.com

What do Hillary Clinton, former Republican Whip Tom DeLay, and the founder of Wendy's have in common?

Hint: It isn't politics. This unusual coalition worked together to make a better life for children in orphanages and foster care; work that has made a real difference for tens of thousands of young people.

Orphans and foster care children are not exactly a high-powered political group in Washington.

There were no lobbyists calling on their behalf, no one demanding Hillary take this on. I was working in the White House at the time, so I got to watch up close – but otherwise I might never have known!

So why did she do it? Because Hillary believed it was the right thing to do.

From working at the Children's Defense Fund right after law school to her efforts to expand early learning for children today, Hillary Clinton has worked throughout her adult life – in and out of public office – to improve the lives of children. Her work on behalf of orphans and foster care children is not an exception, but an important example.

Orphans and foster care children are not exactly a high-powered political group in Washington.

As First Lady, Hillary made adoption and foster care one of her priorities. She worked across the partisan aisle, with two unlikely partners: former Republican Minority Whip Tom Delay of Texas and business leader Dave Thomas of Wendy's, a lifelong Republican.

Together, they held events at the White House to raise awareness, and built support for legislation that would encourage adoptions, provide more aid for foster families, and help foster children find permanent, safe, loving homes.

The first piece of legislation was the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997, which provided support and services for adoptive families, and increased foster adoptions by 64 percent by 2002.

It's no wonder the Washington Post called the law "the most significant change in federal child-protection policy in almost two decades."

The second piece of legislation, the Foster Care Independence Act of 1999, was focused on children who "age out" of the foster care system when they turn 18.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Too often, these children leave their foster home with only a green plastic bag of their belongings – and too little hope.

The purpose of this legislation was to make the transition easier for these kids and to give them, as President Clinton said, "the tools they need to make the most of their lives."

Access to healthcare, education, housing assistance, and counseling services are just some of the tools this law provided to give these kids the chance they deserve.

Hillary introduced legislation in the Senate to help interested adults learn more about adoption.

She was also a member of the Congressional Coalition on Adoption and partnered with Democrats and Republicans alike to remove barriers to adoption and support the adoption of children in foster care.

At the State Department, Secretary Clinton brought the issue to the world stage. She appointed the first ever special advisor on international children's issues and worked with other countries to improve foster care programs worldwide.

Adoption and foster care are not likely to be an issue in any political campaign. They aren't hot button issues or ones that gather big headlines; but they're important to Hillary Clinton.

That is what her life has been about: building coalitions, working with partners, doing whatever it takes to make a real difference on issues that make a real difference in people's lives –beginning with the very youngest among us.

That's the Hillary Clinton I know.

Yes, Michelle Obama Didn't Cover Her Hair In Saudi Arabia, But Neither Did Laura Bush Or Hillary Clinton (The Gloss)

By Samantha Escobar

January 28th, 2015

The Gloss

While visiting Saudi Arabia to pay respects to the late King Abdullah, the Obamas found themselves at the center of a scandal. Well, actually, it was first lady Michelle Obama–who is not an elected official–drawing the world's focused on as a result of her hair. Rather, the fact that her hair remained out and about while in Saudi Arabia, a country wherein women are expected to conceal their heads with scarves or other coverings.

The Associated Press explains:

Under the kingdom's strict dress code for women, Saudi females are required to wear a headscarf and loose, black robes in public. Most women in Saudi Arabia cover their hair and face with a veil known as the niqab. But covering one's head is not required for foreigners, and some Western women choose to forego the headscarf while in Saudi Arabia.

Numerous Saudi officials shook hands with President Barack Obama, and while some also shook hands with the first lady, many simply nodded her way. After photos began surfacing that showed her not wearing a scarf in Saudi Arabia, Twitter exploded, with many Arabic users picking a hashtag that roughly translates to "#MichelleObamaImmodesty." The tweets ranged from rage to disappointment to cheering, but some simply pointed out the most important issue here: Michelle Obama is not the first American political figure to go scarf-free in Saudi Arabia.

Yuuuup. Hillary Clinton, Laura Bush, Condoleeza Rice–they all skipped the headscarf. Oh, but it's totally disrespectful and un-American and practically the same as murdering puppies when Michelle Obama does it, right?

Yeahhhh, remember that whole thing? But I guess if he now makes paintings at the same level as a third grader, all is forgiven.

If a woman wants to wear a hijab, niqab, burqa, abaya, or other covering, she should be able to. She should not be critiqued or told she's "brainwashed" by American self-declared saviors who believe they are know better than she does what she should wear. Nothing good comes from telling women–or anyone, for that matter–what to wear or what not to wear. However, that goes both ways; focusing on what Michelle Obama did or didn't wear while visiting any country is only distracting from (yet simultaneously emphasizing) the stark contrast between how male and female bodies are treated all over the world, including in Saudi Arabia and the United States.

Romney to Slam Hillary Clinton on Foreign Policy, Economy (NBC News)

By Kelly O'Donnell and Carrie Dean

January 28, 2015

NBC News

Potential presidential candidate Mitt Romney will take explicit aim at possible rival Hillary Clinton on both economic and foreign policy issues in an address at Mississippi State University Wednesday night, according to excerpts from his prepared remarks.

And he appears ready to outline his case for another likely run for the president, declaring that "strong American leadership is desperately needed for the world, and for America."

"Secretary of State Hillary Clinton cluelessly pressed a reset button for Russia, which smiled and then invaded Ukraine, a sovereign nation," he will say, according to text provided to NBC News by aides. "The Middle East and much of North Africa is in chaos. China grows more assertive and builds a navy that will be larger than ours in five years. We shrink our nuclear capabilities as Russia upgrades theirs."

Romney, who lost the general election to President Barack Obama in 2012, will also paint the Republican Party as better equipped than Clinton's Democrats to address issues of income inequality and poverty.

"How can Secretary Clinton provide opportunity for all if she doesn't know where jobs come from in the first place?" he'll add.

The former Massachusetts governor, a onetime CEO with a highly-publicized net worth in the $250 million range, was painted by his Democratic foes in 2012 as out of touch with the problems of regular Americans.

His remarks at Mississippi State University appear squarely aimed at challenging that label - and at blunting the Obama administration's claims that the economic recovery has been successful.

"Short term, our economy is looking up," he'll say. "But it is a lot better for the few, and pretty darn discouraging for the many. Incomes haven't gone up in decades."

Hillary Clinton vs. Elizabeth Warren Could Be a Dream Match, for Republicans (NYT)

By Amy Chozick

January 28, 2015

The New York Times

They have called Senator Elizabeth Warren “an extremely attractive candidate” in the 2016 presidential campaign. They have said that she is the “hottest commodity” in the Democratic Party and that she has demonstrated the “passion and intensity” that Hillary Rodham Clinton lacks.

Those glowing compliments are not from the liberal activists who are trying to persuade Ms. Warren to challenge Mrs. Clinton, who is expected to be the party’s leading contender in 2016. They come from conservatives who are eager to drum up a contentious Democratic primary and who see Ms. Warren, a first-term senator from Massachusetts, as best positioned to weaken, and potentially defeat, Mrs. Clinton.

On cable television and in private strategy sessions, conservatives are steadily stoking the flames of a movement to recruit Ms. Warren, who has said she will not run but whose anti-Wall Street economic message resonates with the liberal base of the Democratic Party.

Among the Republicans who have been vying for a chance to, they assume, take on Hillary Rodham Clinton is Senator Rand Paul.G.O.P. Hopefuls Honing Attacks Against Hillary ClintonDEC. 13, 2014

“Please give us Elizabeth Warren. Please, God, let us have Elizabeth Warren,” said Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arkansas who is considering a presidential bid.

“I respect her because she has the courage to speak her convictions,” Mr. Huckabee said on Fox News.

Former Representative Michele Bachmann, a Tea Party Republican from Minnesota, told CNN that Ms. Warren would be “an extremely attractive candidate.” Mrs. Bachmann also said that if she were Mrs. Clinton, she would be “extremely concerned.”

The tactic says much about the 2016 landscape for Republicans. A crowded field of people who say they are considering running for president — including Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts — has emerged. That means the party is expecting a bruising ideological battle for the nomination.

Mrs. Clinton, a former secretary of state and 2008 presidential candidate, could emerge from the primary season relatively unscathed. Other Democrats — including Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, former Gov. Martin O’Malley of Maryland and Senator Bernard Sanders, independent of Vermont — may also run, but at this early stage none is expected to have the funding or political apparatus to pose a serious threat to Mrs. Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An easy path to the nomination would allow Mrs. Clinton to potentially enter a general election with more funding than the Republican nominee, who would have had to spend heavily to beat a wide field of competitors. Ms. Warren represents Republicans' best hope for an expensive, prolonged battle for the Democratic nomination, weakening Mrs. Clinton along the way, political operatives on both sides say.

That desire appears to trump the fact that Ms. Warren's views about taxation, regulation and the role of government are so at odds with Republican tenets. "There is nobody in this country who got rich on his own," she famously said in 2011.

Ms. Warren told Fortune magazine this month that she would not run to succeed President Obama, but that has not stopped speculation.

"Elizabeth Warren says, 'I'm not running, I don't want to be president,' " the radio host Rush Limbaugh said recently. "Translation: 'I can't wait and I am running. But I'm just not going to admit it right now.' "

Republicans said Ms. Warren would deliver a perfect "trifecta" in diminishing Mrs. Clinton. She attracts young, liberal supporters who view Mrs. Clinton as too centrist. A Warren candidacy would take away a central theme expected of Mrs. Clinton's campaign — that it is time to elect a female president. And Ms. Warren's presence in the primary season could push Mrs. Clinton to adopt liberal positions that might turn off independents in a general election.

It first became apparent that Ms. Warren could be an effective tool in moving Mrs. Clinton off message when the two appeared at a joint rally in October for Martha Coakley, the Democratic nominee for governor of Massachusetts.

In her speech, Mrs. Clinton tried to channel some of Ms. Warren's populist zeal, but flubbed a variation of the senator's controversial line about the roots of success. "Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs," Mrs. Clinton said.

She later said she had misspoken and was referring to certain tax policies that stifle job creation, but Republicans had already pounced, portraying the comment as evidence that Mrs. Clinton was pandering to liberal voters.

"You could just see it gets in Secretary Clinton's head when she has to compare herself vis-à-vis Senator Warren," said Tim Miller, executive director of America Rising, a conservative "super PAC." He added, "From that perspective, a food fight could be good."

R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr., editor in chief of The American Spectator and a longtime critic of Mrs. Clinton and her husband, said her comment in Massachusetts could help inform younger voters about how she shifts opinions based on what is popular. "She pulled a line from Obama and Elizabeth Warren to try to make a very au courant crony-capitalist or socialist statement," Mr. Tyrrell said.

At the same time, a groundswell of support for Ms. Warren among liberal activists has aided Republicans' behind-the-scenes efforts.

In December, the liberal group MoveOn.org said it would spend $1 million on a campaign to draft Ms. Warren into the 2016 race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Liberals cheered Ms. Warren this month after Antonio Weiss, a Wall Street banker whom Mr. Obama had picked as a Treasury Department official, eliciting vehement objections from Ms. Warren, asked Mr. Obama to rescind his nomination.

Ms. Warren is still largely unknown even in Iowa, where the draft-Warren movement has focused its efforts. In a poll of likely Democratic caucus goers conducted in early October by The Des Moines Register and Bloomberg Politics, 44 percent said they had a favorable opinion of the Massachusetts senator, compared with 76 percent for Mrs. Clinton.

While many Republicans are engaging in mischief as they promote Ms. Warren, some of her populist positions resonate across the political aisle. During debates over the Wall Street bailout, Ms. Warren and Representative Darrell Issa, Republican of California, often agreed on objections to parts of the Troubled Asset Relief Program and in their criticism of former Treasury Secretary Timothy F. Geithner.

“It was almost like the enemy of my enemy is my friend,” Kurt Bardella, a former spokesman for Mr. Issa, said. The tendency for Republicans to align with Ms. Warren is particularly strong among those who emphasize libertarianism.

Brian Darling, a senior aide to Mr. Paul, said he would like to see a 2016 general election between Ms. Warren and the Kentucky senator to hear the fresh ideas that the matchup might yield.

“She hates Wall Street for a very different reason than libertarians,” Mr. Darling said. “Yet they both would agree that the bailouts of Wall Street were a gaming of the system.”

Tucker Carlson, a libertarian political pundit, said Ms. Warren has an authenticity that resonates with both sides. “She has this spark of genuine ideological fervor, and I mean that as a compliment,” he said. “It’s not just pure opportunism.”

Ms. Warren, of course, has given the anti-Clinton movement plenty of fodder. She frequently says that income inequality is due, in part, to the economic and trade policies of President Bill Clinton. In her 2003 book, “The Two-Income Trap,” written with her daughter, Amelia Warren Tyagi, Ms. Warren accused Mrs. Clinton of snapping at her staff and of shifting her position on bankruptcy legislation when she became a New York senator in order to appease her Wall Street donors.

“As New York’s newest senator, however, it seems that Hillary Clinton could not afford such a principled position,” Ms. Warren wrote. Republicans could not have said it better themselves.

Romney home-building may clash with talk of income gap ; Costly projects began after last race ended (Boston Globe)
January 28, 2015

The Boston Globe

LA JOLLA, Calif. -- On a recent weekday, a half-dozen construction workers crowded onto a small plot of land in this pricey community, banging away on an 11,000-square-foot house with expansive oceanfront views that will soon replace one a fraction of the size.

There’s a large master suite, a room for all the beach gear -- and a car elevator. Outside, scrawled in graffiti on a wall separating the property from the beach, was a message touting Mitt Romney for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two years ago, Mitt Romney didn't think he would run for political office again. And in the aftermath of his bitter defeat in the presidential campaign, he embarked on something of a real estate spree. He simultaneously began building two multimillion-dollar homes, one here on the Pacific Ocean and another outside Salt Lake City. He also bought a third, a slopeside ski chalet in Park City, Utah.

For the first time in more than a decade, unencumbered by political considerations, the two-time presidential candidate and former private equity executive was free to spend his many millions without concern of how it might look. But now that he's considering a third presidential bid, the monuments of his wealth could become a political inconvenience, particularly as one of his key themes has been America's growing income divide.

Romney is traveling on Wednesday to Mississippi State University, a campus in the country's poorest state, where aides say he will outline his vision for a better America.

Romney, whose last presidential bid was hampered by his image of excessive privilege and insensitivity, may recognize the trouble his real estate holdings could cause in another campaign.

He is taking steps to shed some of his property, including retaining a broker who is currently showing the La Jolla home to potential buyers, according to a Romney aide. The aide would not disclose the asking price or explain why the former Massachusetts governor and his wife, Ann, want to sell the home after more than four years of city permitting, hearings, and construction.

In all, Romney has four homes. All of them are at least twice as large as the average home in the United States. They contain spas and hot tubs, and garages to hold up to four cars. They've built kitchens and dining rooms large enough to accommodate their large, sprawling family (5 sons, 5 daughters-in-law, and 23 grandchildren and counting).

"He wants to be close to his family," said Ron Kaufman, a longtime Romney confidant. "There's nothing more important to him than his kids and grandkids. . . . And if you could afford a house, and you're as close as the Romneys are to their kids, that's what you do."

Romney's plans to tear down and rebuilt his home in La Jolla were already underway during his last campaign. But since he lost the 2012 election, Romney has also purchased a six-bedroom home that was listed for $8.9 million in Park City, Utah, and he's built another 5,900-square-foot home 30 miles away near Salt Lake City.

He still has his New Hampshire vacation home on Lake Winnipesaukee, but last year sold his condominium in Belmont for $1.2 million, cutting his remaining ties to Massachusetts and raising questions about whether his 2016 campaign would again be headquartered in Boston.

"During the campaign neither Ann nor I had any time to think about home projects," Romney said in an interview a year after the 2012 election. "But now that the campaign is over, we have a little more time."

The new home in California includes an infamous "car elevator," first reported in 2012 by Politico and used by Romney's opponents to cast him as out of touch. A May 2013 planning document described it this way: "The proposed garage will have the appearance of a two- car garage, but will include a lift inside that will rotate two cars below grade to the basement area."

Building the home was the culmination of a long battle, which at times became heated with neighbors who said Romney's new home -- much larger than his former one -- was out of character with the neighborhood. Some neighbors also complained that he was incorporating square footage from a beach long believed to be public in order to build a larger home. Romney's home is on a street where houses are clumped together on small lots, with cherished views of the Pacific Ocean.

"It was contentious," said Anthony A. Ciani, a local architect and the chief opponent of Romney's expansion. "The issue was the bulk of it compared to the houses right next to it. It's not compatible with the gingerbread houses that are immediately adjacent. It's two, three times bigger than those."

A group of neighbors appealed to the state, but local and state officials ruled in the Romneys' favor, a process followed by the Los Angeles Times. Their former 3,000-square-foot home has been demolished -- except for a swimming pool and spa -- and a new one is under construction.

Planning documents call for a first floor that includes a library, and a large combined living room and dining room. The basement includes an exercise room, recreation room, and a room to hold the beach gear. Outside there will be a wraparound porch, as well as several palm trees, and a mixture of shrubs -- boxwoods, coffeeberry, and California blue sage -- to cover the property.

The work is expected to be completed by the end of the year, although it is unclear whether the Romneys will move in or find a buyer.

“Mitt and Ann’s plans are firm,” Matthew Peterson, the Romneys’ San Diego-based attorney, said in an e-mail. “They will be completing the construction of the home by the end of the year, but no decision has been made at this time whether to keep it, or sell it.”

He said that the home has been shown to potential buyers already, but “it is the Romneys’ expectation that if the home were to be sold, it would best be sold after it is completed.”

Romney’s wealth defined him in 2012, with a mixture of inadvertent comments, a reluctance to talk about his successful business career, and a video showing him disparaging 47 percent of Americans who rely on government assistance.

In a Washington Post-ABC News poll taken shortly before the 2012 election, 53 percent of likely voters said that Romney’s policies would favor the wealthy, with only 34 percent saying he would favor the middle class. Romney often seemed more comfortable talking with donors than he did in diners.

But those close to Romney have long described him as far more frugal than the caricature of him suggests. He frequently flies in coach, carrying his own bags. He repairs winter gloves with duct tape, refuses to spend money on apps for his iPad, and has a go-to meal that consists of a home-made peanut butter and honey sandwich.

Romney is donating his $50,000 honorarium from Wednesday’s speech to charity, a contrast with Hillary Rodham Clinton, who collects fees that are five times higher. Clinton, too, has struggled in talking about her wealth, saying she was once “dead broke” while in her $5 million home.

“It’s going to be hard for Hillary Clinton to make Mitt Romney’s wealth a fruitful line of attack, with her multimillion dollar mansions in Georgetown and Chappaqua and her jet-setting lifestyle of the rich and famous,” said a Romney aide, who declined to be identified.

But even if he is modest in some of his personal spending decisions, one area Romneydoes splurge on is real estate. His properties are all close to where his five sons are living. Every summer, they all gather at the home in Wolfeboro, N.H., and they spent last Christmas at the home in Deer Valley, where the massive stone fireplace was large enough to hold stockings for nearly two dozen grandchildren.

In August 2013, a holding company managed by Ann Romney purchased the home in Park City that had been listed at $8.9 million. The 8,730 square-foot home -- which has six bedrooms, eight bathrooms, an outdoor hot tub and a sauna -- was once featured in Architectural Digest, showcasing blond wood, two-story windows, and a chandelier made from antlers.

A Romney aide said that he co-owned the home with L.E. Simmons, a prominent Romney donor who runs a Houston-based private equity firm.

The Romneys also bought property in Holladay, Utah, where they tore down a smaller home and built a 5,900-square-foot house that features a fountain, terraces, a gazebo, a fire pit, and a spa, according to plans reviewed by the Salt Lake Tribune.

The plans also called for a hidden room, an 11-foot-long area masked by a bookshelf that swings open. But Romney told the Globe that it was much less mysterious than initial news reports suggested.

“It’s a closet where we plan on keeping the copying machine, and the printer, and paper,” he said, laughing. “Not even a lock on the door. It’s hardly a secret room.”

A burst of Democratic ideas (LAT)
By Doyle McManus

January 28, 2015

Los Angeles Times

Only a few months ago, it looked as if Republicans had recaptured their old claim to be the party of ideas, especially on the economic issue that has seized the attention of most Americans: the stagnation of middle-class incomes.

The GOP's former vice presidential nominee, Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), unveiled proposals to help the struggling middle class. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), another conservative hero, inveighed against income inequality. Even Mitt Romney, the once and perhaps future presidential candidate, has started saying it is time to get serious about poverty.

Meanwhile, Democrats seemed like an extinct volcano. Many of them campaigned for November's midterm election without any clear economic message at all. It didn't turn out well.

In politics, nothing concentrates the mind like electoral defeat -- unless it's the low roar of an oncoming presidential campaign.

And so, in the last few weeks, the Democratic volcano has erupted with ideas. President Obama listed dozens in his State of the Union speech, beginning with a tax increase on the top 1% to pay for child-care and education benefits for the middle class. House Democrats went further, proposing a tax on financial transactions that would allow for broader tax cuts for workers. And a think-tank task force co-chaired by former Treasury Secretary Lawrence H. Summers proposed tax breaks for middle-income folks as well as tax incentives to push companies toward sharing profits with their workers.

"Stagnation in wages and income is a choice, not a necessity," Summers said. "A different choice is possible."

You probably haven't seen much about, much less read, his report; It's 160 pages long and stuffed with serious economic analysis of why most Americans' incomes haven't grown much in real terms since -- ouch -- 1973.

But its prescriptions are serious, and they are probably close to what Hillary Rodham Clinton's economic platform will be, when we get to see it. The report was sponsored by the liberal Center for American Progress, whose founder, John Podesta, is expected to become chairman of Clinton's presidential campaign. The think tank's president, Neera Tanden, was Clinton's chief policy advisor in 2008.

And the report isn't coy about its political purpose; it sets out to update the centrist Democratic policies Bill Clinton ran on in the 1990s. "The world has changed," Summers said.

The core argument is that economic growth alone isn't enough to ensure sustained prosperity any more. Unless profits are broadly shared, the argument goes, the economy won't generate enough domestic spending to keep growth going -- or alleviate the widening gap between rich and poor.

Most of the solutions would be on almost any Democrat's wish list: more spending on education and training, more spending on roads and bridges and airports, paid parental leave for both fathers and mothers, and paid sick and vacation days for all.

And there's that corporate reform: legislation to push employers to share more of their growing profits with their employees, and to shift financial incentives for executives from short-term stock price increases to long-term growth.

The report calls for strengthening the 2010 Dodd-Frank financial regulation law, including tougher punishment for financial crimes beginning with mandatory "clawbacks" of bonuses paid to executives who are found responsible for malfeasance.

That sounds like a bow to Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and others on the Democratic left who have long complained that Wall Street got away with too much in the Great Recession. But the Summers report doesn't call for breaking up or shrinking big banks, as Warren has proposed, so it's unlikely to satisfy every progressive.

It won't make every centrist Democrat happy, either. The Progressive Policy Institute, a think tank spawned by Bill Clinton's New Democrat movement, began work this week on a list of policies focused on promoting private sector growth. "We need to expand our growth agenda to attract voters who may not agree with us," the group's president, Will Marshall, told me.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And what does Hillary think? She's not saying. As the prohibitive front-runner in a race she hasn't formally joined, she can let the arguments percolate.

She's given clues, of course -- but in all directions. She said she loved "watching Elizabeth [Warren] give it to those who deserve to get it." In Canada last week, she struck a less populist note, saying the pressing problem is "small- and medium-sized business formation."

And she has offered terse tidbits of policy via Twitter, warning Congress that "attacking financial reform is risky and wrong" and praising Obama's State of the Union address -- but adding: "Now we need to step up & deliver for the middle class."

But for Democrats who worried that their party's idea shortage might be chronic and disabling, the eruption of economic prescriptions must come as a relief. There's a debate underway, and the front-runner even has a draft platform in hand. The Democrats won't have to wage another campaign without an economic message after all.

Democrats see new chance to attack Kochs after $1 billion spending announcement (WAPO)
By Anne Gearan and Sean Sullivan

January 28, 2015

Washington Post

Forget Jeb, Rand and Ted. For Democrats, it's all about Charles and David.

The announcement this week that the vast political network backed by the wealthy industrialist Koch brothers aims to spend nearly $1 billion on the 2016 elections has reignited Democratic hopes of casting the brothers as electoral villains and linking them closely to Republican candidates.

It's a campaign strategy that yielded little success for the party in 2014, a banner year for the GOP. But Democratic officials and operatives say they are hopeful that their anti-Koch message will have more potency in a presidential election year.

Groups supporting potential Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton, as well as the House and Senate Democratic campaign arms, plan to single out the Kochs in their advertising and fundraising efforts.

"I think the Koch brothers dumping a billion dollars on the elections is definitely something the American people are interested in learning about," said Rep. Ben Ray Luján (N.M.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

He said the DCCC plans to mention the brothers in online fundraising efforts. The DCCC raised $70 million in the last election cycle.

David Brock, founder of the pro-Clinton American Bridge political action committee, said his group will be retooling a 2014 war-room operation called "Real Koch Facts," which he acknowledged did not achieve big results. The project aims to educate potential voters about what Democrats say is the Kochs' largely hidden agenda and to attempt to shame recipients of Koch money.

Said Peter Kauffmann, a spokesman for the pro-Clinton Priorities USA Action super PAC: "Will Priorities USA Action talk about the Koch brothers' attempt at a hostile takeover of the government of the United States? Stay tuned."

But former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who ran for president in 2012, compared Democratic attacks against the Kochs to failed GOP efforts to tar Democrats for receiving support from organized labor.

"The fact is we never got anywhere trying to explain to the country all of the extra advantage they got, for example, from labor unions," Gingrich said. "It's too indirect an argument."

The Koch-backed network's plan to spend $889 million on the 2016 elections was announced Monday at a Rancho Mirage, Calif., event hosted by Freedom Partners, a tax-exempt organization that serves as the nerve center of the political operation supported by the brothers and several hundred other conservative donors. Not all of the money will be put toward shaping elections; it will cover advertising and policy work as well as education and academic research, among other things. Much of the spending will be cloaked in secrecy.

James Davis, a Freedom Partners spokesman, said in an e-mail: "Democrats' past attempts to divide America by demonizing job creators didn't work too well. We remain focused on advancing free-market principles."

In 2014, Democrats made a concerted effort to make the Kochs into bogeymen. Then-Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) routinely used Senate floor speeches to castigate them. Democratic groups ran TV and radio ads tying the Kochs to GOP candidates and presenting them as polluters and job outsourcers who were out of touch with the middle class.

"The oil billionaire Koch brothers are showering millions on Thom Tillis like he's one of the family," said an ad from the Democratic-aligned Patriot Majority USA.

But Tillis is now a U.S. senator from North Carolina, part of a wave of Republican wins that cost the Democrats their majority.

"It clearly didn't work in 2014," said Darrell West, vice president and director of governance studies at the center-left

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brookings Institution. “That election was a disaster for Democrats. It seems to me they need to recalibrate the message.”

He said Democrats would need to tie their anti-Koch rhetoric to “substantive issues in a way that resonates with voters.”

Most voters don’t know who the Kochs are. Sixty-four percent of voters said they had no opinion or a neutral impression of them, according to an NBC News-Wall Street Journal poll conducted about a month before the November midterms. But among those who did, attitudes were overwhelmingly negative.

“The Koch brothers are not going to be a household name overnight, but our goal of making them a political liability for the people they are funding will continue,” Brock said.

The newly announced spending goal is unlikely to affect Clinton’s plans to begin her formal campaign in early April, strategists said. The goal is for her to raise an impressive total for the fundraising quarter that begins April 1.

But the early flurry of activity could apply pressure on mega-donors such as billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer and former New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg, a former Republican and staunch gun-control advocate who has donated mostly to Democratic candidates. The two were among the biggest givers in 2014.

Adviser Chris Lehane said Steyer will be looking at “where he can have the biggest impact” in 2016.

Like many Democrats, Lehane subscribes to the view that an anti-Kochs attack strategy could work better in 2016 than it did in 2014. “There will be a better voter pool, the Senate states will be more blue states than red states, and the media interest will be even bigger,” he said.

Campaign finance reform advocates also say the Koch-backed spending plan is a fresh opportunity to push for revamping laws that allow well-funded independent groups to dominate elections, often without revealing their donors.

“There is just no matching this amount of wealth directed in this way,” said Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.), who introduced a bill this week that would create a matching system for small donations and seek to limit the influence of super PACs. “Of course, nobody should have to match it. We should have a system that keeps spending within reasonable limits.”

But Price acknowledged that it would be difficult to pass such reforms in a Republican-controlled Congress. In the meantime, he said, raising the Kochs as an electoral issue isn’t a bad idea.

“I think in some cases it does work to dramatize the issue and make it more real,” Price said.

Fight the Temptation to Pay Attention to Polls (NYT)
By Brendan Nyhan

January 28, 2015

New York Times

Public service announcement: For now, you should ignore surveys testing potential Democrat/Republican matchups for the 2016 presidential election.

I'm referring to polls like The Washington Post-ABC News survey released last week, which made headlines with the finding that Hillary Clinton enjoys a big lead against Republicans like Jeb Bush and Mitt Romney. Other media organizations have also been releasing head-to-head polls like this, and more are sure to follow in the coming months.

I realize it's tempting to believe that these head-to-head polls have at least a little bit of meaningful information in them. Poll numbers are irresistible to political obsessives like me, but it's just too early for them to be useful in forecasting the general election.

Take the case of Mrs. Clinton's husband, Bill. In October 1991, Mr. Clinton, then the little-known Arkansas governor, pulled in only 20 percent of the vote in a prospective head-to-head matchup against President George H.W. Bush. His standing in the polls against Mr. Bush averaged only 34 percent as late as January 1992. But in the months that followed, Mr. Clinton gained stature while winning the Democratic nomination, and Mr. Bush's numbers plunged as his Gulf War-induced surge in approval dissipated. The campaign eventually brought the electoral fundamentals into focus: an electorate ready for change after 12 years of Republican control of the White House, a relatively weak economy, and an unpopular president. Mr. Clinton went on to beat President Bush by more than five points, winning 53.5 percent of the major-party vote in a three-way contest that also featured the eccentric billionaire H. Ross Perot.

The polls are likely to be even less accurate further from Election Day. In polls conducted in January 2003, for example, President George W. Bush led Democratic Senator John Kerry by 8 and 17 percentage points, but Mr. Bush's final margin of 2.5 percent of the popular vote was the narrowest of a re-elected president since Woodrow Wilson in 1916.

The political scientists Robert S. Erikson and Christopher Wlezien have shown that this pattern of early inaccuracy is consistent across the post-World War II era. Trial heat polls measuring support for potential general election candidates even 300 days from an election have virtually no predictive power in forecasting the final vote. (We are currently more than 650 days away.) It's not until near the end of primary season — mid-April of 2016, or approximately 200 days from Election Day — that polls start to be useful predictors, they find.

Why are polls so inaccurate for so long? The reality is that ordinary people pay very little attention to politics most of the time. Their responses to early survey questions are unconsidered and reflect factors like name recognition. Over time, however, the campaign eventually brings the state of the country into focus, drawing people's voting intentions into line with their partisanship and their perceptions of the state of the economy. As a result, the polls tend to converge toward the result predicted by forecasting models based on the fundamentals.

A key post-primary turning point, Mr. Erikson and Mr. Wlezien show, are the nominating conventions, which effectively deliver party messages to voters, helping influence independents and reel back in wayward partisans. By that point, the polls are almost as predictive as they will be at the end of the campaign. (The debates, by contrast, provide conflicting flows of information that rarely move the polls appreciably despite all the media coverage they attract.)

For all of these reasons, Mrs. Clinton's giant lead wouldn't hold up in an actual election contest. Her public standing has been artificially inflated by her tenure as secretary of state, which largely removed her from the partisan fray. A campaign would remind many Americans why they used to have unfavorable views of her. The winner of the Republican nomination will gain in stature and consolidate the support of the party in the first part of next year — the reason that the performance of G.O.P. candidates against Mrs. Clinton right now is not especially instructive in analyzing their prospective appeal. (At this point in January 2011, for instance, a McClatchy/Marist poll found President Obama leading Mitt Romney, 51 percent to 38 percent, but Mr. Romney ultimately attracted 47 percent of the vote and narrowly lost the race.)

Moreover, despite Mr. Obama's recent uptick in approval, approximately half of all Americans disapprove of his performance in office. While the growing economy is likely to continue to improve his standing and strengthen the prospects for a Democratic successor, any competent Republican would be expected to outperform the 39-41 percent mustered by G.O.P. candidates in The Post's polls.

Ultimately, all we can do is wait. We know head-to-head polls won't be useful for more than a year. Until then, your time is better spent following the direction of the economy — the most important predictor of presidential election outcomes — and the battle among G.O.P. candidates, who are already contesting the invisible primary that will help determine which candidate Mrs. Clinton or some other Democrat will face in November.

Hillary Clinton's diversity problem ; It's a lot like Obama's diversity problem (WAPO)
By Nia-Malika Henderson

January 27, 2015

Washington Post

When I first read the list of top campaign staffers with whom Hillary Rodham Clinton will surround herself in her presumed 2016 campaign for the White House, I had two thoughts.

One, that's a lot of white men. (Over at the Daily Beast, Tim Mak had the same reaction, wondering if Clinton needs "binders full of women.")

But my second thought was this: Of course it's that way.

Of the six people named in Anne Gearan and Philip Rucker's story, every single one is a white man. Now, in fairness, it's still early, and Karen Finney, Dennis Cheng, Jennifer Palmieri and the DNC's Mo Elleithee have been floated as options for top jobs. And Clinton's standing cast of advisers is also fairly diverse, with Huma Abedin and Cheryl Mills among her closest counselors and aides. Clinton picked Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager in 2008.

But in filling out the top slots, Clinton has drawn from Obama's campaign circle, and that group of people is largely white and male. The frustration among black staffers and strategists has been that rather than creating and growing a new class of black politicos, Obama has surrounded himself with a cast of mostly white men. Obama and Clinton have relied on what academics call "path dependence," a theory that could explain everything from why the majority of labor secretaries over the last 25 years have been women to why women who appear on television have a similar look.

The person who has the job gets the same job again and looks like the person who had the job before. (Robert Gibbs. Jay Carney. Josh Earnest.) But in political campaigns, which are dynamic -- especially in the age of Twitter -- this kind of stasis can be a drawback.

Typically, surface diversity has been an easy thing to achieve. It's akin to the one-drop rule. If you have one black/Hispanic/Asian/woman in a group of white men, then, presto, you've achieved diversity. Obama's race came with expectations of more diversity, but it also shielded him from public complaints. He was sometimes the one drop, and that was often enough.

Clinton, who will bank big on women and minorities, will have to do much more than simply follow Obama's path. She will have to create something new and different that matches the times and her profile, rather than absorb Obama's inner circle into her own.

"I love Barbra Streisand," said Donna Brazile, in an interview with The New York Times Magazine, "but Beyoncé is what's happening now. I love Peter, Paul and Mary, but she needs to be Justin Timberlake. She can't afford to kick people out, but she can afford to let new people come in. I realize that's uncomfortable."

Hillary Clinton and Her Detractors: Reporter's Notebook (NYT)
By Amy Chozick

January 27, 2015

New York Times

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presumed 2016 presidential campaign is already drawing a lot of criticism. That may not be a surprise. But Amy Chozick, a political reporter, is finding that the attacks against Mrs. Clinton have a new angle. She describes the challenge of reporting fairly on this subtle shift and what it may mean.

The cottage industry of attacking Hillary Rodham Clinton is not new, but I noticed over the past several months that the attacks that landed in my inbox struck a very different tone than those that Republicans used when she was first lady and later when she ran for president in 2008.

Remember when she was portrayed as the embodiment of bra-burning feminism? Then, in 2008, there were a lot of attacks that seemed based on gender, like an anti-Hillary website that called her a witch.

But ahead of the 2016 presidential campaign, the groups trying to stop Mrs. Clinton instead focus on her paid speeches, her response to the attack on the U.S. mission in Benghazi, Libya, and her comments last summer that her family was "dead broke" when leaving the White House. Instead of being the 1960s radical, she is portrayed as an elitist who is overly centrist.

The tricky thing in reporting this type of story is that you don't want to dismiss legitimate questions about her record as partisan "hating." Every political candidate faces attacks and should be thoroughly vetted if they're running for president. George W. Bush and other Republicans have certainly faced intense partisan attacks from the left.

But for some reason, Mrs. Clinton has always sparked a different level of ire. Mrs. Clinton's supporters largely believe the level of ire she sparks has to do with her being the first woman with a real chance to become president. Others point to how polarizing she is; polls show the country is almost equally divided in opinions about her.

Whatever the reason, I can't think of another candidate who has prompted an entire industry of kitschy items — like a "Hillary nutcracker," "No way in Hellary" aprons, and "Even Bill Doesn't Want Hillary" bumper stickers.

All this is a good way to rally Republicans, but it remains to be seen how much impact it would have on Mrs. Clinton's presumptive campaign.

Can Hillary Clinton Get Along With the Press? (Bloomberg)
By Joshua Green
January 27, 2015
Bloomberg

Last week, I was speaking with a veteran Republican strategist for a likely presidential candidate about what factors would shape the 2016 race that weren't already being obsessed over by the press. He replied, with grim satisfaction, that Hillary Clinton would have to endure more hostile press coverage than Barack Obama did and that this would redound to the GOP's benefit. For this strategist, as for many Republicans, it has long been an article of deep, almost cult-like faith that Obama's electoral success owed in no small part to the media's fawning coverage of his campaigns—and that this supposed bias will not be extended to Clinton.

Evidently, Clinton agrees. In a blockbuster piece in Monday's Politico, Mike Allen reports that a major component of Clinton's soon-to-emerge presidential campaign is a new approach to dealing with the press, which "Hillaryland," radiating the conviction of its principal, has generally abhorred and treated with hostile disdain. It seems those feelings haven't changed. "Advisers know that Clinton doesn't like or trust the press," Allen reports. But he quotes one of them conceding that open hostility toward the press hasn't been a successful strategy and that Clinton is ready to try something different. "You do see what works, and address what works the next time around," the adviser tells Allen. "The default isn't toward the pit-bull mentality." The campaign is apparently even searching for someone who could play the role of "good cop."

If anything, Allen undersells his scoop. Clinton's relationship with the press isn't some minor campaign detail along the lines of who'll run Iowa or who'll shoot her ads. It's what's shaped her as a politician. As Allen's colleagues Glenn Thrush and Maggie Haberman detailed last summer, Clinton's relationship with the press has been caustic throughout her career.

Over the 25 years Hillary Clinton has spent in the national spotlight, she's been smeared and stereotyped, the subject of dozens of over-hyped or downright fictional stories and books alleging, among other things, that she is a lesbian, a Black Widow killer who offed Vincent Foster then led an unprecedented coverup, a pathological liar, a real estate swindler, a Commie, a harridan. Every aspect of her personal life has been ransacked; there's no part of her 5-foot-7-inch body that hasn't come under microscopic scrutiny, from her ankles to her neckline to her myopic blue eyes—not to mention the ever-changing parade of hairstyles that friends say reflects creative restlessness and enemies read as a symbol of somebody who doesn't stand for anything.

This has instilled a resentment that her closest allies consider unshakeable. "Look, she hates you. Period," a Clinton adviser tells Thrush and Haberman. "That's never going to change." Of course, these bad feelings toward the press are not entirely unjustified. In addition to the deranged and misogynistic attacks Thrush and Haberman lay out, Clinton has also been raked through the coals over more serious matters, such as Whitewater, that never merited such treatment and inflicted real damage. What both Clintons learned, and what eventually got her into trouble, was that attacking the press allowed them to survive scandals both real (Monica Lewinsky) and imagined (Whitewater).

This bred a kind of paranoid hubris that was the hallmark of Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign. My own experience in the Clinton crosshairs stands as a good example of why her "old" approach to the press often backfired.

In 2007, I was writing a story for GQ on the inner workings of the Clinton campaign. The Clinton campaign was unhappy about this. At the time, Clinton was presumed (by herself and nearly everyone else) to be the inevitable Democratic nominee and likely future president. This gave her a great deal of power and the illusion that she could control how the press covered her. So a Clinton aide threatened to withdraw Bill Clinton's cooperation to be the magazine's "Man of the Year" cover model if GQ didn't kill my piece. GQ killed my piece. (Full story here, via Ben Smith.)

The problem with this strategy, as anyone outside the Clinton bubble would easily recognize, is that it created more problems for her than it solved. Information wants to be free—especially juicy tales of Clinton campaign turmoil. When the story inevitably leaked, it drew far more attention than it otherwise would have, deepening the impressions of Clinton as imperious and entitled and her campaign staff as goonish extras from House of Cards. The stories they'd tried to squelch simply wound up in a different magazine (here, for anyone interested).

Can Clinton really let bygones be bygones and try a new approach? It would make all the sense in the world, since the lack of competition in the Democratic primaries means she'll have to contend with a bored and restless press corps. But it would also require her to willingly give up a measure of control at a time when she is even more powerful and inevitable-seeming than she was before. (For what it's worth, I haven't yet been invited to tea.)

That’s a pretty tall order. Allen doesn’t mention it, but a New York Times story last week raises some doubts. Amy Chozick and Michael Cieply report that Bill Clinton has broken off cooperation with a Martin Scorsese documentary for HBO that would have been released during his wife’s campaign. Clinton wanted to control the interview questions and the final cut of the film, according Chozick and Cieply, and Scorsese refused.

This doesn’t mean that Clinton’s desire to reset her relationship with the media isn’t sincere, or at least a sincere recognition of her self interest. Nor does it mean the effort is doomed. But it is a reminder that old habits die hard.

Obama Is Setting Up Hillary Clinton to Fail (National Journal)
By Joshua Kraushaar
January 27, 2015
National Journal

President Obama delivered his penultimate State of the Union with renewed confidence, eager to take credit for the economy's recent growth spurt. He offered few olive branches to Republicans for their landslide victory two months earlier; articulated a panoply of liberal proposals that stand little chance of passing through Congress; and took the rosiest possible view of the economy and international landscape—even in the face of contrary evidence. In the moment, it's a savvy political play: Claim credit for an improving public mood and force Republicans on the defensive.

But despite the hoopla, recent polling shows that the public is much more in sync with the GOP's agenda than the White House's. This month's NBC/WSJ survey illustrated a striking disconnect between the president's improving approval rating (at 46 percent, up 2 points since November) and the top priorities of the American electorate. In the survey, 85 percent of voters rank "creating jobs" as a top priority, followed by defeating and dismantling ISIS (74 percent), reducing the federal deficit (71 percent), securing the border with Mexico (58 percent), and addressing Iran's nuclear program (56 percent). The last four are core GOP strengths; polls consistently show Republicans with an edge on those issues.

The items at the bottom of the priority list are all top administration priorities: closing the Guantanamo prison camp (24 percent rate as top priority), addressing the issue of climate change (34 percent), creating a pathway to citizenship for illegal immigrants (39 percent), and increasing the minimum wage (44 percent). It wasn't just Obama's assessment of the international stage that was disconnected from reality. It was also his assessment that the American people are with him on his agenda.

That disconnect will be driving the upcoming presidential election, which will provide a decisive verdict on the sustainability of Obama's accomplishments. Obama, as he ad-libbed in the State of the Union, couldn't help but brag that he won two elections as proof of his mandate. The GOP also won a historic number of seats in Congress, capitalizing on public anger over his policies. Rather than move to the middle and compromise with Republicans, Obama appears intent on playing to his party's progressive base in the run-up to the 2016 elections – and pass along that legacy to Hillary Clinton's nascent campaign. It's a gamble that will determine whether his landmark legislation will remain law, or be rolled back by a new Republican president.

Obama should recognize how much of his post-election bump is being driven by forces outside of his control. The president is eagerly taking credit for the improved economy, even though little has passed legislatively in recent years. It wasn't long ago that he was blaming GOP intransigence for the slow growth. Now he's betting his remaining political capital that the encouraging economic trends will continue into next year—hardly a guarantee, given the history of false starts in the past.

"We're going to have to see sustained growth in the number of middle-class jobs and an increase in median income before we really see attitudes about the economy turn around," said Republican pollster Whit Ayres, who is advising potential presidential candidate Marco Rubio. "Debates on how to get the economy going to get more well-paying middle-class jobs will remain one of the very top issues in the next presidential campaign. The depth of middle-class anxiety is so widespread."

Obama's own emphasis on "middle-class economics" demonstrated that, despite his optimism, he recognizes that many Americans are still struggling to make ends meet. But his solutions were oddly disconnected from both the economic and the political realities he faces.

Consider the lack of creativity from the administration in its signature initiative from the State of the Union: free community college tuition for everyone. For most low-income Americans, the tuition is already free or heavily subsidized. There's not a groundswell of middle-class households whose goal is to receive an associate degree. The plan wasn't accompanied by a more ambitious approach to, say, help community colleges teach certain skills that aren't taught at traditional four-year colleges. (Rubio, for instance, has proposed expanding access to career and vocational education as part of his detailed educational blueprint.)

It's merely a tuition giveaway, one that originally was partly paid for by the very middle- and upper-middle-class families that are saving money for the four-year colleges that Obama has called essential for a successful career. The plan proposed getting rid of the tax exemption on 529 college savings accounts, which have been growing in popularity, to help parents prepare for their childrens' rising education expenses. That provision was so politically tone deaf that the White House withdrew it just one week after the president introduced it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The proposal smacked of the very redistributive schemes that dogged Democrats throughout the 1980s.

Anytime a politician promises to “lower the cost to zero,” as Obama did in his address, it’s worth remembering the economic maxim “there’s no such thing as a free lunch.” And it directly puts a squeeze on the very middle-class constituency that Obama claims to be courting. Hillary Clinton will certainly want to echo a message centered on educational opportunity, but she’s probably not eager to alienate a sizable group of voters who will be up for grabs in the next election.

Clinton has been publicly supportive of the president, but he’s boxed her into a corner. She can’t afford to publicly break with a president whose fortunes align closely with hers. Yet she’s undoubtedly aware that her odds of winning the Democratic nomination are very strong, and moving away from the center won’t help her in a general election.

Palin receives plaudits from pro-Hillary Clinton group (AP)
January 27, 2015

Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sarah Palin is picking up an unexpected title: top fundraiser for a group promoting a potential Hillary Rodham Clinton campaign for president.

During a speech in Iowa last weekend, the former Alaska governor and 2008 Republican vice presidential nominee held up a Ready for Hillary car magnet as she talked about ways for Republicans in Iowa to stop a Clinton campaign. Ready for Hillary, the super PAC backing a possible Clinton campaign, used the moment as a fundraising tool and said they raised more than $25,000.

Adam Parkhomenko, Ready for Hillary's executive director, sent an email to supporters saying: "By raising $25,000, Sarah officially qualifies as a co-chair of our National Finance Council. (We will wait until Sarah calls before officially adding her name to the list.)"

Palin appeared alongside several potential GOP presidential candidates at the weekend event organized by Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa. On the question of whether anyone can stop Clinton, she borrowed a phrase from the Obama campaign and said, "Yes we can."

A SarahPAC official did not immediately comment on the Ready for Hillary email.

Gowdy: Benghazi investigation 'incomplete' without Clinton testimony (WAPO)
By Colby Itkowitz

January 28, 2015

Washington Post

Whether she runs for president or not, Hillary Rodham Clinton is probably not done answering questions about Benghazi, Libya.

The House panel investigating the deadly attacks on the Benghazi mission in September 2012 met Tuesday in a fiery public hearing where Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), who is chairing the 12-member select committee, said he would "ratchet up" the investigation and claimed the administration wasn't cooperating.

After the hearing, Gowdy told reporters he planned to call on Clinton to testify, saying a Benghazi investigation would be "incomplete" without questioning the former secretary of state.

"Every witness who has relevant information needs to be talked to," Gowdy said, according to ABC News.

Gowdy said he is waiting for pertinent documents from the State Department before calling Clinton to appear before the committee. Clinton has said she doesn't think the committee's investigation is necessary — other independent panels have not found any wrongdoing by the Obama administration — but has also said she would testify if asked.

But Democrats accused Gowdy of delaying the invitation to coincide closer with the 2016 election. At the hearing, Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) said the committee, which was created eight months ago, is at risk of becoming a "partisan fishing expedition, or it'll be drawn out to affect the presidential election cycle."

At Gowdy's request, ranking member Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) said he asked Clinton back in September if she would willingly testify, and she offered to come in December or January.

"She said I'll do it, period. The fact is she was very clear. She did not hesitate for one second," Cummings said. But Gowdy has yet to formally invite her to come testify, citing the need for additional documents.

Clinton appeared before Senate and House committees during back-to-back hearings on Benghazi as one of her final acts as secretary of state in January 2013. She defended the White House's response and famously lost her patience at one point, asking a Republican "what difference does it make" when pressed on the White House's initial explanation of why the attack occurred.

A year ago, Clinton said the attacks were her "biggest regret" during her years at State.

Congressman: Hillary Clinton agrees to testify to House's Benghazi panel (CNN)
By Dan Merica

January 27, 2015

CNN

Washington (CNN) - Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify to the House's select committee investigating Benghazi, the panel's Democratic ranking member told CNN on Tuesday.

Rep. Elijah Cummings said that Clinton agreed to testify before the committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attack in December after he contacted her months earlier.

"The chairman asked me back in September to inquire as to whether Secretary Clinton would testify," Cummings said. "She immediately said she would and that she wanted to come in December, but if December did not work, she would come in January. She said I'll do it, period. The fact is she was very clear. She did not hesitate for one second."

The U.S. consulate in Libya was attacked on Sept. 11, 2012. Four Americans, including the U.S. Ambassador to Libya Chris Stevens, were killed. Initially, the attack was thought to be perpetrated by an angry mob responding to a video made in the U.S. which mocked Islam and the Prophet Mohammed, but was later determined to be a terrorist attack.

Nick Merrill, the former first lady's spokesman, declined to go into detail about why Clinton agreed to testify and when she might do so.

"I'm going to leave it to the committee to address their plans," said Merrill.

Cummings' comments on Tuesday revealed the clearest indication to date that Clinton was willing to show up before the committee, though many details remain to be agreed upon and the appearance could well never happen.

While touring the country selling her new memoir in June 2014, Clinton was asked whether she would be willing to testify before the House committee.

"We'll see," she told NBC in an interview. "I'm not going to prejudge it."

Clinton added that she took a lot of notes during the attack, but declined to say whether she would hand over the notes.

"Let's see if it's on the level or not. I don't want to be part of anything that in any way politicizes or demeans the sacrifice that we saw happen there," Clinton said.

The attack has remained a political issue for Clinton, who was secretary of state at the time, since 2012. As the former first lady eyes a potential presidential bid, a number of Republicans have signaled that Benghazi will be a main line of attack against Clinton.

Sen. Rand Paul has said the attack should disqualify Clinton from higher office.

Rep. Trey Gowdy, the chairman of the Benghazi committee, told reporters on Tuesday that he still intends to have Clinton testify as part of the investigation.

"Every witness who has relevant information needs to be talked to," he said.

According to The Hill, Gowdy is prepared to hear from Clinton 30 days after receiving "all the [State Department] documents” on the attack.

Clinton testified for more than five hours before another House committee investigating Benghazi in January 2013, shortly before she left the State Department. At the time, Clinton acknowledged a “systemic breakdown” but said that her department was taking additional steps to increase security at U.S. diplomatic facilities.

Since then, Clinton has said her biggest regret a during the four years she served as America’s top diplomat was the Benghazi attack.

“My biggest regret is what happened in Benghazi,” Clinton said in January 2014. “It was a terrible tragedy losing four Americans, two diplomats and -- now it is public so I can say -- two CIA operatives.”

Clinton willing to testify before Benghazi panel, Democrat says (Hill)
By Martin Matishak

January 27, 2015

The Hill

Hillary Clinton is willing to testify before the House Select Committee that is investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi, Libya, according to the panel's top Democrat.

Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) on Tuesday said he has spoken to Clinton about the possibility of testifying at the request of Rep. Trey Gowdy (S.C.), the panel's Republican chairman, and she "did not hesitate for one second."

"She said ... I'll do it, period," Cummings said after the committee's third hearing.

Cummings said Clinton, who was secretary of State at the time of the Benghazi attacks, indicated to him last year that she "wanted to come in December" to testify but could also come in January.

"The fact is that she was very clear," Cummings said.

The possibility of an appearance from Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 if she makes a bid, has loomed as the biggest question for the Benghazi panel since its formation last summer.

Gowdy first floated the possibility of Clinton testifying late last year, creating the potential for a dramatic confrontation with the former secretary of State over a security failure that some Republicans argue should disqualify her from the presidency.

Clinton is "a witness that we would like to talk to. I cannot tell you when," Gowdy said in December.

With the race for the White House set to erupt soon, Democrats could be maneuvering to accelerate the work of the Benghazi panel so that it is not investigating Clinton while she is running for the presidency.

Gowdy, a former prosecutor, on Tuesday said he and Cummings had initially agreed last year that Clinton should be brought before the panel.

But after that discussion, Gowdy said, Cummings had an unexpected change of heart.

"The deal I had with Mr. Cummings is we will bring her before the committee within 30 days of receiving all the [State Department] documents responsive to our request," Gowdy said.

He said the State Department must hand over the information the panel is seeking, including potentially some of Clinton's emails, before Clinton testifies.

"If I were to conclude this investigation having not talked to the secretary of State at the time it would be an incomplete investigation," Gowdy said. "But I can't talk to her until I have the documents that would make that conversation productive. I'm not interested in having a conversation where old allegations are repeated or a shouting match."

"I want to ask specific questions rooted in documents," he added.

Gowdy said he would be "happy to take her in January, February, March, whenever" but that it was up to the panel's Democrats on "how quickly" they get to her testimony.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m willing to work with them on the timing. I’m willing to do it sooner rather than later,” Gowdy said. “What I’m not willing to do is do it in a vacuum where I don’t have access to the documents.”

Cummings disputed that he changed his mind about having Clinton appear.

“That’s not true. I don’t know how he could say that because we’ve never been against it. He asked me to check with her. I did that she said she was willing to come so it was a non-issue,” Cummings said.

“If the committee wants her to come, she’s willing to come,” the Democrat added.

The spat over Clinton’s testimony comes at time of rising partisan tensions on the select committee, with members clashing over how the panel is conducting its investigation.

On the eve of an open hearing Tuesday, Cummings released letters in which he accused Republicans of conducting witness interviews in secret and withholding information from the Democratic members of the panel.

“I am saddened to report today that there are major, major problems with this committee and its work,” Cummings said in his opening statement, adding that its work is moving at a “glacial pace.”

Gowdy fired back that the criticism was “interesting” coming from Democrats, given that they fought the creation of the panel and have repeatedly threatened to boycott its work.

But Gowdy saved most of his ire for the State Department, taking it to task for failing to comply with requests for witness testimony and documents.

“This is not a political exercise for us,” Gowdy said. “We’re going to ratchet it up because I need access to the documents and the witnesses and we need to be able to conclude our work.”

The House created the select committee last May to investigate the 2012 Benghazi attacks. Republicans argue a new probe was needed to explore unanswered questions about the administration’s response to a terrorist assault that killed four Americans, including Ambassador Christopher Stevens.

Democrats have accused the GOP of launching a “witch hunt” against Clinton, and on Tuesday portrayed the panel as a partisan exercise.

“Now, more than ever, I’m convinced that my colleagues are in search of a mythical creature — a unicorn, that is, a made-up conspiracy that does not exist,” said Rep. Linda Sánchez (D-Calif.).

Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.) said the Republican majority on the committee made no document requests between May and December, adding that Gowdy’s comments about wrapping up their work “boggles the mind.”

Republicans dismissed the complaints as “ridiculous” and said the five Democrats’ on the panel were hypocrites because they have not suggested any witnesses or requested any documents for the probe.

“The happiness of the Democrats was never my objective in the first place,” Gowdy said after the hearing.

“They’re looking for a reason to leave.”

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Employee Town Hall 07/18/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately, our tracker was turned away at the door from today's town hall meeting. It was a closed employee-only event. But here's the good news: We captured the event streaming online. Below are our notes.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Touts the Volt / electric cars as 'the future'; says green technology will be a boon to American economy
- Brings up his comments that the old automotive jobs aren't coming back to Michigan, "but new jobs are coming back"
- Says "I'm not too much of an expert" on WTO arbitration on free trade
- Promises that the next toy that comes into USA from China with poison/arsenic on it "will be the last toy" that comes to USA from China.
- Walks back rhetoric on safety of offshore drilling
- Says in Iraq "We have succeeded--I'm not saying we are succeeding--we have succeeded"
- Repeats "I know how to win wars"
- Woman asks McCain about pre-emptive strike, decision to invade Iraq, was "bomb bomb Iran" a joke, etc.
    - McCain says we were justified to invade Iraq because we thought Saddam had WMDs but that was history, and that's for historians to debate.
- Says A-lQaeda will increase "spectacular attacks" 'as we get into the campaign season'
- Hits Obama for this being the "first time" he's sat down with Petraeus, gone to Afghanistan; continues to hit him for advocating a strategy that would have lost us Iraq
- OTHER TOPICS: Offshore drilling, abortion, cap-and-trade, housing crisis, health care crisis, free trade

Warren, MI - McCain Employee Town Hall 07/18/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

BACKGROUND DETAIL

- Cong. Candace Miller gives introductory remarks: praises GM, comments on Chevy Volt, the "future" of GM
    - 'Here, after WWII, which the Sen knows very well...'
    - 'We know he loves America more than he loves himself or anything else', praises McCain's "optimistic vision" for America
- At Tech Center at GM
- Closed event, employees and credential press only

Opening Remarks

- thanks Cong. Miller and audience, asks technicians to turn up lights so he can see the participants
- town halls are super-important; thanks
- thank you for being in heartland, you made history in WW2 when you literally became the "arsenal of democracy"
- now we face another challenge: radical Islamic extremism. We're sending $$$$ to people who don't like us, a lot of that to pay for what we put in our cars
    - jokes Mr. Lutz not a very good briefer, also not a very good pilot. I probably shouldn't say anything about that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Volt is the future. We have to eliminate our dependence on foreign oil. We can, we have the best and most hard-working workers in the world in the US and in Detroit.
- That's not the only step we need to take.
- I call it the Lexington Project, it has to do with alternative energy, the Volt, conservation, we've got to drill offshore. 'Is there someone here who doesn't believe we should exploit our own oil' sources? [someone raises hand] ok, we can have that discussion.
- When President lifted exec order, the futures price went down.
- I'm glad Mr. Pickens is advertising here. I share his values and belief in his program. Not exactly but.
- MI generates 26% of its energy from nuclear power plants. It is safe. We've never had an accident on the Navy ships. Do we store and reprocess sent nuclear fuel? The French reprocess it. It was a decision by Carter that said we wouldnt reprocess it. Is it the answer? No, but it's clean and it won't take us as long to reprocess it as theyre saying. The French are doing it in 5; why would it take us 10?
- A key part will be that over there [the Volt]. We should give them a tax credit for that purchase, because we need to encourage.
- We need to unlock the gridlock in Washington. Yesterday Congress went into recess; they never miss recess or a pay raise. In Senate, they're gridlocked on offshore drilling. Pelosi has announced there won't be a vote on it. If you want a voice in Washington, you don't have one because they've put partisanship over it. Congress approval at 9%. And Americans have figured it out, they're working for their party and each other and putting their country above. I will do that. I put country first, that's why I wasn't voted Ms. Congeniality: on climate change, on torturing people in our custody, on campaign finance.
- There'll be times when we disagree on issues. Most likely: trade. I believe in free trade, but I also believe in education and re-training. We need to put programs into community colleges. We all know a job is more than a job. If it's an older worker, I'll subsidized their income while they take a lower-paying job and get re-trained. We cannot have people's lives end at too early a stage.
- I came here early in the campaign and said the automotive jobs aren't coming back. But I said new jobs are coming back. This new technology will create 10s of thousands of jobs over time because there are going to be imitators all over the world. We can't let the arsenal of democracy disappear into the mist.
    - This new breakthrough, this new technology--"I run out of hyperbole obviously"
- I know how to win wars and I hate wars because I have experience with them. I know how to make this nation secure and prosperous. And this is going to be a tough campaign.
- And we may be up late on the East Coast saying the results from MI aren't in yet and the election might turn on it.
- We'll often disagree, but that's good, healthy.
- And I put my country first. And i once had the opportunity-- in the POW camp, I had a choice to go home early because my father was a high-ranking admiral. But there was a Mexican-American, Everett Alvarez, and he was there first, and I couldn't leave early. I put my country first.

Question & Answer

- 1Q) Different states trying to set standards for fuel economy vs. national standards?
    - MCCAIN: I'm torn. I'm a federalist. E.g. on offshore drilling--states should decide. But it's complicated because every state doesn't manufacture cars and they don't stay within state. I want Rick and the Big 3 to sit down and come up with a proposal. I support states being able to do that but I don't see why we can't work this out. In Congress, we feel it's our role to set mileage standards. I think that the Volt may make this discussion academic.
- 2Q) As a catholic male, I'm adamantly pro-life. Can I count on you to fight for the rights of the unborn (mentions embryonic stem cell, cloning, abortion, etc)?
    - MCCAIN: Yes you can. The noblest words "All of us are created equal... happiness" which applies to rights of unborn. I have a long and consistent record of supporting them. When Sen Obama was in IL state legislature, he voted against a ban on partial-birth abortion, "one of the most gruesome" procedures. I have a long record of voting and advocacy. "I'm proud to be called right-to-life."
- 3Q) When is the govt going to stick up for us in the automotive industry, who stood up for the people after 9/11?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: First, I support a tax credit for people who buy a Volt and other things that put us on path to energy independence. Govt should invest in pure R&D, especially in development of a battery. Straight-talk: you can't compete with other manufacturer if you lay people off and pay them for the rest of their life. So I will do everything I can. I will do what I can to make this technology better-refined and less expensive. The problem with the Volt is it's too expensive. The cell phone had that problem though. The market fixes that. I will do what I can with education and re-training. Americans are sitting around the kitchen table worried about getting laid off. And one of the reasons I supported the gas tax holiday is because it's the lowest-income Americans that are paying the most, driving the furthest in the least-efficient cars. This industry and this company in particular can compete with any in the world. They're the "best of America"

- 4Q) GM produces most E85 cars, which is super-efficient. What would you do to support and make more available?
  - MCCAIN I'd like to see us make every car in America flex-fueled. Brazilians have done that. They use sugar cane. I don't support ethanol subsidies becuase it distorts the market. I'm all for encouraging flex fuels in all cars, that every gas station has a pump has a E85 on it, I'm for having sugar, ethanol, corn, etc. I didn't support imported ethanol.

- 5Q) Is climate change really proven? And how will cap-and-trade hurt GM?
  - MCCAIN: I think there's significant evidence to show that climate change is happening. Even if I'm wrong--and I think that I'm not because of what I've seen and the preponderence (vs unanimity) of scientific evidence... and I've traveled aroudn the world usually at your expense--then we go ahead with the Volt, which BTW will create 700k new jobs. It's my view that the new light bulb, that nuclear power, that green technologies (incl. solar--which now are paper-thin... there are enormous advances in technology). They've developed an electric automobile. It costs $100k, but the next will cost $60k. Point is part of the future is based on green technologies, we're the best. Cap-and-trade won't be bad: We'll still improve the economy. Green tech will help us lead economically.
  - FOLLOWUP: If we start to regulate CO2 emissions, in the short-term a place like this will suffer, no? Other technologies yes will leave us cleaner, but what about the short-term?
  - MCCAIN: I've had numerous convos, and I think we need to adjust those standards so it doesn't kill off the manufacturers. We had another emissions problem: acid rain. The cap-and-trade system worked there. The Europeans used it and made massive errors, and I think we can avoid those.
  - three options (1) status quo-- not an option (2) carbon tax-- everyone will see a rise in taxes and I don't want that or (3) cap and trade-- I'd rather see competition than tax. Whenever you see that 3-letter word t-a-x, run the other way and grab your wallet

- 6Q) - Gas prices has risen and so has fuel economy. Housing market hasn't seen the same advancements. What about energy conservation in people's houses?
  - MCCAIN: Government could increase standards in federal buildings. Govt should offer tax credits to people or builders who make more energy efficient homes. Govt also needs to encourage energy conservation. Also, we need to make sure people can stay in their homes--I want you to be able to get a 30-year FHA guaranteed fixed-interest loan at the new value of your home. Then incentivize energy efficiency.
  - FOLLOWUP: I built a new home, I can't sell my old home and was forced into a jumbo loan, which is impossible to pay. MI passed a law, but you need to make all jumbo loans the same rate.
  - MCCAIN: You need to be able to make payments at your home's new rate. If we dont' keep people in their homes, then that's the essence of the American dream. Also, we need to fix the system? 60-page documents-why? Why shouldn't we go after predatory lenders? Those people ought to be punished.

- 7Q) Health care. 16 years ago there was little out-of-pocket expenses and not there's a ton. What would you do about heatlh care crisis? and what do you think about socializing health care (e.g. Canada)?
  - MCCAIN: This is one of the most compelling issues for long-term solutions. It's not the qualithank you of health care, but cost and availability. In Canada or England or whatever, the wealthy people come here for procedures. We need outcome-based treatment for chronically ill patients. We need medical malpractice reform, community clinics, GAPs for uninsurables (federal govt make a significant contribution and states join together to establish risk pools and get people insurance they deserve).
  - And finally, fitness and wellness; rising rates of child obesity. I met a kid in FL who lost 97lbs on Shaq's plan. I'd like to see athletes to go around and encourage kids, parents should know school lunch and PE programs. Government should reward people for doing things like joining health clubs.
  - I'm confident will wean off foreign oil. I think we can do the same thing with health care. There are too many without insurance-- some of them by choice, but not most, and that's not right.

- 8Q) When we source to a Canadian supplier, Canadian law requires that they must go to a Canadian source to get secondary parts and that doesn't seem fair? What would you do to help us in that area of free trade?
  - MCCAIN: I would take them right to those arbitration panels. I think it might be in violation of WTO panels too, but "I'm not too much of an expert" in that area. I don't believe that people should have advantages over American workers and products. I also want to tell you that the next toy that comes into USA from China with poison/arsenic on it will be the last toy that comes to USA from China.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- --lady prepares to ask question about offshore drilling. MCCAIN jokes "boooo"
- 9Q) You keep proposing alternative energy but you're peppering it with comments about offshore drilling.
    - MCCAIN: There are offshore drilling sites off TX and Louis. that have done very well against hurricanes. I'm not saying there will never be another oil spill, we all remember Santa Barbara and Exxon Valdeez. I think we can do it well without killing our environment. Drills can go in at a slant. And i think we need to balance it against the security threat of sending money to foreign oil powers.
    - FOLLOWUP: I'd like to see more emphasis on the renewable resources that we have out there.
    - MCCAIN: I'm supportive of and the govt is doing a lot of R&D on wind and solar, etc. But we cant be as reliant on that as Mr. Pickens thinks. It doesn't meet our energy demands.

- 10Q) We preemptively went into Iraq and not 1 terrorist came from Iraq. And now there's Iran. And you made the joke "bomb bomb bomb Iran"--I hope that was a joke. And OSama's still running around. How do you feel about preemptive strikes? Going into countries where we don't like the leader? Iran? N Korea? And you said you know how to win wars. We lost Vietnam, you were there. And do we want a President who wins wars; is that a goal?
    - MCCAIN: Thank you. You ask a very profound question and I appreciate it. Al Qaeda is active all over the world--some evidence there's some in America, definitely some in Europe. They're an evil that's hard to encompass. they behead people and post the video. and they're dedicated to destroying everythign we stand for. I believe we were justified going into Iraq based on the intelligence we had at the time and Saddam's history. But that was history, and that's for historians to debate. But we had a losing strategy and I went over and said we had to change it. And they said I was going to end my campaign, and that strategy has succeeded. And I'd be happy to give you all the data ot back that up. Is this a final victory? no. They're on their heels but theyre not gone; "We have succeeded--I'm not saying we are succeeding--we have succeeded" and we will win--if we don't do what Obama wants us to do which is set up an arbitrary timetable. Obama is now sitting down with Petraeus FOR THE FIRST TIME and going ot afghanistan FOR THE FIRST TIME and i am "astonished" that he would propose his policy BEFORE going on the mission. If we had done what obama had wanted, we would have a wider war. Now he says he'll assess the situation--there wouldn't be a situation to assess because we wouldve lost the war, if we had done what obama wanted, which was not to do the surge.
    - Iran is dedicated to extinction of Israel. I want sanctions, but Russia is blocking them in the UN. So we need to get together with our European allies including France and do it. Their economy is weak. WE can never allow a 2nd holocaust. We can modify their behavior. And we need to consider every possible option before we consider a military option.
    - America has made great sacrifice and it grieves us all. If US failed and were defeated, we'd face that . {Matthew Stanley story} I make that same commitment to the 4000 other families that have sacrificed. I put my coutnry first. I knew it was hard to send 30k more
    - "I hope that at least partially answers your question." Thank you. [doesn't offer a follow-up]

- 11Q) What would you say to people that say that there were never WMDs in Iraq (my son is there now)? And what about McClellan's views?
    - MCCAIN: Every intelligence nation in the world believed he had them. So you can't say its some massive conspiracy. And Saddam had said he was intent on acquiring them. And there were humanitarian concerns. I agree with Petraues. But that success could be reversed very easily. I believe that as we get into the campaign season they will step up and do more of these "spectacular" attacks, suicide bombs. They'll try to undermine Maliki government. People who are saying that the Maliki government isn't working--which it is--are the same people that said that the surge would fail. I will make sure that we get out according to the conditions on the ground. I've been through many wars and I have the judgment and experience to lead our country through us.

- Thank you for leading us through this great experiment. There will be others--electric cars and hybrids--but this is one of the greatest. I'm proud of you and I will do everything to make sure you succeed, not just for you but for the good of the country and of the world.

With Fragile Coalition, MP Seeks to Expand Cabinet

In a move that underscores the fragility of his new 61-member coalition, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu plans to have the Knesset repeal a law limiting the size of the cabinet even before informing members of his Likud party which jobs they will have in the new government. "Netanyahu is afraid the disappointed ones won't show up for the vote," a senior Likud member explained. "In the vote to expand the cabinet, Netanyahu must have 61 supporters, because otherwise, it isn't possible to change the existing law. In this situation, every disappointed MK who leaves to go to the bathroom can sabotage the government's functioning." Currently, the law limits the cabinet to 18 ministers. Netanyahu plans to have the Knesset abolish that ceiling on Monday.

Netanyahu Faces Dissent From Within Likud

After agreeing a coalition deal with Bayit Yehudi and announcing the formation of a government with a razor-thin majority, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu may face dissent from within his own ranks on Thursday. In the afternoon, Likud MK Ayoob Kara told the Knesset Channel: "If I am not made a minister – there will be surprises." MK Kara emphasized that Israel's Druze population was not only a resource for the IDF but part of the fabric of the state. "The Druze were not born solely to make war, they were also born to sit at the cabinet table. And a government will not be formed that does not have a Druze minister – We want this to pass a clear message that we are a part of this country."

Herzog: "Government is Dangerous, Will Not Join It"

Netanyahu hinted several times he intends to expand the narrow government he managed to set up last night, but the chairman of the Zionist Union, Isaac (Buji) Herzog, firmly rejects the political assessments regarding the possibility of his party joining the government. In his interview he makes clear he has no intention of being part of Netanyahu's coalition, and he calls on the PM to return his mandate to the President. "I will lead the opposition," clarifies Herzog. "I have no intention of joining this government. I have said it once and again, and I will repeat it in English and in Italian, if I have to." "This is a dangerous government," he added. "I would like to suggest to Netanyahu to go to the President and return his mandate. I can form a different government, a better one."

Significant Achievements Obtained by Bayit Yehudi

Following the bitter and rancorous coalition negotiations between Bayit Yehudi and the Likud, details of the deal began to emerge on Thursday. As well as obtaining the Education Ministry for party chairman MK Naftali Bennett, the Justice Ministry for MK Ayelet Shaked, and the Agriculture Ministry for MK Uri Ariel, the party also received the deputy defense minister position, which is likely to be filled by MK Rabbi Eli Ben-Dahan, while MK Bezalel Smotrich will likely become deputy speaker. The party also gained the chairmanship of the Knesset Constitution, Law and Justice Committee.

Ban: "Israel Should Renew Process w. Palestinians"

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon said that after the swearing-in of the new government in Israel, he would examine with Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu the practical options for renewing the negotiations on a two-state solution. In a statement issued by Secretary-General Ban, he expressed deep concern regarding the plan to build another 900 housing units beyond the Green Line in East Jerusalem.

Abbas: "Israel Must Choose; Settlements or Peace"

The Palestinians have slammed Israel's new government, after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu signed a coalition deal Thursday with Habayit Hayehudi leader Naftali Bennett. The new coalition will have to choose between settlements and peace talks, said Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeineh. "The Palestinians will continue to briskly peruse its activity on the international stage, by joining international organizations and drafting new proposed resolutions for the UN Security Council, especially in light of the right-wing-settler character of the government," he said.

Joint List MK: "Demolition of Arab Homes is War"

Some 50,000 Israeli homes are at risk for demolition by the state, Joint List and Balad MK Basel Ghattas told The Jerusalem Post on Thursday. That "would be like destroying an entire city like Nazareth – it would be a declaration of war," he said. "If there is not an immediate halt of these criminal acts of destruction, the situation among the Arab population would be on the verge of explosion," Ghattas warned. "Instead of solving the housing shortage in Arab society, the government is destroying homes under the guise of [demolishing] 'illegal construction,'" he charged. The Balad MK called for the rebuilding of homes that are destroyed and demanded that demolitions be frozen until the governmental authorities provide the necessary permits to legalize the structures.

US Senate Asserts Right to Review Final Iran Deal

The US Senate overwhelmingly passed legislation giving Congress the right to review and perhaps even reject any nuclear deal with Iran, the culmination of weeks of wrangling over how to hold Tehran to account. The bill passed 98-1 after overcoming initial objections from President Barack Obama. It comes amid intense negotiations between world powers and Iran on a deal intended to prevent Tehran's development of a nuclear weapon in exchange for lifting of economic sanctions. "We worked hard to create a great bipartisan balance," said the measure's chief author, Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Bob Corker. Republican Tom Cotton was the lone member voting in opposition to legislation that would give lawmakers at least 30 days to review any final Iran accord. The bill now heads to the House of Representatives, where it has the support of the chamber's Republican leaders. According to White House spokesman Eric Schultz, Obama "said he would sign the legislation in its current form."

Netanyahu's Shaky Base

By David Ignatius

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been a dominating political figure in the United States this year, seemingly invincible as he hurled thunderbolts at President Obama and other adversaries. But here in Israel, not so much.
After winning a narrow election victory in March, Netanyahu formed a fragile government late Wednesday with a bare one-vote margin in parliament. Israeli analysts, left and right, are questioning whether the government can last long. Netanyahu said Thursday that he had been leaving the foreign-minister position vacant for Labor Party leader Isaac Herzog, in hopes of broadening his base, but Herzog rejected the offer.

"Bibi has no agenda, other than challenging President Obama on Iran," argues Aluf Benn, editor of the liberal newspaper Haaretz, using the prime minister's nickname. One sign of Netanyahu's problems was the last-minute defection by his previous foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman.

Netanyahu has been such a strong voice in the United States that it's easy to overlook his political problems back home. But these difficulties were highlighted by a range of analysts during a conference here this week organized by the Israeli Institute for National Security Studies (INSS) and Harvard University's Belfer Center, where I'm a fellow.

Israeli analysts note that Netanyahu's congressional speech blasting the Iran deal, which was so prominent and polarizing in the United States, didn't matter much in the Israeli election. He benefited from a late surge among conservative voters who were scared by his election-day warning of a massive Arab turnout. But these gains seem to have come partly at the expense of other conservative parties.

Yehuda Ben-Meir, a conservative former politician, argued in an analysis published by the INSS that Netanyahu's core bloc of right-wing and religious parties has actually been shrinking, falling from 65 parliament seats in 2009 to 61 in 2013 and 57 this year.

"Benn contends that the real winners in March were two minority groups that stand outside the Zionist mainstream, the ultra-Orthodox and the Israeli Arabs. He worries because these groups don't generally support the Israeli military.
To bolster his frail government, Netanyahu tried to woo his chief rival, Herzog, into a broad "national unity government." The two are said to have discussed such a pact over the past few weeks, but Netanyahu wasn't willing to offer concessions on the Palestinian issue that Herzog wanted. Netanyahu instead opted to lean further right by allying with Naftali Bennett's party, which adamantly opposes a Palestinian state. That chilled this week's negotiations with Herzog, but the idea of a broad coalition may return.

The U.S.-Israeli relationship is likely to be rocky for the remainder of Obama's presidency, assuming that Netanyahu continues his drive to scuttle the Iran agreement. This tension contrasts sharply with the U.S.-Arab fence-mending that is expected to take place next week at Camp David when Obama discusses with Gulf leaders a common strategy to curb Iranian meddling. It's a peculiar reversal of roles, in which the Gulf Arabs (who also criticize the Iran nuclear deal) are becoming the responsible and conciliatory opposition, while Netanyahu, who leads a country that is traditionally the United States' closest Mideast ally, remains at loggerheads with Obama.

Many Israeli analysts worry that the friction with Obama is eroding bipartisan support in the United States for Israel. But it's not a zero-sum game: An obvious potential beneficiary is the Republican Party. With Netanyahu's help, the Republicans may be attempting a realignment that seeks to convince pro-Israel voters that their natural home is the GOP, rather than a Democratic Party that keeps pressuring Israel for concessions. The GOP pulled off a similar realignment a generation ago in persuading white Southerners to abandon the Democrats.

A sign that conservative Americans and Israelis are seeking such a realignment would be pledges by GOP presidential candidates to work with Netanyahu to overturn the Iran deal. Obama, too, could drive a political wedge if he pushes for a new U.N. Security Council resolution that codifies the "parameters" of t he peace deal that Secretary of State John F. Kerry tried unsuccessfully to negotiate last year.

Netanyahu's camp hopes for a new opening with Gulf Arab states that share mistrust of Iran. A top Israeli official argues that the Jewish state is the only reliable partner for Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries in a region dominated by Iran-backed Shiite radicals, a Turkish-led Muslim Brotherhood bloc, and jihadists of al-Qaeda and the Islamic State. An Israeli-Arab alliance against Iran is intriguing. But like much else about Netanyahu's fledgling government, it's more an aspiration than a practical agenda. Netanyahu, so potent in the United States, has a shaky base at home.

Will Israel miss its moment?

By Fareed Zakaria

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Israel's new coalition government, formed with the slimmest possible majority in its parliament, likely means that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will act even more cautiously than he has in the past. This is a tragedy, because Israel faces an extraordinary strategic opportunity.

At first glance, it might seem absurd to speak hopefully about opportunities for Israel. The Middle East is in turmoil, Islamic radicalism is invading once-stable lands, Hezbollah and Hamas are active, and the Iranian nuclear danger persists. Add to this the repulsive anti-Semitism that is on the rise around the world — tolerated and encouraged in too many Muslim communities — and it looks like a very dangerous time for the Jewish state. That is what Netanyahu implied when explaining to NBC's Andrea Mitchell why he had backtracked on his support for a Palestinian state. "What has changed," he said, "is the reality." Reality has changed, but look beyond the headlines. On closer examination, one can see that it has changed dramatically in Israel's favor.

First, there is the disappearance of the Arab threat. From its first day in existence, Israel has faced the danger of extinction by Arab armies. This is the threat against which the Jewish state has planned, armed and trained for most of its national life. Today, it's gone.

The armies from Israel's main strategic adversaries — Iraq, Syria, Egypt — are in disarray, while the Israeli armed forces have become the region's superpower, in a league ahead of the rest. More important, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the smaller Gulf states find themselves in a tacit alliance with Israel against Iran. In Gen. Abdel Fatah al-Sissi, Israel is dealing with perhaps the most anti-Hamas (and tacitly pro-Israeli) president in Egypt's history.

To understand the depth of this strategic shift, consider this: It has been reported that Arabs are thinking about creating a combined armed force. The last two times that happened, in 1948 and 1967, the purpose was to wipe Israel off the map. Today, the aim is to fight Israel's main foe, Iran, which is why, one Haaretz commentator notes, "Not only is Israel not alarmed, it is actually ecstatic."

Second, Israel's major enemies are under greater pressure than ever before. Iran and Hezbollah are committed to defending the Bashar al-Assad regime in Syria — a daunting challenge, given that Assad represents the Alawites, who account for less than 15 percent of the country. Reports vary on how costly this support has been for Tehran — the Economist has cited a $15 billion figure, which would be the equivalent of about one year's total defense budget for Iran. Hezbollah has become bogged down in Syria, with hundreds of its fighters having died there. The Syrian conflict will likely continue to occupy and drain Iran and Hezbollah for years, a crippling problem with the price of oil having fallen, and with it, Iran's revenue.

Watching the conflicts in Syria, Iraq, Yemen and Libya, one cannot but think that Israel's main enemies — Shiite and Sunni extremists — are busy killing each other.

Of course, there is Iran's nuclear program, though it has significantly slowed for now. Whatever the outcome of nuclear negotiations, it is worth remembering that Israel has a powerful deterrent, by some accounts as many as 200 nuclear warheads, many of them on submarines. Similarly, it has built a wall that reduced terrorist attacks against Israel to virtually zero, and its Iron Dome defense system has blunted the threat from Hamas and Hezbollah rockets.

And there is Israel's economy, which continues to surge forward, outstripping the others in the region. As its waves of technological innovation and productivity continue, Israel finds itself courted by countries from China to India, which were once reluctant to even publicly acknowledge relations with Jerusalem.

So while it faces real dangers, Israel has policies to fight them with force and effectiveness. The danger for which it has no defense is that it continues to have control over Gaza and the West Bank, lands with 4.5 million people who have neither a country nor a vote. The feeling on the Israeli right, which now rules the country, seems to be that if the Palestinian problem is ignored, it will somehow solve itself. But it won't, and the tragedy is that this is the moment, with so many stars aligned in Israel's favor, when enlightened leadership could secure Israel permanently as a Jewish democratic state and make peace with its neighbors. It is a golden opportunity, and it is staring Netanyahu in the face.

Netanyahu to Obama: Haven't Given Up on Two-State Solution

Prime Minister Netanyahu and US President Obama exchanged platitudes in their first face-to-face meeting in over a year on Monday. Netanyahu declared he has not given up on peace with the Palestinians, while Obama stressed that Israel's security is one of his top foreign policy priorities. Speaking to reporters ahead of their private meeting, Obama said he would seek Netanyahu's thoughts on ways to lower tensions between Israelis and Palestinians and get the parties "back on a path towards peace." "I want to be very clear that we condemn in the strongest terms Palestinian violence against innocent Israeli citizens. And I want to repeat, once again, it is my strong belief that Israel has not just the right, but the obligation to protect itself," Obama said. "I want to make it clear we haven't given up on our hope for peace," Netanyahu told Obama, stressing he supports a two-state solution, with a demilitarized Palestinian state that recognizes the Jewish state.

White House Says PM's Comments 'Encouraging'

White House Spokesman Josh Earnest said Netanyahu's comments were "encouraging, but what matters is the follow through." He said Israel and the Palestinians must take a series of confidence-building measures, including a "reduction, if not an end" to the violence and the incitement and "a willingness on both sides to engage constructively." In addition, Earnest said that settlement construction is "counterproductive." The White House spokesman added it's unlikely that a peace deal — or peace talks at all — will be renewed in the last 4 months of Obama's term.

At Least Four Killed by Gunman at Jordan Training Center

A Jordanian officer shot dead two U.S. government security contractors, a South African trainer and a Jordanian translator at a U.S.-funded police training facility near Amman on Monday before being killed in a shootout, authorities said. U.S. officials have stated that the death toll is as high as eight, but gave no further details. The Jordanian government has denied the higher count. U.S. President Obama said he was treating the attack very seriously and a full investigation was under way.

Russian Weapons Chief: S-300 Deal with Iran has Been Signed

Russia and Iran have signed a contract on Moscow's delivery of the advanced S-300 missile defense system to the Islamic Republic, Sergei Chemezov, chief executive of Russian state-owned defense conglomerate Rostec, said Monday. The contract on delivery of S-300 to Iran has not only been signed by the sides but has already entered into force," Chemezov said at the Dubai Airshow-2015, according to Russian media. One of the most sophisticated anti-aircraft weapons in the world, the S-300 is capable of tracking multiple planes at once, and some versions have an interception range of up to 200 kilometers.

Security Experts: Iranian Hackers Targeted IL Nuclear Scientists

European authorities have taken action to take down a cyber espionage campaign believed to be linked to Iran's powerful Revolutionary Guard, which has targeted 1,600 high-profile targets, including Israeli nuclear scientists, NATO officials and Iranian dissidents, according to security researchers. The hacker group - dubbed "Rocket Kitten" by security experts who have been hunting the outfit since early 2014 - has mounted cyberattacks on high-profile political and military figures globally since that time, according to researchers from several cyber security firms who have monitored its activities. The action could hamper Tehran's efforts to gather sensitive intelligence from rivals including Israel, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and the United States which were among the nations targeted. "We have discovered the inner workings of a cyber espionage campaign," Shahar Tal, research group manager for US-Israeli security firm Check Point Software, told Reuters.

Zoabi: What is Happening in Israel is Worse than Germany

Coalition MKs blasted Joint List Mk Haneen Zoabi (Balad) on Monday after she compared Israelis to Nazis at a Kristallnacht commemoration event in Amsterdam on Sunday. "Kristallnacht didn't suddenly fall from the sky, come out of nowhere, it was the result of a development over time. We can see a similar development happening in Israel over the last several years," Zoabi said Sunday afternoon. Zoabi's appearance was organized by Platform Stop Racism and Exclusion, a far-left group that is shunned by local Jews for its members' perceived animosity toward Israel and sympathy for Hamas. About 200 people attended the event. In response to the speech, Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovely responded saying her appearance at an event commemorating Kristallnacht was a "mockery." "Haneen Zoabi uses the tragedy of the Jewish people in order to spread her lies and slander, while she herself encourages terrorism and the murder of Jews."

Ya'alon: High Probability that a Bomb Caused the Plane Crash

The investigation of the Metro-Jet plane crash in the Sinai Peninsula continues to occupy the Defense and Intelligence agencies around the world. In a briefing to reporters on Monday, Defense Minister Moshe (Bogi) Ya'alon estimated that an explosive device caused the crash. "We understand that there is very high probability that it was an attack," said Ya'alon. "We are not part of the investigation, but it seems we're talking about an explosive device which exploded inside the airplane." At the same time Ya'alon refused to comment on the CNN report according to which Israeli Intelligence is the source of the information that ISIS planted the bomb in the plane. Israel is concerned about the success of the ISIS branch in Sinai to carry out an attack of this magnitude, indicating high operational skills. This is a prestigious attack which may be followed by a transfer of a large sum of money and weapons from the ISIS leadership in Iraq. In recent days, since the plane crash, the Egyptian army has launched a significant assault on ISIS terrorists in northern Sinai.

Obama and Netanyahu Will Talk, but Won't Say Anything

The prime minister has embarked on a trip to Washington in order to meet with the American president, however the meeting will amount to nothing due to their non-existent relationship.

By Nahum Barnea

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu departed for Washington on Sunday afternoon, and is set to meet with President Barack Obama at the White House on Monday. It will most likely be a business-like meeting: Obama will likely pay off the debt of promises he made to Democratic senators in exchange for their votes to approve the Iran deal; this debt includes advanced military equipment for Israel, and maybe even some funds. But nothing more – no defense pacts, no guarantees.

Netanyahu held up his end of the deal: He promised the White House that his speech against the Iran deal at the UN General Assembly meeting would be his last on the matter; and he has kept his word. The threats to urge Republicans in Congress to enact new sanctions have all but disappeared, as if they were never uttered.

Netanyahu is convinced that Obama is a disaster for America, and an enemy of Israel; Obama is convinced that Netanyahu is a pathological liar, and a disaster for Israel. Nothing they will say in public will change that reality.

In a meeting between leaders, after the cameras have been shooed out of the room, a sense of intimacy normally takes hold. Most politicians have similar domestic problems: They can vent about them to each other. They can maintain eye contact. President Bush once said that he learned the nature of a leader by looking into their eyes. He looked into Putin's eyes and believed him. There is no chance that Obama will experience this sense of intimacy in his meeting with Netanyahu. Regardless, they have things to discuss.

For example, the issue of Jordan. The Americans know of the tear between Netanyahu and King Abdullah, and they are concerned with its possible outcome. The king has refused Netanyahu's calls and has leveled some serious criticism against him. The reason for this has been the recent tensions over the Temple Mount. The Temple Mount is Jordan's last true outpost in the territories. The Muslim world tasked the King of Jordan with safeguarding the holy sites. The government of Jordan pays the salaries of the Islamic waqf's workers, and influences their actions.

At the height of the clashes on the Temple Mount, Netanyahu agreed that Jordan would be responsible for security cameras that will be placed at every corner of the Temple Mount. The government of Jordan's announcement of the deal was supposed to make Amman appear as an active party in all happenings in the West Bank, while beating back domestic criticism over its peace with Israel.

Right wing officials in Israel protested Netanyahu's compromise. Why would Israel agree to weaken its hold on the Temple Mount? It would be a surrender to the forces of terror. Why Jordan? Netanyahu reneged.

The king was then seen as a liar and collaborator. The anger was great. Under pressure, Netanyahu backtracked on rejecting the deal. Now he is ready to approve the deal, while leaving the details up for negotiation, hoping that the issue will be all but forgotten by the time the negotiations convene. He would be all too happy to have Obama or Kerry mend his ties with Abdullah.

The two could discuss the Palestinian issue. Obama will say that he whole-heartedly supports Israel's right to defend itself, but asks himself what will happen the day after. Does Israel have anything to offer? Netanyahu will talk about terrorism, incitement, and Abbas' inciting speeches. In light of that, he will say that he is ready to renew peace talks without preconditions, anywhere, even tomorrow. Obama will smile: He has already heard this speech time and again. He is convinced that Netanyahu's version of negotiations only serves the purpose of playing for time.

Obama will then say that Kerry had convinced Abbas to hold off on any diplomatic steps until Netanyahu's visit to Washington. What can Kerry say to him now?

Netanyahu will repeat his tired speech. Negotiations, at any time, even tomorrow. "I even froze settlement construction," he will add. "Sadly, that's just not enough anymore," Obama will say.

"Will the US veto the resolution that New Zealand plans to put to a vote at the Security Council?" Netanyahu will ask. Any resolution that talks about 1967 borders will complicate the situation. It's doubtful that Obama will commit to anything. He would prefer to let Netanyahu sweat a bit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"What do you think about the state of the Palestinian Authority?" Obama will ask. If they still had any trust between them, Netanyahu would tell Obama that officials within the Israeli defense establishment have grown frustrated with the Authority, and place their trust on Hamas. Hamas is popular today, both in the West Bank and Gaza. The Palestinian Authority is seen as a weakened and corrupt actor, which does not care for the good of the Palestinian people. The future belongs to Hamas. All the better that Hamas is less effective against Israel within the international organizations. Netanyahu will almost surely be content with raising objections to Abbas' speech.

They could talk about Syria and Hezbollah, or ISIS. They will talk, but they won't really say anything. "It was a good meeting," the White House spokesman will say to the media. "The two discussed all the issues on the agenda." "Excellent meeting," Netanyahu will say.

Amos Oz, BDS's Man of the Year

It's okay to criticize the government in a way which can be accepted by most Israelis, but when this 'criticism' is mainly used by the campaign for Israel's destruction - you become part of it.

By Ben Dror Yemini

Amos Oz will win the BDS campaign's man of the year award. It's strange, because the Israeli author is against the BDS movement. But he recently announced that he would boycott state-sponsored events around the world.

There is nothing original about this move. Oz is joining a new trend of a small and noisy minority among US Jews: We love Israel, we are Zionist, but we are basically joining the boycott against Israel. It's true that the leaders of the boycott campaign are against peace, it's true that they are against two states, it's true that they object to the actual existence of the State of Israel, it's true that they mainly identify with Hamas - but does that really matter? Intellectuals, as much as others, must join trends. Now Oz is one of them, and it's sad.

It's sad because the Zionist Oz - an Israel lover, not an Israel hater - symbolizes the tragedy of the Israeli Zionist left.

During Operation Protective Edge, Oz made sensible comments which angered the radical left. Oz delivered two important lectures this year and combined them into one article, in which he laments what we are going through. He does not share the left's illusions on the Palestinians. He does not disregard the right's fears over what will happen here if there is an agreement. And he reaches the conclusion that there is no escape from pursuing an agreement and a separation. For our sake, he argues, for our sake. It's a national interest. I support almost every sentence in the article. Occasionally, maybe not as often as I should, I write it myself.

And this is where the tragedy lies: Because the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. You can't make rebuking comments of a loving person, which can be accepted by most Israelis, including a large part of right-wing voters, and at the same time join Israel haters' operation pattern.

And that's the exact story of a large part of the Israeli left: It's okay to criticize the government. It's okay to warn of wrongs. It's okay to equip hundreds of Palestinians with cameras, so that once in a few months someone will be able to catch a soldier beating or cursing a Palestinian. But when this "criticism" is mainly used by the campaign for Israel's destruction - you become part of it.

Worse: The Palestinians have repeatedly turned down serious offers for an agreement, but instead of condemning them you have excused and justified them. You are not bringing the reconciliation closer. You are turning Israel into a monster. And if Israel is a monster, then BDS is the right answer.

Now it's Oz. He loves Israel but is basically supporting BDS. What will intellectuals invited to cultural events at an Israeli embassy say? Like Oz, they love Israel, but are critical towards it. If one of the most important writers in Israel boycotts the embassy, why should they act any differently? They too will explain their move in the important newspapers. And the explanation, as we know, will be based on the publications of the propaganda of lies, which are turning Israel into a fascist and criminal state.

It's true that NATO, UN, British and US soldiers have hurt civilians in conflict areas, in a relative and absolute manner, much more than IDF soldiers have hurt the Palestinians (I present these figures from every possible stage). It's true that the Palestinians have repeatedly turned down any offer based on two states for two people. It's true that they are not stopping the incitement campaign for a moment. But that doesn't really matter, as long as Breaking the Silence activists run from one campus to another to recruit more people.

I feel sorry for Amos Oz. I feel sorry for the camp which used to be a peace camp. It has failed to bring peace closer, but has succeeded in bolstering the Palestinian rejectionist camp and the campaign for Israel's destruction.

2016 Campaign

Monday, Feb. 1 is game day in Iowa!

An Iowa win might make the Trump train unstoppable: "A top official of a rival GOP campaign... said: 'If Donald Trump wins Iowa, I think he has won-period. Ted Cruz is supposed to win Iowa. If Trump wins, he'll be on a trajectory to come out of the SEC primaries [March 1] with close to triple the delegates of anyone else.'" Eli Stokols, Politico

Trump GOP debate strategy worked: "The real reason [Trump] skipped out was to create a circular GOP fire squad - with Ted Cruz at the center. And it worked.... It was the worst possible time - on the eve of the deadlocked Iowa caucuses - for Cruz to stumble." Glenn Thrush, Politico

GOP leaders want to take down Cruz: "Many are trying to salvage the campaign of Sen. Marco Rubio (or any other more-mainstream alternative)...Republican leaders detest Cruz so much that they're willing to run the risk an unelectable Republican will glide to the nomination." Josh Kraushaar, Nat'l Journal

The Economy

US economy slowed to 0.7% growth rate in the last 3 months of 2015: This is just the second time in almost two years that the nation has registered growth under 1%. "Tepid global growth is exposing new weaknesses in the nation's long and sluggish recovery." Chico Harlan, Wash Post

Survey reflects boosted American consumer confidence for 2nd month in a row: The survey shows "more people planning to buy homes in the next six months for the first time since December 2013... and the highest number of respondents expecting higher interest rates over the next year since 2006." Chicago Tribune

Wary Fed keeps options open: "Fed officials expressed renewed worry about financial-market turbulence and slow economic growth abroad, leaving doubts about whether the central bank will raise interest rates as early as March." Jon Hilsenrath & Ben Leubsdorf, WSJ "Fed officials have emphasized that their policy decisions will depend on the health of the recovery. If it proves stronger than expected, the central bank may raise rates more quickly than forecast. But if the economy stumbles, the Fed could draw out the process even longer." Ylan Q. Mui, Wash Post

Anti-Fed two-step: "It's a very dubious claim that the Fed could have prevented the crisis with more aggressive policy in 2008; it's three-card monte to transmute that into the claim that the Fed caused the crisis." Paul Krugman (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, NY Times

The Russian energy minister said Saudi Arabia proposed that oil-producing countries trim output: "Oil prices were nearly 3% higher in first oil 3-day win streak of 2016." The first global deal in over a decade could help "clear a glut that has depressed prices for over a year and a half." CNBC

African-Americans were more likely to start a new business in the years following the recession, while white-owned businesses grew smaller in number. "However, in contrast to this trend, the average worth of a white-owned business was almost three times greater than its black counterpart," according to a new report. Kate Davidson, WSJ

Obama proposes a new plan that allows small businesses to be part of multi-employer pension plans. "These businesses would receive greater tax breaks if they met certain standards for their offered retirement plans." Jonnelle Marte, Wash Post

Please find attached and below my prepared testimony for a hearing on "The 2016 Economic Report of the President" before the Joint Economic Committee.

Prepared Testimony:

Chairman Coats, Vice Chairman Tiberi, Ranking Member Maloney, and Members of the Committee:

Thank you for the opportunity to appear here today to discuss the 70th annual Economic Report of the President, which the Council of Economic Advisers released last week. This year's Report reviews the substantial progress that the U.S. economy has made in recent years, describes the headwinds posed by the global economic situation, and outlines a number of key areas to promote robust, sustainable, and shared long-run growth.

As we note in this year's Report, 2015 was a year of continued strength in the domestic economy despite substantial headwinds from abroad. This was particularly clear in the ongoing robust recovery in our labor markets. At the end of 2015, the United States marked the strongest two years of job growth since the 1990s (Figure 1) and the largest two-year decline in the unemployment rate since the 1980s, all while continuing the longest streak of monthly private-sector job growth on record.

Figure 1
Average Monthly Total Nonfarm Job Growth by Year, 2007–2015

Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics, Current Employment Statistics.

As of January, the unemployment rate stood at 4.9 percent, its lowest level since February 2008. As recently as 2014, many economists expected that the unemployment rate would remain above 5.0 percent until at least 2020 (Figure 2). At the same time, the labor force participation rate was relatively stable over the past year, as improving economic conditions partially offset the drag on participation from the retirement of the Baby Boom generation. And perhaps most importantly, over the past six months, nominal hourly earnings for private-sector workers have grown at their fastest pace since the Great Recession—although more work remains to boost wages and middle-class incomes. As the labor market continues to improve, we will not need to maintain the same pace of job growth to keep unemployment low. In fact, CEA estimates the break-even rate of employment growth—the rate needed to maintain a constant unemployment rate over the next year if the labor force participation rate moves in line with demographic trends—at 78,000 jobs per month.

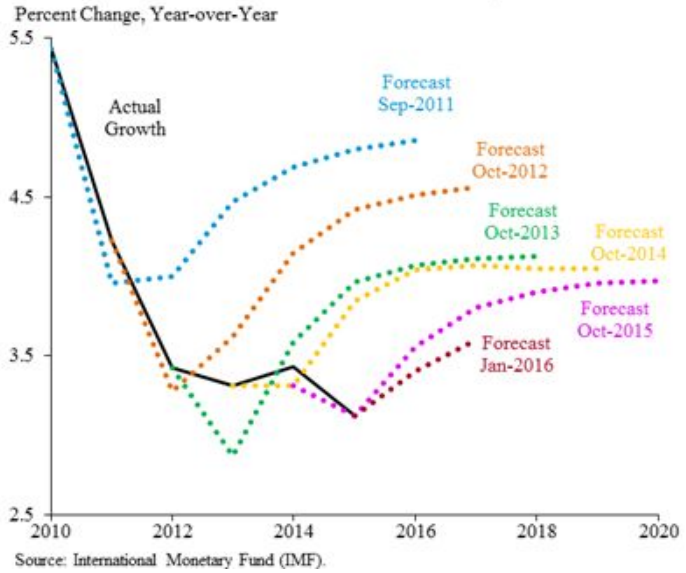
Note: Annual forecasts are current as of March of the stated year. Black dashed line represents December 2015 value (5.0 percent). Shading denotes recession.
Source: Bureau of Labor Statistics, Current Population Survey; Blue Chip Economic Indicators.

Other indicators also point to continued strength in the domestic economy in 2015. Over the past four quarters, multiple survey measures of consumer confidence reached highs not seen in over a decade. Real domestic demand grew, with personal consumption and fixed investment increasing 2.7 percent over the four quarters of 2015, bolstered by solid growth of real disposable personal income, continued potential for residential investment growth, and record-setting investment in research and development. Finally, CEA estimates that the economy saw a modest direct positive boost from the recent steep decline in oil prices, as the benefits to consumers exceeded the costs to domestic energy producers.



The United States has had the strongest productivity growth of any of the G-7 economies over the past ten years, but this growth has lagged our historic performance. As a result, while U.S. job growth has outperformed expectations, real GDP growth has failed to do so. CEA analysis, discussed in this year's Report, finds that a substantial portion of the slowdown in productivity growth reflects diminished investment in the wake of the Great Recession. To the extent that investment rebounds, and to the extent that the economy benefits from the rapid growth of private research and development—currently at its highest-ever level as a share of the economy—stronger productivity growth would be expected in the future. Continued monitoring of this important aspect of the economy will be important in the years ahead.

Our domestic progress is all the more notable in light of the substantial headwinds that the United States faces from the global economy. The International Monetary Fund estimates that global economic growth was 3.1 percent on a year-over-year basis in 2015, the slowest since 2009 and a continuation of downgrades to the global growth forecast (Figure 3). The United States had the highest growth rate of any major advanced economy, and growth in the euro area is estimated to have picked up slightly, but slowing growth in a number of large emerging markets weighed heavily on the global economy in 2015. On a year-over-year basis, China, for example, saw its slowest real GDP growth in decades, while both Brazil's and Russia's economies contracted sharply.

Weak growth abroad served as a drag on U.S. exports, with exports subtracting 0.1 percentage point from real GDP growth in 2015, down from a positive annual contribution of 0.5 percentage point in 2013 and 2014. This decline in exports was a key reason that U.S. GDP growth slowed to 1.9 percent during the four quarters of 2015 after growth of 2.5 percent in both 2013 and 2014. The Administration expects continued headwinds from the global economy in the year ahead, and we will continue both to monitor these developments and to engage with our key trading partners across both advanced economies and emerging markets to work to improve global growth.

Particularly in light of both recent global productivity data and these adverse developments in global demand, it is important that we work to strengthen domestic growth by boosting productivity and dynamism in the U.S. economy. It is also critical that we work to ensure that the benefits of economic growth are shared broadly, and, to this end, the 2016 Economic Report of the President lays out the President's agenda for "inclusive growth." Despite progress since the Great Recession, the highly unequal distribution of income, wealth, and opportunity remains one of the greatest challenges facing our economy. While the problem is not unique to the United States, inequality in the United States is higher and, in recent decades, has risen faster than in other major advanced economies (Figure 4).

Figure 4
Share of Income Earned by Top 1 Percent, 1975–2014

Note: Data for all countries exclude capital gains.
Source: World Wealth and Income Database (Alvaredo et al. 2015).

Some of this increase is a natural consequence of competitive markets—a result of differences in productivity as technology evolves. But some of the increase may reflect the rising influence of "economic rents," income captured by companies and workers beyond what their productivity justifies. The apparent increase in rents in recent decades and their increasingly unequal distribution have contributed to overall inequality without boosting productivity, providing opportunities to improve both efficiency and equity in the U.S. economy.

The President's agenda for inclusive growth addresses both sources of inequality, making competitive markets work better by increasing opportunity and by combatting the trend of rising, unequally divided rents. Competition most effectively promotes economic growth when it is open to the widest pool of talent—so the President supports promoting equality of opportunity by investing in education, supporting children in low-income families, and ensuring a fair criminal justice system. And the President supports policies to make markets more competitive by reducing overall economic rents—through promoting more open and competitive markets, balanced intellectual property rules, and a smarter approach to occupational licensing regulation, among other policies—and policies to ensure those rents are divided more fairly, by encouraging worker voice and raising the minimum wage. This agenda for inclusive growth can help ensure that the benefits of our resurgent economy are shared with all American households.

Other sections of this year's Report lay out additional steps we can, and should, take to ensure a strong domestic economy that benefits all Americans. One chapter focuses on disparities in opportunity that appear at an early age and the long-run benefits of investment in the education, health, and well-being of children. Comparisons show persistent, large gaps in early health and cognitive skills of young children across households of different income levels, different races and ethnicities, and different family structures (Figure 5). Research demonstrates that direct investments in children can help to close gaps in these important outcomes and can have lasting, positive effects.

Source: Duncan and Magnuson (2011).

Another chapter highlights the critical importance of infrastructure to economic growth and productivity. The quality of U.S. infrastructure has deteriorated since the mid-2000s, and the age of our public structures has increased in recent years (Figure 6). Efficient infrastructure investment boosts the productive capacity of our economy and can also protect the environment by shifting users towards cleaner forms of transportation, like public transit, and supporting the use of clean and renewable energy to reduce carbon emissions.

Figure 6

Note: Water supply facilities and sewer systems exclude Federal structures—which account for at most 6 percent of the value of their combined capital stock—because disaggregated Federal data are unavailable. Data for power and transportation fixed assets begin in 1997 because disaggregated data are unavailable for years prior to 1997.
Source: Bureau of Economic Analysis.

The Report also discusses a variety of developments in innovation, with attention to recent technological changes and their implications for productivity growth and for American workers. On the occasion of CEA's 70th anniversary, this year's Report also takes a look back at several key moments in the Council's seven-decade history and reviews CEA's role in economic policymaking across twelve Administrations.

I look forward to discussing these and other topics with you all today.

Conservative author admits evidence on Hillary Clinton is circumstantial

In back-to-back interviews over the past 24 interviews, conservative author Peter Schweizer admits he doesn't have direct evidence that Hillary Clinton intervened to assist individuals and entities because they donated large sums of money to the Clinton Foundation. On ABC yesterday, Schweizer was asked if he had proof that Hillary Clinton directly took action to benefit a Clinton Foundation donor from the sale of a uranium mining company. "No, we don't have direct evidence. But it warrants further investigation because, again, ... this is part of the broader pattern. You either have to come to the conclusion that these are all coincidences or something else is afoot." In an interview with NBC's Savannah Guthrie this morning , Schweizer said, "What we have is a pattern of behavior," adding that this pattern consistently shows Clinton Foundation donors benefiting from Hillary Clinton's State Department. More Schweizer: "I think it should be [criminally] investigated... I don't think a quid-pro-quo needs to be a standard," citing the charges that brought down former Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell. When Guthrie asked him about his ties to the conservative movement and GOP politics, Schweizer said, "I am not claiming to be neutral," though he also stated that he's taken on conservatives, too.

Conservative author admits evidence on Hillary Clinton is circumstantial

Clinton Foundation: "Yes, we made mistakes"

Meanwhile, in a blog post on Sunday , the Clinton Foundation's acting CEO, Maura Pally, acknowledged that the Clinton Foundation made mistakes in its filings of 990 tax forms. "Our total revenue was accurately reported on each year's form - our error was that government grants were mistakenly combined with other donations... So yes, we made mistakes, as many organizations of our size do, but we are acting quickly to remedy them, and have taken steps to ensure they don't happen in the future." Pally also explained why some Clinton Foundation-related donations weren't disclosed like others were -- because they were to a Canadian offshoot. "[T]he Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership (Canada) is publicly listed as a donor on our website. But as it is a distinct Canadian organization, separate from the Clinton Foundation, its individual donors are not listed on the site. This is hardly an effort on our part to avoid transparency - unlike in the U.S., under Canadian law; all charities are prohibited from disclosing individual donors without prior permission from each donor."

Why is the Clinton Foundation STILL taking foreign donations?

But here's a big question that we have as Hillary Clinton has begun her presidential candidacy and as she stands a decent chance of sitting in the Oval Office in 2017: Why is the Clinton Foundation taking ANY foreign money at all? As we wrote last week, and as Pally confirms in her blog post, the Clinton Foundation still receives foreign money from six foreign countries -- Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, and the U.K. A Clinton Foundation official has told NBC News, "You just can't pull the plug" on existing programs, especially when they involve multi-year grants. But in a world where appearances do matter, should the Clinton Foundation be receiving those donations anymore?

Jeb: I've raised more money in 100 days than any GOP operation in history

The New York Times : "Jeb Bush told donors [in Miami] that he believed his political action committee had raised more money in 100 days than any other modern Republican political operation, according to those who heard him." Of course, there's one hitch with any record: The money Jeb is raising is through his Super PAC, which is able to raise unlimited amounts of money. And while the Clinton Foundation money is legitimately receiving attention, so should the loophole that Jeb Bush is exploiting in campaign finance law -- that presidential candidates can't coordinate with Super PACs. But since Jeb TECHNICALLY isn't a presidential candidate, he's raising all of this money for his Super PAC.

George W. Bush comments on his brother's campaign, Obama's Iran policy

Over the weekend, it turned out Jeb Bush's older brother -- former President George W. Bush -- made some news. The Washington Post : "At a closed-door dinner Saturday night before nearly 800 members of the Republican Jewish Coalition, the 43rd president noted that it could hurt former Florida governor Jeb Bush if he campaigned alongside another Bush who served in the White House, according to several attendees. 'He said that one of the challenges his brother is going to have is that the country doesn't like dynasties,' recalled David Volosov, a RJC member from Silver Spring, Md. 'People are going to say, "Oh, here comes another Bush." His response is that he is going to stay as far as way as he can. He is going to stay away from the whole process.'" More from the New York Times : "Mr. Bush voiced skepticism about the Obama administration's pursuit of a nuclear deal with Iran. Although he had begun the diplomatic effort to press Iran to give up its nuclear program, Mr. Bush questioned whether it was wise to lift sanctions against Tehran when the Islamic government seemed to be caving in, and suggested that the United States risked losing leverage if it did so."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OBAMA AGENDA: A different Abe (Shinzo) to address Congress

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe will be the first Japanese leader to address a joint session of Congress this week -- and he'll talk about his nation's role in global security. The Wall Street Journal: "When Shinzo Abe goes to Washington for a pomp-filled visit this week, the Japanese leader faces a delicate balancing act: selling Americans on his vision of the future-a newly vibrant, muscular, more equal Japanese partner-while trying to quell doubts stoked by his views of the past."

The New York Times explores the administration's efforts to take its cybersecurity pitch to a skeptical Silicon Valley.

The Washington Post ed board backs Obama on trade. "With a furious political battle over trade looming on Capitol Hill, it's high time Mr. Obama personally and aggressively took on the phony arguments that "progressives" are marshalling in a desperate attempt to block trade measures whose merits would withstand honest scrutiny."

In rare comments on global issues, George W. Bush took on Obama's foreign policy, criticizing the Iran deal and his efforts to counter the Islamic State, writes Bloomberg.

CONGRESS: Will GOP amendments doom bipartisan Iran legislation?

"A bill to give Congress a voice in the nuclear deal with Iran is now endangered by Republican amendments that would peel away bipartisan support for a measure begrudgingly accepted by the White House this month," writes the New York Times.

More, from POLITICO : "Republican and Democratic leaders, who back the review bill, plan to muster enough votes to block any seriously problematic amendments while still allowing their members to take some political potshots. If they let through any bombshells that significantly undermine the White House's negotiations, they risk losing Democratic support and the veto-proof majority that Corker has painstakingly assembled.

The odd media story around Harry Reid's New Years Day accident continues with this, from the Las Vegas Sun: "A Las Vegas man claims he started a false rumor that the injuries suffered by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid several months ago were the result of an attack by Reid's brother, not an exercise accident."

OFF TO THE RACES: GOP struggling to adjust to gay-marriage landscape

Here's the Des Moines Register's wrap of the Iowa Faith and Freedom Coalition's Saturday cattle call.

Big picture, in the New York Times : "Republican presidential candidates are struggling to adjust to a rapidly changing legal, political and cultural landscape this primary season, as the Supreme Court prepares to hear arguments Tuesday on whether same-sex marriage is a constitutionally protected right."

BUSH: In Miami Beach, Jeb Bush told super PAC donors that they've raised more money in the organization's first 100 days than any other Republican operation in history.

CLINTON: Hillary Clinton writes a Des Moines Register op-ed: "When I came to Iowa, I wanted to do something a little different. No big speeches or rallies. Just talking directly with everyday Iowans. Because this campaign isn't going to be about me, it's going to be about Iowans and people across our country who are ready for a better future. It's not enough to just get by, you deserve to get ahead and stay ahead. And everywhere I went, I met Iowans with great ideas for how we can get there."

The acting chief executive of the Clinton Foundation admits that the organization "made mistakes" in how it disclosed donors.

More, from the Washington Post : "Nevertheless, the foundation explained for the first time publicly that one of its affiliates - a Canada-based charity that bears Bill Clinton's name - would continue to keep its donors secret because of restrictions in Canadian law."

Here's Savannah Guthrie's interview with "Clinton Cash" author Peter Schweizer.

CRUZ: The gay businessman who hosted an event for Ted Cruz has apologized for showing "poor judgment."

RUBIO: He detailed his immigration philosophy to the Des Moines Register ed board.

WEBB: He attended a private event with veterans in Des Moines.

And around the country...

PROP 8 ATTORNEYS: MARRIAGE EQUALITY COMING SOON

The lawyers who argued in favor of overturning California's same-sex ban in front the Supreme Court said Sunday they believe the votes exist for the Supreme Court to rule in favor of legalizing same-sex marriage in all 50 states.

David Boies and Ted Olsen said on Meet the Press that based on a previous ruling that struck down the federal Defense of Marriage Act - which prevented legally married same-sex couples from receiving federal benefits - the Court will rule to overturn the ban.

"If you read what the Supreme Court said in that case, there's really no other way for the Supreme Court to come out in the case that's up for argument on Tuesday," Ted Olson said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"The first part of that case is whether states have to recognize the rights of individuals who wish to get married in that state. I think that will end the debate right there."

They said that the impact of the ruling will be based on the number of justices voting one way or the other.

"I think civil rights cases ought to be decided 9-0 or 8-1, the way the racial and civil rights decisions were largely made," David Boies said in the same interview.

"It sends a message that this country doesn't tolerate discrimination. So, I think the more justices that sign on, the better."

However, the likelihood of a unanimous or near-unanimous decision is unlikely based on the votes of other cases. "We were hoping that all nine justices would fall in line once the case finally was decided because of the inherent rights of individuals," Olson said.

"I'm still optimistic it'll be more than five votes. But we can count the justices that already decided the Defense of Marriage case and their explanation for why they decided that."

Public opinion on same-sex marriage, which has changed rapidly in the last five years, will also influence the justices. At the time California's same-sex marriage ban was overturned, less of the country was in favor of legalization, Boies said.

"Now overwhelmingly it's taken over the country," he said. "Just in the last couple of years, we've seen a tremendous movement that I think makes it easier now for the Supreme Court to make that total decision."

Subject: Initial Economic Questions for Republicans

On economic issues, I know Jake and his team will come up with a good list, but there are already two proposals on the table that I think we should try to get all GOPers to weigh in on:
--Rubio's tax plan that includes dropping the top rate for those making over $400k from 39.6 to 35.
--Rand Paul's 17% flat tax.
Also, it would be great to get:
--Dodd/Frank -- repeal? CFPB repeal?
--repeal of carried interest tax break
--repeal of oil company tax breaks
We already have the Senators' votes on Elizabeth Warren's student loan refinancing bills. We might get the other candidates too.
We might also get reaction to paid leave.

The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Differences surface in McCain-Obama Christian forum (USA Today 8/17/08)
By Cathy Lynn Grossman
Sen. Barack Obama, frequently leaning on Bible passages, and Sen. John McCain, sharply delineating his opposition to abortion, sought to burnish their Christian credentials with voters Saturday night in a civil forum at a California megachurch.

McCain Comes up Big at Faith Forum (Brody File 8/17/08)
By David Brody
...Overall, I thought John McCain helped himself tremendously. The money line was the following: "I will be a pro-life President and this presidency will have pro-life policies. That's my commitment to you." Evangelicals have been waiting to hear John McCain say that for quite some time.

McCain's "Cross In The Dirt" Story (Atlantic Online 8/17/08)
By Andrew Sullivan
I've now heard it countless times. McCain has used what appears to be an intensely personal moment in a prison camp as a reason to vote for him in a campaign ad. As he tells it today, it was the pivotal moment in his struggle to survive in the Hanoi Hilton. And yet, in his first thorough account of his time in captivity, in 1973, the story is absent. The story is also hauntingly like that recounted by Solzhenitsen, as told in Luke Veronis, "The Sign of the Cross"

There was one rule evangelical pastor Rick Warren wanted to make clear about his questions to both candidates during his forum on Saturday night, and he said it more than once. "Don't give me your stump speech on these." ...John McCain, who has been deemed a "maverick" for years, played the part well and seemed not to play by Warren's guideline. Instead, he took the opportunity during the discussion, carried live by cable news networks, to stick hard to the message he's been driving across the country since running for president.

Rick Warren Questions McCain (The Page 8/16/08)
The Senator sits down with Rick Warren, to answer questions similar to the ones posed to Sen. Obama. McCain did not hear the questions Warren asked Obama. First asked to name three wise people he would rely on: answers David Petraeus, John Lewis, and Meg Whitman. Says he would NOT have nominated Justices Ginsburg, Souter, Breyer or Stevens. Says his greatest moral failing was the failure of his first marriage. Gets strong audience reaction to emotional tellings of Vietnam POW stories and his position on abortion and gay marriage.

Response to 9/11 Offers Outline of McCain Doctrine (NYT 8/17/08)
By DAVID D. KIRKPATRICK
Senator John McCain arrived late at his Senate office on the morning of Sept. 11, 2001, just after the first plane hit the World Trade Center. "This is war," he murmured to his aides. The sound of scrambling fighter planes rattled the windows, sending a tremor of panic through the room. Within hours, Mr. McCain, the Vietnam War hero and famed straight talker of the 2000 Republican primary, had taken on a new role: the leading advocate of taking the American retaliation against Al Qaeda far beyond Afghanistan. In a marathon of television and radio appearances, Mr. McCain recited a short list of other countries said to support terrorism, invariably including Iraq, Iran and Syria.

Rivals Differ (a Bit) on Financial Market Rules (NYT 8/16/08)
By JACKIE CALMES
Modernizing the nation's New Deal-era defenses against financial disaster is not high among the priorities that either Barack Obama or John McCain list for the next president. But events could well plop the issue right in the middle of the winner's plate. After a string of financial scandals and crises, a quarter century of deregulation and free-market experimentation is giving way to a new round of big-government financial regulation, regardless of who captures the White House, experts say.

McCain, Obama pushed pet projects in letters (Washington Times 8/15/08)
By Jim McElhatton
More than a year before launching his White House campaign, Sen. John McCain wrote a letter urging the Bush administration to set aside tens of millions of dollars to build a new port of entry in Arizona to allow more trucks to cross the U.S.-Mexico border. ...The letters from both presidential candidates, obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, reveal a side of the budget process largely overshadowed by the "earmarking" practice that Mr. McCain frequently assails on the campaign trail. With increasing negativity surrounding earmarking, by which members of Congress slip pet projects into broader bills, lawmakers frequently push for projects in their home states by sending requests directly to federal agencies.

The Candidate We Still Don't Know (NYT 8/17/08)
By FRANK RICH
...So why isn't Obama romping? The obvious answer — and both the excessively genteel Obama campaign and a too-compliant press bear responsibility for it — is that the public doesn't know who on earth John McCain is. The most revealing poll this month by far is the Pew Research Center survey finding that 48 percent of Americans feel they're "hearing too much" about Obama. Pew found that only 26 percent feel that way about McCain, and that nearly 4 in 10 Americans feel they hear too little about him. ...What is widely known is the skin-deep, out-of-date McCain image.

A Race McCain Could Win (Washington Post 8/17/08)
By George F. Will; B07
Last August, John McCain's campaign was a guttering candle, out of money but flush with half-baked ideas that were unlikely to be improved by further baking. Anyway, to have many ideas is to have too many for a campaign's concluding sprint, and McCain's revival has not been robust enough to bring him even with Barack Obama. Now McCain's rejuvenated hopes rest on his ability to recast this election, focusing it on who should lead America in a world suddenly darkened by Russia's war of European conquest.

The Export of Jobs (Washington Post 8/17/08)
Mr. Obama's remedy could hurt more workers than it helps.... BARACK OBAMA says that he would "end tax breaks for corporations that ship jobs overseas" and blasts John McCain for refusing to condemn such loopholes. One week before Democrats gather to nominate Sen. Barack Obama to be president, polls show the Illinois lawmaker locked in a dead heat with Republican Sen. John McCain, who now leads among white voters overall and has gained among Republicans, evangelicals and white working-class people. Although the Pew Research Center survey was largely conducted before the military hostilities precipitated by Russia's Aug. 8 invasion of neighboring Georgia, its findings underscored the mostly favorable reviews that defense analysts gave to Mr. McCain's response to the crisis.

McCain reopens the national security gap (Politico 8/18/08)
By: David Paul Kuhn
Less than two years after Democrats finally bridged the decades-long gap between the parties on national security issues, Republicans have opened it right back up — a shift likely tied to the party's new standard-bearer John McCain and the perception of improvements in Iraq. The reemergence of the national security gap comes amid the first headline-grabbing world conflict of the 2008 campaign — the Russian invasion of Georgia that highlights the potential for a dramatic military event to upend the political landscape, and likely aid McCain. July's NBC News/Wall Street Journal Poll found that three in four Americans believe McCain can "handle" the role of commander in chief, while only 19 percent said he "cannot," compared to a 50 percent to 42 percent split for Obama.

Subject: [big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer -- Obama's Nobel Peace Prize

Obama's Nobel Prize Is Really a Tribute to American Voters

President Obama's Nobel Peace Prize is more than anything else a tribute to America's voters. In making the award, the Nobel Committee said, "The question we have to ask is, who has done the most in the previous year to enhance peace in the world, and who has done more than Barack Obama?"

Of course the most important thing Obama did to enhance peace in the world, was to win the election – and once elected, to chart a course for American foreign policy that is fundamentally different, in both substance and tone, from that of the Bush-Cheney years.

Obama greeted the news of the award by saying it was a "call to action," and there is no doubt that it creates an even higher expectation for him to live up to in the years ahead. But more than anything else, this award celebrates the fact that American voters chose a President committed to progressive values – committed to strengthening international diplomacy and cooperation between peoples instead of pre-emptive war and the Neo-Con theories of unilateral action.

In its statement, the Committee said he had "created a new climate in international politics…. Only very rarely has a person to the same extent as Obama captured the world's attention and given its people hope for a better future." It continued, "his diplomacy is founded in the concept that those who are to lead the world must do so on the basis of values and attitudes that are shared by the majority of the world's population." That is, in other words, a true commitment to democracy.

To fully appreciate the importance of Obama's election to the prospects of peace in the world, return with me to the thrilling days of yesteryear when Bush and Cheney still stalked the political earth. Think of the damage that they did in eight short years – to world peace, and to the respect and power of the United States.

* A disastrous pre-emptive war in Iraq that destroyed America's reputation, drained our treasure, cost the lives and limbs of tens of thousands of young Americans, resulted in the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqi's, displaced millions more, and strengthened Iran.

* Neglect for the economic, political and military needs of the struggle in Afghanistan – leaving us with no truly good options there eight years after 9/11.

* Demonization of the United Nations that went so far that they appointed a U.N. Ambassador more interested in destroying the institution than using it for diplomacy.

* Virtual neglect of the festering problem of peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

* Abandoning the Clinton policy of engagement with North Korea that had prevented that country's development of nuclear weapons. That worked so well that North Korea got those weapons on the Bush-Cheney watch.

* Abandoning the Geneva Conventions, due process of law and the shared values of the civilized world, and instead embracing torture, rendition, the debasement of prisoners at Abu Graib, and detention without trial.

* For all of their tough talk about strengthening our military, they stretched it to the breaking point, so it became more difficult for America to take military action if it really were needed to maintain world peace.

* And for those who love America, one of their worst sins was that Bush and Cheney turned our country into one that polls showed – rightly or wrongly – many people in the world believed was the "greatest threat to world peace." Astounding.

The Nobel Committee gave the prize to Barack Obama because he gave the world hope that its most powerful, wealthy nation would once again provide humankind with inspiration and leadership that can be trusted and admired.

Since his election, President Obama has launched a worldwide campaign to eliminate all nuclear weapons – recognizing that controlling the proliferation of nuclear weapons is a practical impossibility unless we work to eliminate them from the globe. He has rededicated America to cope with the massive threat of climate change. He has reset our relationship with the Muslim world. He has rededicated America to the world's international institutions. And, he has begun to use all of the tools available to our country – including diplomacy – to create a more just and peaceful planet.

All of this is just the beginning of a long journey. But at least we have once again begun that journey down the right road. In and of itself that has made America safer, restored our respect in the world, and has begun to build a foundation for peace in the world over the long term.

Americans may not fully appreciate how completely they changed our relations to the rest of the world when they voted to elect Barack Obama last November. The rest of the world does. We should consider Barack Obama's Nobel peace prize as a giant gesture of gratitude.

Main Topics: McCain's 2013 Speech, Bush's Remarks Before the Knesset, The Republican Brand

Summary of Shift: Bush's speech before the Knesset was a major subject today. His remarks on appeasement elicited responses from Obama, Clinton and McCain. McCain's speech in Ohio envisioning a world at the end of his first term took up the remainder of the media's time drawing commentary from all sides. Disasters, natural and manmade, received residual attention.

Highlights

1. McCain's vision for the future
   a. McCain's speech contains Bush-like optimism
   b. Olbermann looks at McCain's speech point-by-point
   c. Cafferty refers to McCain's proposals as "political crap," suggests they're rosy but light on details
   d. McCain denies that he's proposing a timeline
   e. Speech perhaps an attempt for McCain to minimize the age issue
2. Bush's Knesset appeasement remarks
   a. Biden counters Bush and McCain's appeasement attacks
   b. Charlie Black discusses Bush-Obama "appeasement" flap
   c. Bush doesn't leave politics at the water's edge
   d. Zakaria suggests "bellicose" McCain is the same as--if not worse than--Bush today and in their foreign policy
   e. Hume: McCain echoed Bush in swipe at Obama
3. The Republican Brand
   a. Republicans on the whole not distancing themselves from Bush
   b. McCain should try to separate himself from the brand, not save it
   c. Resentment of George Bush bleeds over to McCain
   d. McCain finds himself closer to Bush as he pursues the McDifferent line
   e. McCain's attempts to distance himself from Bush are more stylistic than substantive
4. McCain and Bush raise Obama concerns among Jewish voters
5. McCain's age more of a problem with older voters
6. Newsweek runs into trouble for non-pro-McCain articles
7. Hagee apologizes but remarks remain offensive

CNN Panel Reacts to McCain's Speech, Discuss Timetables, Bush-like Optimism (CNN 05/15/08 8:24pm)

CAMPBELL BROWN: […] McCain has been adamant that there would be no timelines for getting out of Iraq. But today it basically sounded like troops are out by 2013. […] How can that not be a timetable?

TARA WILLIAMS: […] Well it's not a timetable. You could argue that it is a timetable, but that's—I think, he's not putting it down on paper, he's saying this is a vision of what I see could happen. Look at the tone of his speech. […] There are a lot of lofty things there that we'd all like to see. I think it's trying to lift our spirits right now. We're in a down period right now, lot of frustration. He's trying to lift the spirit of Americans, the same way George Bush did when he first came into office, inherited a recession, 9/11, corporate scandals. And say, listen, we can get through this, we're gonna push ahead. And the only thing about whether this will come back to haunt him is that he hasn't locked down anything concrete, […] he hasn't said anything tangible. It's a rosy picture of where we'd like to be.

[…]

MICHAEL CROWLEY: It's a well-worn theory of American politics that optimism sells, optimism works. […] And look, what other choice does McCain have? He can't promise to continue Bush's policies, so he's gotta make an omelet out of broken eggs and say look things are so bad I'm gonna get us back to the way things were before they were that bad. […] When you look especially at the domestic agenda, it really does seem like a fantasy because McCain is not going to have a Republican Congress.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…]
ED SCHULTZ: Can I play the violin music with John McCain on this? The country's not with McCain on Iraq! He's got an image problem. He's a warmonger […] And now he's trying to reinvent himself like hey! We're actually gonna have a timetable, and 2013 is what we're looking at. The fact is, this is the same guy that has called Democrats on the carpet for possible surrender, for cut-and-run, for appeasement—he's gone right down the list. The problem is you can't trust John McCain. The American people aren't thinking about 2013, they're thinking about 2009. Theyr'e thinking about $12billion a month and the loss of life, and he has no end in sight, he has no plan in sight. It's just a dart board, it's a guessing game. […] It's a sad foreign policy. It's more Bush.

BROWN: […] More generally, I mean, the speech was all rhetoric. It's not like he talked in any detail about how he'd do any of this. And he's always criticizing Obama for doing nothing but providing rhetoric.
SCHULTZ: Then why don't you get us out of it?! McCain offers no exit strategy whatsoever to get us out of it. That's the bottom line. It's more Bush. It's more of the same. There's no getting out of Iraq with John McCain. You can't trust him on it. He is a warmonger!

McCain's 2013 Speech Point-By-Point (MSNBC 05/15/08 8:50pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: There will still have been no terrorist attacks since 9/11. The war in Iraq is won. Osama bin Laden is dead, or in custody. The world food crisis is over. The economy is growing robustly. Kids are smarter, and thinner. All over, America's problems are already solved or being solved . . . Sen. McCain's vision of Bush's third term. I'm sorry, of his first term . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: It's important that the candidates who seek to lead the country after the Bush administration to find their objectives and what they plan to do and what they plan to achieve. Not with vague language but with clarity.

OLBERMANN: What followed from Sen. Dole, I'm sorry, Sen. McCain was a twenty minute wish-list for the next four years with absolutely no specifics on just how he might achieve any of it.

[. . .]

OLBERMANN: Maintaining a military presence in Iraq. Meaning permanent bases, so we could stay there for a hundred years after he spent so much time insisting that that was not his plan?

[. . .]

OLBERMANN: As to the economy:

JOHN MCCAIN: The alternate minimum tax is being phased out with relief provided first to middle-income families.

OLBERMANN: That would be the same alternate minimum tax proposal phase out that Newsweek points out would cost as much as $1.6 trillion dollars in ten years. And those middle class families? To McCain that means people earning more than $200,000 a year.

[. . .]

JOHN MCCAIN: . . . congress has not sent me an appropriations bill containing earmarks for the last three years.

OLBERMANN: Those would be the same earmarks that paid for the Jersey City Liberty Science Center in New Jersey, the Ferry in Gee's Bend, Alabama and the Naval Air Station Cecil Field in Jacksonville, Florida all stops on Sen. McCain's current campaign swing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[. . .]

JOHN MCCAIN: Healthcare has become more accessible to more Americans than at any time in history. . .

OLBERMANN: Of course the McCain healthcare plan takes away the tax break given to those who buy insurance from their employer meaning the number of Americans who might be forced to find new insurance will be 158 million. And in pushing people towards individual insurance he leaves the 56 million people who have chronic conditions, like his own, vulnerable to the whims of the insurance companies.

In Speech Laying Out Vision for His First Term, McCain Sounds Like McSame, Lacks Details (CNN 05/15/08 6:16PM)
WOLF BLITZER: If you listen to his speech, if you read his speech, Jack, he paints a very beautiful picture in the year 2013.

JACK CAFFERTY: All we have to do is follow the Yellow Brick Road, right? And we'll get to some pla— You know, I hope he can do it. That'd be great. I'd love to see Osama bin Laden dead and democracy in Iraq and all the troops home and the rest of the things he talked about. The devil, of course, is in the details. And he didn'texpel out exactly how we're going to do that. An earlier piece on this show said that there's been no actionable intelligence on the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden since Tora Bora, which was a number of years ago. But I wish him well. […]

JEFFREY TOOBIN: I think it's an honorable way to run for President. […] I think the Iraq stuff is very difficult because if you listen to what he said, it sounded almost exactly what George Bush has—like what George Bush said 2 years ago, 3 years ago, 5 years ago; and we appear to be no closer to that goal. So it will remind people of how the promises about Iraq have not been fulfilled. But I think McCain does deserve credit for putting himself out on the line.

CAFFERTY: […] Political promises are a dime a dozen. […] The public's up to their eyeballs in broken promises. This garbage about Iraq is the same bill of goods that we've been sold by the Bush administration since we invaded that country: 'we'll be greeted as liberators,' 'we'll set up a functioning democracy, all good will come to the Middle East, they'll pay for the war with their oil. It's garbage! It hasn't happened, it ain't gonna happen. The tribal animosities that fuel the violence in that part of the world date back centuries! They are not gonna adopt a Western-style democracy next year or in 2013 or 100 years from now. So you know, it's just more political crap!

Cameron Reports: McCain Denies That He's Proposing a Timetable; Shows Temper, Frustration with Press (FNC 05/15/08 6:09pm)
CARL CAMERON: On his campaign bus, McCain repeatedly denied that predicting that most troops will have been welcomed home and the Iraq War will have been won amounts to a timetable.

[begin video clip]
JOHN MCCAIN: I'm not putting a date on it.
[end clip]

CAMERON: After reporters asked him basically the same question 11 times, McCain grew impatient.

[begin video clip]
JOHN MCCAIN: I'll try to repeat again exactly what I just said. And I will repeat it over and over again. I'll be glad to do that for you there. I believe that the surge is succeeding. I believe that victory is coming about.
[end video clip]

CAMERON: Behind the scenes, the McCain campaign is becoming increasingly frustrated with mainstream media coverage. For years, McCain's criticism of Republicans—and willingness to talk about it with reporters a lot—made him something of a media darling. But now that he's criticizing Democrats and principally Barack Obama, the tone has changed dramatically, and Mr. Straight Talk is no longer finding the press as friendly nor willing to cut him the slack it once was.

Krauthammer Suggests Speech Was Attempt to Minimize Age Issue for McCain (FNC 05/15/08 6:53pm)
CHARLES KRAUTHAMMER: Look this speech, which was a great speech, is not about Iraq. It's not about education. It's not about health care. All of which he summarized well. It's about the age issue. What he did is he frames it in a way—he speaks about the year 2013. He knows that Americans remember that Reagan in the second term in the end looked weak—and afterwards he developed Alzheimers—and McCain […] doesn't want Americans thinking of him at 80. He wants Americans thinking of him in the first term: he's strong, vigorous, active right now, and plausibly will be for the next 4 years. So he frames all of this within the 4 years. He doesn't announce he's only going to have one term—that would be a disaster, he'd be a lame duck. But he's implying in that speech—you've got all kinds of hints in that speech about not worring about reelection. On the day I'm sworn in until the day I leave office, I want to accomplish all this. He's talking about a frame of time, which is a way to blunt the age issue, which is a serious issue. It can't be eliminated, but I think this is a way to at least minimize it.

Highlight #2
Biden and Matthews Deflate McCain and Bush's Double-Team of Barack (MSNBC 5/15/08 5:10pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: [John McCain] responds to what President Bush said, it sounds like they're doing an alley-oop play . . . they're working together because here's Sen. McCain basically underlining the shot against Barack.

JOHN MCCAIN: He does bring up an issue we'll be discussing with the American people. And that is, why does Barack Obama . . . want to sit down with a state sponsor of terrorism? What does he want to talk about with Ahmadinejad who said that Israel is a skinking corpse, who said that he wants to wipe Israel off the map, who's sending the most explosive devices into Iraq, killing Americans? What does he want to talk about with him?

MATTHEWS: Well it seems like it's alley-oop play in the NBA, Senator, the president threw the ball up near the basket and John McCain put it in . . .

JOE BIDEN: I'll tell you what he wants to talk about. He wants to talk about the same thing Secretary of Defense Gates wants to talk about. He wants to talk about the same thing that Condi Rice wants to talk about. Both of whom are saying we should be talking. . . and since when does a president or John McCain think that "no" does not exist in the vocabulary of an American president. Talking doesn't mean you agree. Why would you talk? You would talk to enhance America's interest and change behavior. . . the same reason why the President of the United States is . . . talking with . . . Kim Jong-Il, the same reason he corresponded with . . . Qaddaffi who we labeled a terrorist in a terrorist state. Why? To stop their conduct. I find this so disappointing . . .

MATTHEWS: It seems to me that a couple of times in history we failed to talk to our enemies and we caused ourselves big trouble. We didn't talk to the head of North Korea when Atchinson suggested that the line of defense didn't include North and South Korea. We did make a mistake when April Glasby talked to Saddam Hussein and didn't tell him we'd fight for Kuwait. It seems to me that there examples in the past of when you oughta talk to the bad guys and tell them where the line is drawn.

JOE BIDEN: There's a great quote from . . . President John Kennedy . . . he said, "We should never negotiate out of fear but we should never fear to negotiate." . . . tell me how as President of the United States you say we should be in full-blown direct discussions with North Korea, a proliferator of nuclear technology . . . , who have missile technology and nuclear capability, how can we talk with them and negotiate with them and say it is appeasement to even attempt to broach a discussion with the Iranians . . .

Charlie Black Discusses Bush-Obama 'Appeasement' Flap, McCain's "Optimistic" Vision for America (FNC 05/15/08 5:11pm)
BILL HEMMER: […] Here's the Obama response to McCain backing up George Bush from earlier today: […] "It is the height of hypocrisy for John McCain to deliver a lofty speech about civility and bipartisanship in the morning and then embrace George Bush's disgraceful political attack in the afternoon." Your chance to react to that now, Charlie.

CHARLIE BLACK: Well you know the Obama campaign is in a bad way today. The President made a speech, he didn't say anything about Barack Obama. But if the shoe fits, wear it. They obviously reacted and said the shoe fit them and got into a fight with the President. Now of course the President is right. And of course Senator McCain is right that when Senator Obama said that he would meet with Ahmadinejad without pre-conditions, head-of-state to head-of-state, that that was naive and inexperienced and showed a lack of judgment about foreign policy. Ms. Rice was just trying to change their position and say there would be conditions and other preparations made, but that's not what the candidate said and it's not what's on their website. And it just shows their lack of judgment and experience, and the more he wants to talk about it the better.

HEMMER: […] Sen McCain had a 30-minute speech in Columbus, Ohio. Lays out his vision of what the world would like like after four years in the white house. Watch here on Iraq, first.

[clip of McCain]

HEMMER: So that's a big list […] Is that a platform or is that what Democrats call a wish list?

BLACK: Well, here's what it is. Senator McCain believes that candidates for president should present their vision of the future and then lay out specific policies of how they would achieve that vision. Senator McCain has been laying out detail-specific policies for a year and a half: national security, foreign policy, economic policy, health care. What he did today is to say: here is my vision, the policies I have outlined if I get cooperation from congress and we can work in a bipartisan fashion, this will be the result. this is what America will look like after four years of my presidency. i think it's exactly the kind of optimistic vision that the American people are looking for.

HEMMER: You know, when a candidate lays out a speech like this, you hope to get a lot of air time and a lot of headlines. did the news out of Jerusalem and what happened within the Democratic Party and Barack Obama knock some of these headlines off the front pages today, Charlie?

BLACK: Well, I don't think so. Fox and a couple of your competitors covered the entire speech live this morning, so we're happy about that. And we're still talking about it. But this vision speech by john McCain will have lasting effect. Americans will be reading it, thinking about it. They will understand where he wants to take the country, the hopeful optimistic vision that he can achieve and they will be comparing it to Senator Obama or Senator Clinton who only think things are bad and getting worse and are offering a very cynical pessimistic view of the future. We're optimistic and hopeful.

Bush Doesn't Leave Politics at the Water's Edge (MSNBC 05/15/08 8:30pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: He'll take Bush at his word that he did not mean Sen. Obama. That does not mean however that he himself will not attack Sen. Obama in the exact same way, raising him a Neville Chamberlin.

JOHN MCCAIN: I will debate this issue with Sen. Obama throughout this campaign. I believe in peace through strength. And, peace through strength is the way that we have succeeded in the past. And yes there have been appeasers in the past and the President is exactly right. One of them was named Neville Chamberlin.

OLBERMANN: Neville Chamberlin, who, like Sen. McCain was a conservative . . . what happened to the leave your differences at the border US policy that they threw down on President Carter like a ton of bricks when he went abroad and criticized the government. Why does Bush get to get away with blatant partisanship, and historical revisionism by the way, and, I don't know, get allowed back in the country?

DANA MILBANK: I suspect that the Justice Department has drafted some opinion saying that just as the president is exempt from the Geneva Accords, he is exempt from the politics at the water's edge thing.

Zakaria Suggests "Bellicose" McCain is "Doubling Down on Every Bad Bed that George Bush Has Made" (CNN 5/15/08 5:41pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Here's how John McCain reacted today to what the President said in Jerusalem. [Rolls video clip of McCain on the bus] He was—he minced no words at all. What do you think about that?

FAREED ZAKARIA: […] It is again ahistorical. […] Most recently, let's remember that Gen David Petraeus has talked to the Sunni insurgents and terrorists who were killing Americans only months earlier. And that a large part of the success of the surge has been the willingness of Petraeus and the American military to talk to the people who they once called terrorists and insurgents.

ZAKARIA: McCain gave a speech in which he said that the United States should mount a campaign to kick Russia out of the G8, to then expand the G8 […] to include Brazil and India but not China. And it struck me that this policy of effectively drawing a line and creating a kind of new Cold War—between the United States on one hand and China and Russia—was really unprecedented. No had ever proposed something like this before.
BLITZER: So it would be a resumption of the Cold War, that's what you're saying?

ZAKARIA: It would be a resumption of the Cold War, except this time with the economy that's going 3 times as fast as the United States- in China's case. And in Russia's case, with one of the largest oil producers in the world.
BLITZER: It sounds like you believe McCain doesn't have—isn't on board this vision that you have. But the Democratic candidates[…]—do they understand what's going on?

ZAKARIA: Obama seems to understand what's going on. […] McCain, I fear, while a very intelligent man who I have a lot of respect for, has kind of reverted to a very bellicose foreign policy that seems to be doubling down on every bad bet that George Bush has made.

Hume: McCain Echoed Bush in Swipe at Obama (FNC 05/15/08 5:04pm)
BRIT HUME: […] John McCain obviously thought this was a good fight for his side to have, which is why he, after days of trying to distance himself from President Bush on a number of issues, jumped in essentially on the same side as President Bush today.

Highlight #3
Republicans on the Whole not Distancing Themselves from Bush (MSNBC 05/15/08 8:41pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: Ok, to the point of McCain . . . Sen. McCain would presumably be unhappy that he was bigfooted here by President Bush on this of all topics, then why, you know, sort of, throw your chips in with him, calling Obama an appeaser and now eliminating any chance that this is not about Obama by throwing in Neville Freakin' Chamberlin . . . McCain might've been better served by saying, "I don't know who George Bush is," wouldn't he?

RACHAEL MADDOW: I think though that the Republicans surprise us over and over again by the degree that they do not distance themselves from George W. Bush. It's kind of the constant political common wisdom and it has been since George Bush's approval ratings went south a very long time ago. That kind of for other Republicans to succeed they really need to divorce themselves from George W. Bush and run as an anti-George Bush Republican. We haven't seen any successful Republican effort to do that. Everybody keeps saying that they will start doing that but we're only seeing John McCain do that on things that are essentially style points. Saying, I promise that I'll have lots of press conferences, I promise I will admit my mistakes, I promise that you can buy eco-friendly t-shirts from my website. It's style points. They stick together on the big issues. None of them have yet thrown Bush under the bus.

The Struggling Republican Brand (MSNBC 05/14/08 5:38pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Today in Columbus Ohio John McCain delivered his latest effort to rebrand the Republican party and create separation from President Bush. First, McCain vowed to end the Iraq war in under five years. Under his vision:

JOHN MCCAIN: By January 2013, Americans welcome home most of the servicemen and women. The United States maintains a military presence in there, but a much smaller one and it does not play a direct combat role.

SHUSTER: Gone, of course, was any talk of a hundred year commitment. Second, McCain promised to change the Republican White House governing style.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: I will ask Democrats to serve in my administration. My administration will set a new standard for transparency and accountability. I will hold weekly press conferences.

SHUSTER: McCain even pledged to let members of congress question him the same way the British House of Commons does with Great Britain's Prime Minister.

[. . .]

MCCAIN: When we make errors, I'll confess them readily and explain what we intend to do to correct them.

SHUSTER: McCain's efforts to change perceptions about Republican leadership and acknowledge public concerns about the duration of the Iraq War come at a crucial time. Thanks largely to voter frustrations over Iraq, fears about the sputtering US economy and anger over high gas prices. President Bush's disapproval rating has reached 71%. That's the highest disapproval rating of any president in modern history. Higher even than Richard Nixon. And Republicans in congress are getting crushed. Tuesday night marked the third straight special election where a strong Republican district was won by a Democrat.

[. . .]

SHUSTER: McCain may find it easier to separate from the Republican brand than to save it. Still, efforts like today bring their own problems. McCain's pledged to get out of Iraq by 2013 is the kind of declaration that he used to attack, raising new questions and putting McCain on the defensive.

REPORTER: You're not setting a date but, you're predicting it'll be by 2013.

MCCAIN: H-,h-,how many times can I say—

REPORTER: There was a specific date in the speech you just gave.

MCCAIN: I said by the end of my first term.

SHUSTER: Democrats charge that McCain is now engaged in the same kind of word games as President Bush. It's a reminder that for all the Republican efforts to create a new image, Democrats are just as focused on trying to make sure that the current image of a GOP marching in lock-step with President Bush stays the same . . .

McCain needs to Distance Himself not only from Bush but the Republican Brand Also (MSNBC 05/15/08 5:41pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Bob [Herberts], it seems to me that he was cauterizing the wound there. Hundred year war? No. We'll end in 2013. Very clearly a mathematical correction to a mathematical problem.

BOB HERBERTS: I'm getting hints here of a little bit of triangulation going on with McCain, jumping on some of these Democratic issues, maybe looking for an end game in terms of the war. He's out there talking about global warming. He went down south and kicked off a little bit of a poverty tour. It's very interesting, the way he's running. And probably smart.

[. . .]

TUCKER CARLSON: Nixon '68. Peace with honor. Of course. He's the one guy who can do it. Look, no one's going to question his patriotism, of course. No one's going to question his knowledge of military matters. No one's going to question his commitment to winning the Iraq war. He's the perfect vessel for this message . . . which is, "Only I can do it in a way which makes you proud of America." . . .

MATTHEWS: Well, is he going to be like Nixon going to China, DeGaulle ending up the war in Algeria, is that what he's offering? A dramatic shift? Or is he offering a pretense of that? Is he going to change Bush policy or not?

CARLSON: He's offering what Nixon offered in 1968 . . . the implied message was, "You know the war's not going well but you're not with the long haired freaks who want to embarrass America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTHEWS: Nixon was very smart, he said we need new leadership . . . let me ask you about this rebrand . . .

HERBERTS: . . . when I was out in Pennsylvania for the primary, I was really surprised, I was talking about Hillary vs. Obama and talking to these blue collar workers . . . and spontaneously, this vehement hostility to George Bush would enter the conversation . . . and what I thought was especially interesting . . .is that that was bleeding over into McCain and so many of them said that McCain would just continue Bush's policies. That's just a knee-jerk feeling that they have and that can't be a good thing.

MATTHEWS: The fact that the President jumped in, apparently on his side today, with regard to appeasement and dealing with Ahmadinejad. I mean you don't want to be the Doublemint Twins if you're McCain, do you? With President Bush?

CARLSON: No. It was actually McCain I believe jumped in and second President Bush.

MATTHEWS: Yeah, he joined him.

CARSLON: Right. He compared any effort to talk to our enemies abroad to Chamberlin's efforts to appease Hitler or whatever. Invoking the dread Hitler analogy which is never appropriate in any circumstance in my view.

As McCain Persues McDifferent he Finds Himself Closer to Bush (MSNBC 05/15/08 5:55pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: . . . You know, this seems to be working at cross purposes, the Republicans are generally more organized than the Democrats but today you have John McCain trying to separate himself from the very unpleas-, unpopular war in Iraq by saying he'll get us out of there by 2013 in large part. Obviously trying to get rid of that 100-years comment he made a while ago. And at the same time he jumps in and supports President Bush's attack on Barack Obama, sort of creating a Doublemint twin situation on the Republican side.

How Can McCain Distance Himself from Bush? (MSNBC 05/15/08 6:45pm)
DAVID GREGORY: You can tell from McCain's language who he's talking about when he says he will admit to mistakes readily.

RICHARD WOLFE: Yeah, look, he's obviously got a personal contrast with President Bush and a tone of speaking which is different that President Bush's. But if he really does want to go after the national security agenda as opposed to the economic one, then he's going to have to stress something different. Not going after Iran, do the warmongering thing, say he's tougher than Obama on Iran. He's actually got to talk about diplomacy in a way that Bush never did. If he can tie that to one of his core messages, which is about national service . . . then he has an agenda on foreign policy which would sound and look different than President Bush's.

GREGORY: . . . if he can combine stalwart support, even for the war in Iraq . . . and couple that with the morality stances he took on issues like torture, that could be a winning combination.

RACHAEL MADDOW: Except he lost . . . the torture argument when he voted for the CIA being allowed to continue to use those other tactics recently . . . I tend to agree with Richard on this, I think, but slightly from a different angle. I think that McCain will not really divorce himself from Bush on substantive issues. He'll try to make the distinction on style points essentially . . .

McCain/Bush Together Raise Concerns about Obama Among Jewish Voters (CNN 05/15/08
ED HENRY: […] The President's broadside before the Israeli Knesset, in which he stressed his Administration's close ties to Israel could raise more concerns about Obama with Jewish-American voters, especially since the President also used a reference to the Holocaust to suggest some people do not understand the grave threat posed by Iran, Hamas and Hezbollah […] Senator McCain already stoked those concerns among Jewish-American voters by charging that Obama is the favorite candidate of Hamas.

Older People less Comfortable with McCain's Age (MSNBC 05/15/08 5:43pm)
BOB HERBERTS: . . . but let me also agree with Tucker on the age issue . . . when I was out in Pennsylvania that was another thing that came up spontaneously, I wasn't interested in it, I was not asking about it. And people would just say again and again, "I think the guy's too old" or "my mother-in-law thinks the guy's too old."

CHRIS MATTHEWS: How old were they?

HERBERTS: They were middle aged, family people, I'd say they were in there 40s or 50s, most of them.

[. . .]

TUCKER CARLSON: . . . we know that from polling already . . . you look at the numbers on this, people over 65 . . . the numbers show, old people don't want an old president.

Hagee Apologiezes but his Comments Remain Offensive (CNN 05/15/08 5:32pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Candidates hope endorsements will bring them votes but for John McCain, one endorsement has brought a lot of headaches . . . that would be the endorsement of the evangelist Pastor John Hagee. Mary Snow is looking into the story . . .

MARY SNOW: Well Wolf, John Hagee is here in New York and this afternoon he held a private meeting. . . in his latest effort to make peace with catholics.

JOHN MCCAIN: I'm very honored by Pastor John Hagee's endorsement . . .

SNOW: . . . Hagee met today with one of his most vocal Catholic critics . . . the Catholic league blasted Hagee and put pressure on McCain after the endorsement. The Catholic League's president called a truce after Hagee wrote a letter that said, quote, "express my deep regret for any comments that Catholics have found hurtful." . . .

BILL DONAHUE: Yes, I absolutely accept his apology . . .

SNOW: Sen. McCain called the apology laudable.

[. . .]

SNOW: Another Catholic group says it welcomes Hagee's apology but:

JAMES SALT: The problem is that there has been a longstanding pattern of offensive and problematic rhetoric from John Hagee.

SNOW: Like suggesting Hurricane Katrina was punishment from god because of a gay pride parade.

Bloomberg opinion: Megan McArdle: "When Obama Beat Hillary, We All Lost"

By Megan McArdle

August 11, 2014, 2:33 p.m. EDT

For journalists, the dog days of August are the worst. Nothing happens because Congress and the rest of you are all on vacation. So now is the time for whatever quirky column has been niggling at the back of one's mind, waiting for a break in the news cycle. Unfortunately, even if nothing has been niggling, your deadline still beckons. So it's also the time for thumb-suckers about America in the 21st century, homages to parenthood, wild speculations about what sort of electronic devices our grandchildren will use, or anything else that will fill the requisite inches.

One of my favorite members of this genre is the counterfactual: Would Hitler have won World War II if he had left Russia alone? Would Medicare exist if JFK had lived? What would 20th-century literature have looked like if Ernest Hemingway had been shot while driving that ambulance? There's no way to tell, but how much fun to debate!

Well, Kevin Drum tickled my counterfactual fancy this morning with the following aside: "I don't have any problems with Hillary's domestic policy. I've never believed that she 'understood' the Republican party better than Obama and therefore would have gotten more done if she'd won in 2008, but I don't think she would have gotten any less done either. It's close to a wash."

I'm actually going to disagree a bit here. I think that Hillary Clinton would have been more cautious when dealing with Republicans, and therefore ultimately more successful in some ways. At the very least, she would not be facing the same level of vehement opposition in Congress.

I think liberals really do not understand emotionally the extent to which the Tea Party was created by the Affordable Care Act and the feeling that its government was simply steamrolling it. From the Tea Party's perspective, you had an unpopular program that should have died in the same way, and for the same reasons, that Social Security privatization did: because sensible politicians saw that, no matter how ardently they and their base might desire it, this was out of step with what the majority of the country wanted (and no, you cannot rescue the polls by claiming that the only problem with the law was that it wasn't liberal enough; when you dig down into what people mean when they say that, the idea that there was ever a majority or a plurality that was secretly in favor of Obamacare collapses).

The rage was similar to what progressives felt as they watched George W. Bush push the country into a war in Iraq. That defined and animated the anti-war movement (which is why said movement collapsed when Bush left office, and not, say, when Bush agreed to a staged withdrawal of our forces). Yes, those people would still have hated Republicans, even if there had been no Iraq War. But they would not have been as passionate, as organized or as powerful without it.

Liberals tend to write off this anger as racism, as irrational hatred of Barack Obama, or as perverse joy in denying health care to the poor, but at its root, it's the simpler feeling that your country is making a mistake and you can't stop it because the people in charge are ignoring the obvious. Yes, a lot of money and energy was poured into the Tea Party by rich backers, but rich backers cannot create a grassroots campaign unless the underlying passion is there in the voters (paging Karl Rove and Crossroads). The Obama administration created that passion with Obamacare.

I think that Hillary Clinton would have pulled back when Rahm Emanuel (or his counterfactual Clinton administration counterpart) told her that this was a political loser and she should drop it. I've written before about how my Twitter feed filled up with comparisons to 1932 the night that Obama took the presidency, and it's quite clear to me that the Obama administration shared what you might call delusions of FDR. It thought that it was in a transformative, historical moment where the normal rules of political caution didn't apply. The administration was wrong, and the country paid for that.

That's not to say that Republicans would have somehow been all kissy-kissy with Clinton -- they weren't very nice to her husband, after all. She would of course still have faced stiff opposition in Congress, because the partisan divide in this country is getting wider and congressional districts are getting more polarized, which makes it harder and harder to do deals across the aisle, or even treat each other with a modicum of decency. But I doubt she would have had the debt ceiling debacle or the deep gridlock of the last four years, because it was Obamacare that elected a fresh new class of deeply ideological Republicans who thought they were having their own transformative political movement, and they were willing to do massive damage to their party, their own political fortunes and, in my opinion, to the country in order to take a stand against "business as usual" -- business that included legislating or paying our bills.

Of course, in my counterfactual, Hillary also probably wouldn't have proposed ambitious health-care reform; she'd have done something more modest, like a Medicaid expansion. Progressives might well say that they'd rather have the first two years of the Obama administration, followed by gridlock, than steadier but more modest achievements by a Hillary Clinton administration. And that doesn't even get us into foreign policy, where the differences were deeper and more passionate.

To my mind, however, that would have been a much better outcome for everyone. So there's my counterfactual for the summer: If Hillary Clinton had won, Obamacare wouldn't have happened, and Democrats -- and the country -- would be better off.

National Journal: "The Audacity to Be Authentic: Hillary Clinton's Risky Hedge Against Obama"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Ron Fournier

August 12, 2014

[Subtitle:] Conventional wisdom says it's smart to attack an unpopular president. Conventional wisdom may be wrong.

The rap against Hillary Clinton is that she's a cynical and conniving public figure who hardly takes a breath without calculating the political advantage of a sigh. That caricature fueled coverage of Clinton's public break from President Obama on global affairs. "The benefits to Clinton are clear," wrote Juliet Eilperin, channeling convention wisdom for The Washington Post.

But I'm not so sure the former secretary of State has helped herself politically. It may be that we've just witnessed a rare and risky act of authenticity.

To review, Clinton told Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic that Obama failed in Syria by refusing to back rebel forces, as she had advised. Clinton also dismissed Obama's emphasis on avoiding mistakes overseas that might lead to military confrontation—a philosophy he privately labels, "Don't do stupid shit." Echoing the president's critics, she told Goldberg, "Great nations need organizing principles—and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

On one level, this is a sensible move for a likely 2016 presidential candidate. Her former boss's job-approval rating hovers meekly around 40 percent, and an even smaller percentage of Americans appreciate the way he's handled the spate of global crises.

"It's in her political interest to begin to distance herself from an unpopular president and to drive home the fact that she's risk-ready while Obama's risk-adverse," Aaron David Miller, vice president for new initiatives at the Wilson Center, told Eilperin.

Another keen observer, Mark Landler of The New York Times, wrote that Clinton is suggesting she would project American power much differently than Obama. "His view is cautious, inward-looking, suffused with a sense of limits, while hers is muscular, optimistic, unabashedly old-fashioned."

Setting aside the obvious fact that "unabashedly old-fashioned" is the exact opposite of Clinton's ideal campaign slogan, I wonder whether underscoring her hawkish ways is, in the long run, more helpful or hurtful. Remember, there was a time early in the 2008 presidential cycle when conventional wisdom dictated that 1) supporting the Iraq War was the smart political move and; 2) Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton would easily win the Democratic presidential nomination.

Her immediate problem is with the Democratic base, which has always viewed Clinton warily as an interventionist. Michael Cohen, a fellow at the progressive Century Foundation, told Politico that Clinton's approach was "out of touch with Democrats in 2008, and it's out of touch now."

Influential liberal writer Joan Walsh of Salon.com called Clinton's remarks "sobering" and fired a warning shot. "Clinton may think she can write off the anti-interventionist left—again—and win the White House this time," she wrote. "But she may find out she's wrong this time, too."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton needs to brace for stiff challenges in 2016, from inside and outside her party. There will be no coronation. The next several election cycles are going to be wildly unpredictable, as an electorate buffeted by titanic economic and sociological shifts grows to demand the sort of disruption of political and governmental institutions that they've witnessed elsewhere, most prominently in the retail, media, and entertainment industries.

OK, bashing Obama causes problems with the Democratic base. But she's triangulating away from both Obama and President Bush to appeal to independents in the general election, right? I'm not so sure. Polls suggest that Obama is far more connected to public sentiment than Clinton is.

A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll showed that 47 percent of respondents called for a less-active role in world affairs, a larger share than in similar polling in 2001, 1997, and 1995. Last year, the Pew Research Center reported that a record 53 percent of Americans want their country to "mind its own business internationally."

The public is of two minds about Obama. They agree with his America-first, don't-rush-to-war philosophy; they just don't like how he's projecting it. He dithers and waffles, and seems to be a mental step behind adversaries like Russian President Vladmir Putin.

If I'm reading the public correctly, Americans aren't clamoring for a muscular and old-fashioned hawk as much as they want a pragmatic leader, somebody they can be proud of, who puts them first and keeps them safe. They want what Obama promised to be.

Clinton may be aiming for that sweet spot between Bush's belligerence and Obama's neglect—what Karl Rove called the "Goldilocks of foreign policy." But I could think of safer, more calculated, ways of going about it than stiff-arming the Democratic base and beating war drums over Syria.

In her memoir, Hard Choices, Clinton apologized for her support of the Iraq War, but she has made no secret of her interventionist streak. She wanted more troops in Afghanistan than Obama, for example, and was not "swept up in the drama and idealism" of the Arab Spring like other, younger White House aides.

Call me naïve, but maybe Clinton is simply being honest. After all, that's really want Americans want in a leader.

One fact that Hillary Clinton must be extremely aware of is that presidential candidates from a party that's held the White House for two or more terms tend to lose: they've only won 2 of 9 such elections in the postwar period. Even when incumbent presidents have been quite popular in their final years — as Dwight Eisenhower was in 1960, and Bill Clinton in 2000 — their would-be successors only managed about a tie in the popular vote, and lost the electoral college. This time around, President Obama is unpopular, Congress is unproductive and polarized, the economy remains underwhelming, and the headlines from overseas grow grimmer by the day. So how is Clinton going to try and make the case that Democrats should keep the presidency?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judging by an interview posted Sunday by the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, mostly on foreign policy, she'll argue for the necessity of restoring America's greatness.

"Great nations need organizing principles," she said. For her, those principles would be "peace, progress, and prosperity" — which happens to be a slogan her husband's White House used to describe its record. "We don't even tell our own story very well these days," she said. When Goldberg offered that "defeating fascism and communism is a pretty big deal," she exclaimed, "That's how I feel!" She added, "This might be an old-fashioned idea — but I'm about to find out, in more ways than one."

This effort would involve extensive and active US "engagement" overseas. "In the world in which we are living right now, vacuums get filled by some pretty unsavory players," she said. She argued for "containment" of jihadist groups, staked out a position a bit to Obama's right on Iran (though she still supports the ongoing nuclear negotiations), and emphasized that she supported arming rebels in Syria, something Obama has resisted.

But Clinton emphasized that economic prosperity at home would be necessary to sell the American public on a major overseas role. "Americans deserve to feel secure in their own lives, in their own middle-class aspirations, before you go to them and say, 'We're going to have to enforce navigable sea lanes in the South China Sea,'" she said. "You've got to take care of your home first."

Deciding what to say about Obama, who is broadly unpopular while still well-liked by Democrats, will be a challenge for Clinton's campaign. But even many core Democratic supporters will admit to a sense of disappointment and malaise. During the interview, Clinton seemed to float one possible way she'd handle this — she'd argue that Obama was a competent, hard-working steward during very difficult times.

"I think he is cautious because he knows what he inherited, both the two wars and the economic front, and he has expended a lot of capital and energy trying to pull us out of the hole we're in," she said. She continued: "The economy is not growing, the middle class is not feeling like they are secure, and we are living in a time of gridlock and dysfunction that is just frustrating and outraging."

Her implication, on both foreign and domestic policy, is that Obama didn't finish the job — and that she's the person who can do it. Clinton is clearly worried about being too closely associated with an administration the public increasingly views as a letdown. And she knows very well that when the public thinks things aren't going well, a prospective presidential candidate has to be able to promise change.

Every candidate running in difficult times has to make a case about how they'll fix what ails America — whether it's through inspirational rhetoric or a new policy agenda. While Clinton has suggested a few different foreign policies, she seems set to argue that it's mainly her leadership that's needed to put the US back on track. The question is — will anyone believe her?

Bloomberg: "Axelrod Fires Back at Clinton on 'Don't Do Stupid Stuff'"

By Jonathan Allen

August 12, 2014, 12:53 p.m. EDT

President Barack Obama's longtime political adviser fired back at Hillary Clinton over her recent criticism of the commander-in-chief's foreign policy doctrine of avoiding messy entanglements.

"Just to clarify: 'Don't do stupid stuff' means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision," David Axelrod tweeted today. Obama aides often have been quoted in news stories using that mantra to describe the president's guiding principles.

In an Aug. 10 interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, Clinton said: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Axelrod's response on Twitter escalates an already tense fight between a White House eager to defend its foreign policy at a time of global chaos and a Clinton operation equally eager to separate the former secretary of state from Obama decisions she fell in line to support. Her efforts to do that could hurt her with Democratic primary voters should she run for president in 2016 and help her with independents and national-security-minded Republicans in a general election.

Clinton told Goldberg that she advocated arming moderate Syrian rebels in 2012 and was rebuffed by Obama. The Islamic State, a militant force now sweeping across Iraq, took root in the Syrian conflict. A Clinton aide said in an e-mail that what Clinton said in the interview was no different than what she'd written in her book.

Results Unknown

Clinton didn't make public her disagreement on Syria policy while she served in government, and she told Goldberg that she couldn't say for certain that her approach would have yielded any different outcome.

The timing of her remarks caused discomfort for the White House because of the crisis in Iraq. In addition, Clinton and the president are scheduled to appear together tomorrow night on Martha's Vineyard at a birthday party for Ann Dibble Jordan, wife of Vernon Jordan, the former president of the National Urban League and a confidant of both Obama and former President Bill Clinton.

The anti-war base of the Democratic Party has long mistrusted Hillary Clinton's support for a muscular foreign policy. Obama used her vote as a U.S. senator to authorize the Iraq war as a cudgel in defeating her in the 2008 Democratic presidential primary, and some of her political critics are re-emerging.

Political 'Frenemies'

"Secretary Clinton, and any other person thinking about seeking the Democratic nomination in 2016, should think long and hard before embracing the same policies advocated by right-wing war hawks that got America into Iraq in the first place and helped set the stage for Iraq's troubles today," Ilya Sheyman, executive director of the political action arm of MoveOn, a Democratic group, said today in a statement.

Clinton and Axelrod have been political “frenemies” for many years. She has appeared at fundraising events for the charity that Axelrod and his wife created to fight epilepsy, a disorder that afflicts their daughter. Clinton and Axelrod grew apart during the 2008 campaign as he led Obama’s messaging campaign against Clinton.

All seemed forgiven in 2013, though, when Clinton headlined a fundraiser for the epilepsy-research charity and Axelrod called her the organization’s “patron saint.”

Politico: “Axelrod swipes at Clinton over Iraq”

By Maggie Haberman

August 12, 2014, 10:39 a.m. EDT

David Axelrod, the longtime top adviser to President Barack Obama, has taken to Twitter to slam Hillary Clinton in the wake of her comments rejecting the core of the Obama administration’s self-desribed foreign policy principle.

In an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton said the White House doctrine of “Don’t do stupid stuff” is “not an organizing principle.”

“Just to clarify: ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision,” read the tweet from Axelrod. He declined to expound on the tweet when reached over email by POLITICO.

As a senator during the presidency of George W. Bush, Clinton voted to authorize the use of force in Iraq, a vote that played a major role in costing her the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

Axelrod’s astonishing public swipe against Clinton revealed the extent to which Obama allies are furious over her comments to The Atlantic’s Jeffrey Goldberg, in which the former secretary of state also allied herself tightly with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and called the decision not assist Syrian rebels early on a “failure.”

Several sources close to the White House described Obama aides as angered by Clinton’s critiques, which her team had warned them was coming but which landed as the president is grappling with a string of crises globally.

The Axelrod tweet took what had been a simmering rift and blew it open. Between that and Clinton’s comments, the sense of unity that her team had tried to establish with the White House has broken down.

Obama was a major critic of the war in Iraq during the 2008 campaign, and that message helped give rise to his candidacy. In her book, “Hard Choices” Clinton finally wrote that she was “wrong” for the vote, but she has said very little about the process of arriving at that conclusion.

CNN: “David Axelrod smack-tweets Hillary Clinton”

By Ashley Killough, David Chalian, Dan Merica, Jim Acosta, and Kevin Liptak

August 12, 2014, 11:32 a.m. EDT

David Axelrod, former adviser to President Barack Obama, hit back Tuesday against Hillary Clinton's recent criticism of Obama's foreign policy.

In an interview with “The Atlantic” published over the weekend, Clinton argued the decision not to arm Syrian rebels early on had led to Islamic militants taking over swaths of territory in the region.

The former secretary of state also took a swipe at an oft-repeated phrase Obama uses to sum up his foreign policy choices - “Don’t do stupid stuff.”

"Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle," Clinton said.

In his tweet, Axelrod appears to be knocking Clinton's 2002 vote as U.S. senator in favor of the Iraq War. (Of course, his tweet can also be aimed at Republican hawks who support a harsher response to the current situation in Iraq.)

The PAC for the progressive group MoveOn also tweaked Clinton.

“Secretary Clinton, and any other person thinking about seeking the Democratic nomination in 2016, should think long and hard before embracing the same policies advocated by right-wing war hawks that got America into Iraq in the first place and helped set the stage for Iraq’s troubles today,” Ilya Sheyman, the PAC’s executive director, said in a statement Tuesday.

Clinton later said she regretted supporting the authorization of the Iraq war.

"I thought I had acted in good faith and made the best decision I could with the information I had," Clinton writes in her new book. "And I wasn't alone in getting it wrong. But I still got it wrong. Plain and simple."

The recent tension between Clinton and Obama's team invokes memories of their 2008 battle for the Democratic presidential nomination, when the two candidates butted heads over foreign policy.

A White House official said Monday that the White House is not getting amped up over Clinton's interview. They don't see this as her break-away moment, according to the source, though they anticipate she will move away from Obama over time.

The President and his former chief diplomat will have a chance to talk things out Wednesday night; the two are expected to attend the same event in Martha's Vineyard.

Clinton is also getting hit by the Republican National Committee, which accuses Clinton of playing politics on the issue.

"You can't distance yourself from this administration's foreign policy when your job for four years was to lead its foreign policy," RNC spokesman Sean Spicer said.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "Obamaworld isn't taking Hillary Clinton's foreign policy critique lying down"

By Aaron Blake

August 12, 2014, 10:55 a.m. EDT

Unfortunately for the former secretary of state, attempting to do so in as blunt a fashion as she did carries with it significant risks. By paraphrasing Obama's own attitude toward foreign policy — "Don't do stupid [stuff]" — and turning it against him, she has understandably touched a few nerves in Obama-world.

Case in point: David Axelrod. The top former Obama adviser tweeted this broadside Tuesday morning:

[TWEET]

The tweet, of course, is a reference to Clinton having voted for the Iraq war. That issue just happens to be the one which really opened the door for a guy named Barack Obama to beat her in the 2008 primary. In other words, Axelrod's rejoinder is about as personal and pointed as Clinton's initial criticism of Obama's foreign policy. In neither case were Clinton or Obama actually named, but the targets are unmistakable in both cases. And in both cases, the messages were broadcast in strikingly public ways.

In addition, it's pretty clear that administration officials are only so happy to try and undercut Clinton's attempts to distance herself from Obama. Witness this New York Times story from late Monday, in which anonymous administration officials suggest that Clinton doth protest too much when it comes to certain foreign policy issues:

"Still, when Mrs. Clinton says that 'the failure to help build up a credible fighting force' against President Bashar al-Assad in Syria 'left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled,' the suggestion is that Mr. Obama's refusal to arm the rebels might end up being a singular misjudgment. But at the time of the Obama administration's internal debate over that decision, several officials said, Mrs. Clinton's advocacy was far less thunderous: The United States had tried every diplomatic gambit with Syria, she said, and nothing else had worked, so why not try funneling weapons to the moderate rebels."

And this:

"At the end of her tenure, for example, Mrs. Clinton wrote a memo to Mr. Obama recommending that the United States lift its half-century-old trade embargo against Cuba. It was not a position that she seriously advocated while at the State Department, officials said."

If you think it's any coincidence that anonymous "officials" are speaking out in ways that make Clinton look hypocritical is any coincidence, we have some oceanfront property in Arizona to sell you. No, it's pretty clear that feelings have been hurt and battle lines have been/are being drawn.

As in relationships, sometimes when you want a clean break, you need to be a little harsher than you'd like to be. Unfortunately for Clinton, that means the other person is much more liable to hold a grudge. And when that person is the incumbent president of the United States, things can get messy.

Time: "Obama Ally Knocks Hillary Clinton Over Iraq War Vote"

By Zeke Miller

August 12, 2014, 11:18 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] A flashback to 2008 campaign as Clinton tries to distance herself from Obama

A close confidant and former senior adviser to President Barack Obama took a not-so-veiled shot at Hillary Clinton on Tuesday for voting to authorize the Iraq War, in apparent push-back to the former Secretary of State's criticism of Obama's foreign policy.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," Clinton told the Atlantic in an interview published this week, as she attempts to distance herself from the President ahead of a possible 2016 White House run. White House aides use a more profane version of the phrase "Don't do stupid stuff" to characterize Obama's foreign policy vision.

"Just to clarify: 'Don't do stupid stuff" means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision," David Axelrod wrote on Twitter, in clear reference to Clinton's vote in favor of the Iraq War in 2002—a vote Obama said he opposed.

The critique was a rare rebuke of Clinton from Obama's inner circle, just as Clinton is starting the tricky balancing act of distancing herself from her increasingly unpopular former boss. Many Obama political aides, including 2012 campaign manager Jim Messina, have thrown their support behind a Clinton candidacy in 2016. The flare-up is also something of a flashback to the 2008 campaign, when Obama, with Axelrod's help, maneuvered to secure the Democratic nomination in a bitter fight largely by tying Clinton to the unpopular war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And it also highlights the lingering frustration among liberal groups over the Iraq War vote as Obama has reengaged American forces in an aerial campaign in that country, as well as the deep divisions that have emerged in the Democratic Party over the role of America in the world.

MoveOn, the liberal group that was organized largely around opposition to the Iraq War, blasted Clinton in a statement Tuesday: “Secretary Clinton, and any other person thinking about seeking the Democratic nomination in 2016, should think long and hard before embracing the same policies advocated by right-wing war hawks that got America into Iraq in the first place and helped set the stage for Iraq’s troubles today.”

Vox: “Hillary Clinton’s Atlantic interview show she’s not inevitable”

By Ezra Klein

August 12, 2014, 11:00 a.m. EDT

1. The most important unanswered question about Hillary Clinton's 2016 presidential campaign (which she more or less confirmed to Jeffrey Goldberg in an Atlantic interview) is how she's changed since 2008. The answer is that she hasn't — at least not on foreign policy.

2. Read the interview and you quickly see Clinton's strength as a candidate: she is more fluent, informed and authoritative in affairs of state than any of her plausible challengers. In the 2008 race, she famously posed the 3am phone call test: did voters trust her or naive, inexperienced Barack Obama to answer the kinds of calls that wake the president at 3am? She lost that campaign, but her subsequent experience as Secretary of State has only widened her lead on that question.

3. Read the interview, however, and you also see Clinton's weakness as a candidate: she is more hawkish than the post-Iraq Democratic Party. She is upset that she lost the internal administration debate over whether to intervene in Syria. She's focused on the expansive ambitions of radical jihadists. She takes a hard line on Iran's nuclear ambitions. She's frustrated that Obama thinks more about the dangers of action than the dangers of inaction. She's dismissive of Obama's shorthand foreign policy principle "don't do stupid stuff". She wants the country that defeated fascism and communism to develop a grand — and more interventionist — strategy to guide its leadership of the world. She sounds like a Democrat from 2002 rather than 2014.

4. She presents Democrats, to a surprising degree, with the same choice they faced in 2008. There's no doubt that Clinton is more prepared to answer that 3am call. But they may not like the call she makes immediately after. There are a lot of liberals out there who would prefer a nuclear Iran to a war with Iran. Many of them believe, rightly or wrongly, that President Obama quietly agrees with them. Clinton does not agree with them, and they're going to know it.

5. I remain skeptical that Rand Paul can win the Republican nomination for president. But if he does, it will set up a race in which the Republican is significantly more dovish than the Democrat. That will scramble political coalitions in unusual, and possibly significant, ways. For instance, Millennials have swung hard towards Democrats in recent years, but they're also much more dovish than older generations. Seniors, on the other hand, have become more Republicans, and are also more hawkish.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6. There is a pattern that has emerged in almost every recent interview Clinton has given: liberals walk away unnerved. She bumbled through a discussion of gay marriage with Terry Gross. She's dodged questions about the Keystone XL pipeline. She's had a lot of trouble discussing income inequality. I initially chalked some of this up to political rust. I am quickly revising that opinion.

7. In general, people underestimate the convictions politicians have and overestimate the cynicism of their positions. The interview with Goldberg is being analyzed as a calculated gamble on Clinton's part to distance herself from the Obama administration, and perhaps it is. But it matters because it's also much more than that: this is what Clinton really believes. It's what she believed before the Obama administration, it's what she fought for inside the Obama administration, and it's what she believes after leaving the Obama administration. This is insight into the kind of president Clinton would be, not just the kind of candidate she would be.

8. Political campaigns are decided not just by what candidates say but by which of their statements supporters believe to be true. One advantage Obama had in the Democratic primary was that even when he rhetorically moved towards the middle his liberal base didn't really buy it; his repeated assertions that he opposed gay marriage were never taken very seriously by his supporters, for instance. Clinton will have the opposite problem — and, potentially, the opposite advantage: She has clear and substantive disagreements with the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, and so her efforts to move to the left during the primary will often be viewed skeptically. But those disagreements will make it harder for Republicans to paint her as a liberal who's exactly like Barack Obama.

Bloomberg opinion: Al Hunt: “Calculating Hillary Gets the Math Wrong”

By Albert R. Hunt

August 12, 2014, 11:26 a.m. EDT

Picture the ad, either in the Democratic primaries or from a liberal independent candidate: Hillary Clinton -- a pro-Wall Street buckraker, a foreign policy interventionist -- championing George W. Bush's invasion of Iraq and looking like a lukewarm supporter of President Barack Obama.

Clinton's break last week with some of Obama's unpopular foreign policies, in an interview with my colleague Jeffrey Goldberg in the Atlantic, is going to cause her political problems.

It makes her look calculating -- probably unfairly -- when she already faces some skepticism about her authenticity. And her hawkish, interventionist stance is at odds with the country and especially the base of the Democratic party, of which she remains a formidable favorite to lead in the 2016 presidential race.

She said Obama's failure to aid the Syrian rebels last year contributed to the rise of the radical jihadists, Islamic State, threatening parts of Syria and Iraq today. She went a little further in her new book, "Hard Choices." She even suggested the administration lacks any overarching foreign policy vision.

Her support from Wall Street and the huge speaking fees she has taken from financial institutions since departing as secretary of state have already set off alarms with the Elizabeth Warren-loving populist wing of her party. Even in the country at large, Wall Street is about as popular as Congress, slightly ahead of toxic dump sites.

In the Atlantic interview, she essentially re-stated previous positions; she has long advocated an activist foreign policy. For good measure, she seemed to suggest she'd be more supportive of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu than Obama has been.

This at a time when little is going well for the president on the international front. Voters, by 60 percent to 36 percent, disapprove of the president's handling of foreign policy, according to last week's Wall Street Journal-NBC News poll.

Yet, as Politico's Maggie Haberman, a premiere Hillary watcher, reported, while it was her "furthest, most public step away" from Obama, the interview was scheduled well before the latest Islamic State-induced crisis, and the Hillary camp warned the White House about it.

In 2008, then-Senator Clinton ran against Obama as a backer of a muscular foreign policy who had voted for the Iraq invasion; it hurt her in that losing quest. She subsequently said she was mistaken on the war, yet now she's urging a greater American involvement in the region.

On Libya, she gets a bum rap from Republicans who hold her responsible for the killing of Americans in Benghazi two years ago. But she was the champion of American intervention in Libya to overthrow Muammar Qaddafi. When he was toppled, she thought it would be her signature achievement as secretary of state. Yet as that country has disintegrated into chaos, it's no longer a point of emphasis.

Clinton also hinted at further breaks with Obama policies. That's natural, yet she has to walk a delicate line, not looking too contrived. Surveys show Americans give her good marks for competence, intelligence and experience, but not so good on integrity and candor. And while Obama's popularity is low, his hardcore base remains loyal.

Clinton is an overwhelming favorite to win the Democratic nomination in two years, but her evolving positions may well encourage potential challengers who could be damaging. Think Pat Buchanan and the Republicans in 1992, or even Gene McCarthy and the Democrats in 1968.

Thirty years ago, Michael Kinsley, then with The New Republic, sought to prove his theory that few of Washington's elites actually read the highfalutin best sellers that they dutifully buy and profess to admire. At a local bookstore, he slipped a note with his phone number deep into the pages of hot new books by the likes of the foreign-policy hand Strobe Talbott and the political pundit Ben Wattenberg, promising a $5 reward to anyone who read that far. Kinsley reported that no one called.

In the digital age, we have the technology to address this same question on a national scale. This summer, a University of Wisconsin mathematician, Jordan Ellenberg, created a small stir by inventing what he called the "Hawking Index" in honor of Stephen Hawking's much-praised, if not necessarily much-read, A Brief History of Time. Using Amazon's posted lists of the top five "popular highlights" in books notated by Kindle readers—and the page numbers those highlights fall on—Ellenberg crafted a quasi-scientific formula to compute how thoroughly best sellers were being consumed. At the high end by far was Donna Tartt's novel The Goldfinch, which scored an anomalous 98.5 percent on the Hawking Index. Among nonfiction books, Michael Lewis's Flash Boys was a leader, at 21.7 percent. At the bottom, breaking Hawking's previous low (6.6 percent), was the most-written-about best seller of the year, Thomas Piketty's Capital in the Twenty-First Century, at 2.4 percent. It didn't take long for a wiseass at the Washington Post to note that another best seller fell still lower than Piketty on the Hawking scale, at 2.04 percent: Hillary Clinton's Hard Choices.

It has been an unexpectedly hard summer for Hard Choices—and, by implication, for its author. The book had a dream rollout worthy of J. K. Rowling: a prime-time ABC special with Diane Sawyer, Good Morning America with Robin Roberts, a CNN town hall with Christiane Amanpour, Jane Pauley on CBS, The Daily Show, online Q&As at Facebook and Twitter, even a respectful interview with Greta Van Susteren and Bret Baier at Fox News. But the book tour was stalked by controversies—Clinton's tone-deaf complaint about being "dead broke" after leaving the White House in 2001, her fumbled answers to questions about her astronomical speaking fees. And much of the press was unkind to Hard Choices itself. You know a Clinton book is in trouble when one of its few partisans is a Fox News personality—Van Susteren, who called it "a fun read." John Dickerson of Slate spoke for many of those hardy few who actually read the book from cover to cover when he described it as "the low-salt, low-fat, low-calorie offering with vanilla pudding as the dessert." The only news in Hard Choices was not to be found in its 656-page ocean of prose but in the subtext. Despite Clinton's disingenuous claim in the epilogue about 2016 ("I haven't decided yet"), no one in her right mind would write a fat book this dull, this unrevealing, and this innocuous unless she were running for president.

The ultimate indignity arrived soon after publication: Following a brief reign as a No. 1 best seller, Hard Choices was toppled by Blood Feud: The Clintons vs. the Obamas, by Edward Klein, whose loathing of the Clintons is exceeded only by his loathing of the Obamas. Klein had no big book tour, no broadcast-network interviews, and almost no reviews. Yet once Blood Feud had usurped Hard Choices, Clinton never returned to the top of the Times list.

In terms of cumulative sales, the best-seller-list pecking order is a red herring. Hillary will easily outsell Klein in the final accounting; so large were her sales in that first week before word-of-mouth took its toll that it is statistically unimaginable that he could catch up. Nonetheless, the showing of Hard Choices is disappointing by Clinton standards—far below the benchmark set by her 2003 memoir, Living History. Extrapolating charitably from the sales figures tracked thus far by Nielsen BookScan, half of the 1 million copies in the "sold out" hardcover first printing may be returned by booksellers for a refund. By the time of publication, it was reported that signed copies of Hard Choices were selling for close to $400 on eBay. By last week, they were going begging by the score at $79.95.

The Clinton camp was sufficiently stung by the perception of failure to try to spin the numbers. Finally, spokesmen for all three Clintons were moved to release a joint statement attacking Klein and a couple of other anti-Clinton authors whose new titles have less successfully competed with Hard Choices this summer. Their books, the statement said, "should be reserved for the fiction bin, if not the trash … Legitimate media outlets who know with every fiber of their being that this is complete crap should know not to get down in the gutter with them and spread their lies."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the disappointing trajectory of Hard Choices and the concurrent rise of Blood Feud say more about Hillary Clinton, her own book, and the vulnerabilities of her potential presidential run than they do about the media or the commercial durability of Clinton bashers. Aside from money, which she does not need, and publicity, which she also does not need, what is the motivation to write and strenuously promote a memoir that obscures more than it tells and that is not so much a personal statement about the hard choices she has faced as a string of uncontroversial position papers salted with upbeat anecdotes? It's safe to assume that the readers who bought Hard Choices, a sizable group when compared with the audience for most books, admire and in many cases revere Hillary Clinton. They hunger to get to know her better. What is to be gained—whether now or in 2016—by selling them a book whose main value is as a sleep aid?

As it happens, Klein's book is complete crap, but it is relatively amusing crap (Hawking Index: 19.7 percent) next to Hillary's slog through seemingly every engagement on her official secretary of State calendar. According to the Times, "Some publishing industry insiders" believe that Blood Feud, despite being a "barely sourced account full of implausible passages," was selling not just to the usual Clinton haters but to liberals and "readers who are simply looking for irresistible entertainment." If you've read Hard Choices, you can't blame them for seeking comic relief—and possibly seeking a different Hillary.

"Before we are Republicans or Democrats, liberals or conservatives, or any of the other labels that divide us as often as define us, we are Americans, all with a personal stake in our country," the Hillary of Hard Choices writes, typically, early on. You fear you've wandered by accident into a "for kids" edition aimed at lower-school readers, but no such luck. The entire book is crafted to avoid startling children and adults of all ages. Hardly do we encounter its uncontroversial thesis—"Our choices and how we handle them shape the people we become"—than we get a disclaimer: "Of course, quite a few important choices, characters, countries, and events are not included here." And so it goes. Hillary can't begin a paragraph with the sentence "I am not alone in feeling so personally invested in Israel's security and success" without starting the subsequent paragraph with "I was also an early voice calling publicly for Palestinian statehood." In chapters like "Iran: Sanctions and Secrets" and "Climate Change: We're All in This Together," she tells us what we already know, larded with an excess of superficial and sometimes self-aggrandizing detail as well as bullet points from various official proposals and hefty excerpts from speeches and town-hall meetings. There's lots of name-checking ("I always enjoy seeing Ehud") and lots of firsts. "No previous U.S. Secretary of State had ever visited the organization's headquarters" (ASEAN, if you're asking) … "No Secretary of State had ever visited this city before" (Chennai, India) … "I would be the first Secretary of State to visit in more than half a century" (Burma). Quantity always trumps quality.

Some of us don't expect (or want) to hear about the Clintons' private lives. But if Hillary insists on taking us to Chelsea's wedding anyway, she might include a little personal revelation to go along with the generic Hallmark sentiments. Instead the occasion is repurposed for political branding: "This, I thought, is why Bill and I had worked so hard for so many years to help build a better world—so Chelsea could grow up safe and happy and one day have a family of her own, and so every other child would have the same chance."

The only touching passages in Hard Choices can be found in Hillary's generous and humorous portrait of the one-of-a-kind diplomat Richard Holbrooke, who died tragically while trying to stave off incoming fire from Pakistan, Afghanistan, and the antagonists in the Obama White House (unnamed, of course) who tried "to force him out of the job." Next to Holbrooke, Bill Clinton and Barack Obama emerge as ciphers in Hard Choices. Hillary's trusted aide Huma Abedin is more vividly present, but the public spousal scandal that proved a major distraction to both her and the nation during her service at State goes unmentioned. Also "not included here" are the hard choices—a.k.a. bad choices—that hobbled Hillary's 2008 presidential campaign. To her credit, she does finally call her 2002 Senate vote to authorize the Iraq invasion "a mistake," though the blame is deflected from her own faulty judgment and political cowardice to the Bush administration's phony case for war. The candor of this overdue admission, however, is negated by an account of her 2011 speech in Geneva championing LGBT human rights in which she schooled foreign leaders that "leadership, by definition, means being out in front of your people when it is called for." Given that the Clinton administration's "leadership" record included being out front in supporting "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" and the Defense of Marriage Act, you might expect at least a mini mea culpa, or some circumspect grace note of irony, but Hillary just leaves out that embarrassing history entirely. No wonder she bristled when Terry Gross challenged the timing of her tardy evolution on gay marriage in a book-tour interview for NPR's "Fresh Air."

If Clinton could be flummoxed by NPR, it only followed that her camp would hyperventilate about Ed Klein. Blood Feud is patently ridiculous, but despite the Clinton statement chastising “legitimate media” for spreading its “lies,” the “legitimate media” is doing no such thing. Neither has the “illegitimate media” (the pro forma Drudge headlines aside) or conservative media. It’s not just that the Times, the Washington Post, and Slate either ignored or ridiculed Blood Feud. The Weekly Standard and National Review didn’t bother to review it either; the Murdoch imprint that originally bought the book dropped it. (The boutique right-wing house Regnery stepped in.) On his radio show, no less a Hillary hater than Rush Limbaugh said he found “some of the quotes” in Klein’s book “odd in the sense I don’t know people who speak this way.” He also questioned the credibility of the book’s two pivotal confrontations between the Clintons and the Obamas: a couples dinner in the Obama White House’s private residence that could be an outtake from Meet the Fockers, and a fateful golf game where Obama supposedly assented to a deal to support Hillary in 2016 in exchange for Bill’s supporting him in 2012.

Limbaugh was just the latest to join the many on the right who have bailed on Klein. When Klein’s first Clinton hit job, The Truth About Hillary, was published in 2005, John Podhoretz famously wrote: “Thirty pages into it, I wanted to take a shower. Sixty pages into it, I wanted to be decontaminated.” In that book, Klein had claimed that Chelsea Clinton had been conceived in an incident of marital rape and that Hillary was a (nonpracticing) lesbian, or in any case had lesbian friends, or closeted lesbian friends, or whatever, as an undergraduate at Wellesley College. Bill O’Reilly refused to book Klein on his Fox News show then, a snub he repeated for the new book. Even a host on the rigidly party-line Fox News morning show Fox & Friends was skeptical about Blood Feud, joking that the only possible source for one of the book’s Bill-Hillary exchanges would have had to be Chelsea.

That Blood Feud has sold so well can’t be attributed to the salaciousness of its breathless “revelations.” No rape this time, and none of Klein’s weirdly self-revealing sapphic fantasies. We must settle instead for the news that Hillary may have had some “work” done, and that she may have some routine health concerns that require monitoring, a condition she shares with basically every other 66-year-old in America. There’s a moment where Hillary jabs Obama with her finger to argue a point and Obama later tells Michelle that “it hurt.” But Klein himself doesn’t lay a finger on Hillary. Indeed, he absolves her of the biggest crime the right holds against her—an alleged Benghazi cover-up. In contrast to Hillary’s lengthy and defensive rehash of that incident in Hard Choices, Klein just blames the supposed subterfuge on Obama. The president, it turns out, had concocted a cover story and ordered his secretary of State to disseminate it. When Hillary recounts her plight to Bill, he replies, “Those bullshit talking points manufactured in the White House sausage factory aren’t going to hold up … Eventually, the lie is going to be exposed, and you’ll take the fall for it. Then, believe me, Obama will dump you.” Say what you will about Limbaugh, he knows bogus dialogue when he hears it.

Blood Feud is padded with recyclings from Klein’s previous anti-Obama book, The Amateur, and citations from-mainstream-media Obama reporting by writers like Jodi Kantor and Ryan Lizza. What makes the book enjoyable is the self-parodistic overkill of Klein’s writing (a Rahm Emanuel anecdote ends with him hitting “his forehead with the heel of his hand” and saying, “Oy vey!”); the sheer absurdity of his conspiracy theories; and, against all odds, the unexpected, perhaps even unintentional, emergence of a likable Hillary.

Unlike The Truth About Hillary, which mustered the fig leaf of footnotes, Klein doesn’t bother with that pretense this time around and instead cloaks all in “what journalists call ‘deep background.’ ” And so, delightfully, anything goes. We learn that Valerie Jarrett runs the White House with an iron fist and is plotting an Illinois Senate bid by Michelle Obama against the stroke-impaired Republican incumbent, Mark Kirk. Bill commissions a “secret poll” in 2012 showing that Hillary is more popular than Barack Obama and urges her to lead an intraparty insurrection against the sitting president. The Obamas hate the Clintons so much that the president wants to renege on his promise to back Hillary in 2016 and support Joe Biden or possibly John Kerry or an unspecified Obama “mini-me” instead. (Lately, Klein has been identifying the mini-me in New York Post “exclusives” as Elizabeth Warren; she’s not even mentioned in his book.) Klein’s blood-feud thesis, culminating in a chapter titled “ ‘There Will Be Blood,’ ” is so nonsensical that he is compelled to write: “At this point, some readers might raise an objection: How was it possible for Bill Clinton to campaign all-out for Barack Obama [in 2012] while wishing to see him lose? How does that make sense? It only makes sense if we stop to remember that politicians are different from you and me.” Got it!

The cumulative bottom line of this narrative is that next to Barack Obama, who is portrayed as an incompetent mobster, and Bill Clinton, who is always turning red with anger when he's not cruising waitresses in close proximity to his presidential library in Little Rock, Hillary is by far the most appealing character, a foulmouthed, independent-minded executive you'd like to have that proverbial beer with. You can't fault a reader for wanting to spend time with Klein's two-fisted Hillary rather than the often robotic self-censoring bureaucrat of Hard Choices. Both these Hillarys are in essence fictional creations crafted for the marketplace—one embellished with camp to sell books, the other embalmed with civic virtue to win votes—so in the end, it all comes down to which kind of fiction you prefer. The real Hillary, whomever she may be, is scantly visible in either book. But with all due respect to Greta Van Susteren, it's Klein's who turns out to be "fun."

One of the several shopworn themes of Hard Choices is that when you make a mistake, you learn from it. No doubt the 2016 Clinton-campaign-in-waiting is learning, as many have reported, that its candidate is rusty after her years above the political fray as secretary of State and that she and her enforcers still don't know how to deal with a press corps they despise. Hillaryland reacted to the mishaps of the book tour, the disappointing sales, and the nuisance of a gnat like Klein with an overkill that recalls its ham-fisted efforts to cope with the Obama insurgency in 2008.

Now as then, the case for a Hillary victory is overwhelming: a more-or-less unified Democratic Party; the lack of a gangbusters opponent in either party; a fractious and self-immolating GOP that seems determined to drive away women, minorities, and young people; and an ability to raise tons of money. But as we all know, Hillary was inevitable in 2008 too. Anything can happen in the next two years.

The continued failure of Benghazi (or, for that matter, any foreign-policy issue on Hillary's watch) to gain traction with the public has lately spawned an alternative line of attack by potential Republican opponents: Hillary is a "20th-century candidate." As a recent fund-raising appeal from Mario Rubio's PAC had it, "Clinton's ideas are from the days of the Macarena, Prodigy Internet, and the Y2K scare." That's a big step forward from the 19th-century ideas championed by the GOP's anti-government and xenophobic base, but the orchestrated rollout of Hard Choices nonetheless reeked of old-school Establishment political culture: the inevitable hype about how the D.C. "superlawyer" Robert Barnett secured a multimillion-dollar advance, the prepublication press embargo to build suspense, the leaks of selected passages to friendly media, the breathless accounts of which television name would be awarded the "get" of the first interview with the author, the fiercely stage-managed book signings. It was all reminiscent of the stately, too-big-to-fail corporate culture of Hillary's 2008 presidential campaign.

A bigger issue raised by Hard Choices is a more fundamental one—the assumption by Hillary and her handlers that the Hillary Clinton portrayed in its pages is the one voters want: a cautious, unspontaneous caretaker of all things good and true who will never run a yellow light or frighten the horses. Not a Hillary who knocks back a drink stronger than Chardonnay, not a Hillary who will fire back at the partisan congressional committee running a Benghazi witch hunt with a rightly intemperate "What difference at this point does it make?"

The blandness of the Hillary presented in Hard Choices was a political, not a literary, choice. It is what created the vacuum that a nimble opportunist like Klein could fill—and that conceivably an opposing candidate might fill, much as Obama did. It's a book that made no effort to entice, let alone win over, voters who weren't Hillary fans in the first place. On the other hand, Blood Feud just might attract some new adherents. One of my favorite moments in Klein's fantasia occurs when Bill Clinton tells his wife that he wants her to get plastic surgery because "dowdy and old doesn't win the White House these days." To which, in the author's inimitable style, Hillary responds, "Fuck you. Get your own face-lift." I am sure that the Clinton camp is correct and this deplorable, trashy scene never happened. But tell me: Wouldn't you be more enthusiastic about voting for Hillary Clinton if it had?

BBC: “The US, IS and the conspiracy theory sweeping Lebanon”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 11, 2014

[Subtitle:] Is America behind the creation of the Islamic State? The BBC's Suzanne Kianpour, in Beirut, looks at the latest conspiracy theory doing the rounds in Lebanon.

"In the Middle East, conspiracy theories are in our blood," one former Lebanese official said over lunch in a restaurant in central Beirut.

He was referring to the latest talk of the town: the United States is behind the creation of the Islamic State group (formerly known as Isis, the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria) and Hillary Clinton admitted it in her book "Hard Choices".

As Islamic State (IS) militants advanced into Lebanon last week - spreading terror into the village of Arsal, bordering Syria, and driving hundreds out of their homes - whispers pinned the blame for their actions on the US.

Horrific videos of IS atrocities against Lebanese Armed Forces circulated on the internet. So did the theory that America is behind the existence and emboldening of the group.

To back up their claim, conspiracy theorists online pointed to a powerful piece of "proof": the word of Hillary Clinton - the former US secretary of state widely expected to make a bid for the presidency.

Dispelling rumours

Screenshots of supposed "excerpts" from her book spread far and wide on social media in Lebanon, claiming the US created IS to instil instability in the region for American gain.

The rumour even prompted the Lebanese foreign ministry to summon US Ambassador to Lebanon David Hale.

Furthermore, to try and quash the gossip, the US embassy in Beirut issued a statement on Facebook:

"Any suggestion that the United States ever considered recognising the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant as anything other than a terrorist organization, or had any role in its creation, is patently false. Allegations circulating in Lebanon to the contrary are a fabrication."

Instead, what Hillary Clinton has said is that the failure to help Syrian rebels led to the rise of IS.

It's not completely shocking that such a theory may have started, given America's history of supporting militant and guerrilla groups; the mujahideen in Afghanistan, from which al-Qaeda emerged, quickly comes to mind. The fact that US allies in the Gulf are accused of supporting IS also doesn't help their case.

"Such theories abound, largely because Washington has shown a propensity for outsourcing regime change. Support for insurgent groups in that context is certainly not a new practice and, as of late, has not been a particularly effective one," says Octavius Pinkard, a Brussels-based specialist in foreign policy analysis and Middle East politics, who has been conducting fieldwork in Beirut.

Tarnished image

Rumours like these risk harming US interests in Lebanon - a nation where they have a keen interest in maintaining soft power. Symbolic confrontation and proxy battles for clout with another group also seeking to win over the Lebanese people, Hezbollah, are nothing new.

But a theory that America is to blame for beheadings and the barbaric acts attributed to IS can be severely damaging to the US image - leaving them at risk of losing support and the tide turning against them.

Recently, the narrative on the streets of Beirut has increasingly been that Hezbollah won't let IS get to the Lebanese capital, not "America will help us."

"Most people here believe the US and Saudi are one and when it comes strictly down to oil money, the ultimate benefactor from the whole IS debacle is Saudi/the US. As history has taught us, it is usually the benefactors who are the instigators," says Amer Murad, a native of Beirut.

"An important development that we have seen is the collaboration between the Lebanese Army and Hezbollah in their efforts to protect Lebanon from threats posed by the Syrian civil war spilling over into Lebanese territory," Octavius Pinkard says.

As the conflict in Syria/Lebanon evolves, so does the perception of Washington. And it appears the Hezbollah/Damascus/Tehran trio is winning the propaganda battle.

However, when Obama announced airstrikes against IS in Iraq on Thursday, love for the US returned to Facebook.

"I've never been happier for American intervention," one Lebanese user posted.

Perhaps it may be too soon to say if US popularity in Lebanon might recover based on their progress in Iraq, but at the moment, America appears to be suffering a PR crisis among the people normally supportive of it.

Haaretz opinion: Peter Beinart: “Israel’s new lawyer: Hillary Clinton”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Peter Beinart, The Atlantic

August 11, 2014, 5:24 p.m.

[Subtitle:] She sees the Israeli-Palestinian conflict through Bibi's eyes, which could be the reason she gets so much wrong.

Who's the Israeli government's best spokesperson? Ron Dermer? Michael Oren? Bibi himself? Nope. It's Hillary Clinton. In her interview on Sunday with Jeffrey Goldberg, Clinton offered the most articulate, sophisticated, passionate defense of Netanyahu's conduct I've heard from a government official on either side of the Atlantic. Unfortunately, important chunks of it aren't true.

Let's take her claims in turn.

In his first term, Netanyahu moved towards a Palestinian state

Clinton began her defense of Bibi by noting that in his first term, in the late 1990s, he had "give[n] up territory" and "moved in that direction [towards a Palestinian state], as hard as it was."

That's extremely generous. It's true that in 1997, Bibi withdrew Israeli troops from most of the West Bank city of Hebron (though they can reenter any time Israel wants) and the following year signed the Wye River Accords, under which Israel was supposed to hand over 13 percent of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority (though Bibi's government fell before it could do so).

What Clinton leaves out is that Bibi only agreed to these withdrawals to forestall the far larger ones envisioned under the Oslo Accords he inherited from Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres. In 1993, when Oslo was signed, Bibi publicly compared it to Neville Chamberlain's surrender of the Sudetenland to Adolf Hitler.

He accepted Oslo in the 1996 election campaign only because he couldn't repudiate a process endorsed by the Israeli center and championed by the United States. So Bibi sabotaged Oslo by accelerating settlement growth and minimizing the amount of land Israel relinquished. "Before I took office," he later boasted, "the conception was to give away everything except for two percent [of West Bank] while I turned everything around and gave just two percent to [full control] of the Palestinian Authority." Or as he told settlers after leaving office, "I stopped the Oslo Accords."

The Clinton administration officials who dealt with Bibi in his first term understood this all too well. "Neither President Clinton nor Secretary [Madeleine] Albright believed that Bibi had any real interest in pursuing peace," writes Dennis Ross in The Missing Peace. Ross' deputy, Aaron Miller, adds in his memoir that, "all of us saw Bibi as a kind of speed bump that would have to be negotiated along the way until a new Israeli prime minister came along who was more serious about peace."

That's a far cry from what Hillary told Goldberg. Then again, Ross and Miller aren't running for president.

Bibi agreed to a settlement freeze but Abbas wouldn't negotiate

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fast-forwarding to the Obama years, Clinton claims that, “I got Netanyahu to agree to the unprecedented settlement freeze… It took me nine months to get Abbas into the negotiations even after we delivered on the settlement freeze.”

What’s striking, again, is what Clinton leaves out. The settlement freeze was indeed, unprecedented. Unfortunately, it didn’t actually freeze settlement growth. It’s not just that, as Clinton admits, the “freeze” exempted East Jerusalem. Even more importantly, it exempted buildings on which construction had all ready begun. This loophole proved crucial because, as the Israeli press reported at the time, settlers spent the months preceding the “freeze” feverishly breaking ground on new construction, on which they continued to build during the ten month “freeze,” before breaking new ground once it expired. As a result, according to Peace Now, there was more new settlement construction in 2010 - the year of the freeze - than in 2008. As Obama administration envoy George Mitchell admitted to Palestinian negotiator Saab Erekat, the Obama administration had wanted a freeze that truly stopped settlement growth but “we failed.”

Clinton’s claim that Abbas refused to negotiate until the last minute is disingenuous too. In fact, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met repeatedly during the “freeze.” In January 2010, just over a month after it began, veteran Israeli columnist Ben Caspit reported that, “In the past weeks, Israeli representatives, including Netanyahu, have repeatedly rejected official documents that their Palestinian counterparts have tried to submit to them, with details of the Palestinian positions on all the core issues. The Israeli representatives are completely unwilling to discuss, read or touch these documents, not to speak of submitting an equivalent Israeli document with the Israeli positions.”

While reporting my book, The Crisis of Zionism, I heard four different Obama officials confirm this account. During the settlement “freeze,” the Palestinians submitted to Netanyahu and his aides the same positions they had submitted to Netanyahu’s predecessor, Ehud Olmert. These included a Palestinian state on the 1967 lines with a 1.9 percent land swap for territory inside Israel proper, Israeli control of all the Jewish neighborhoods of East Jerusalem, international troops in the Jordan Valley and the return of 150,000 Palestinian refugees over ten years. The Netanyahu government, by contrast, steadfastly refused to discuss the parameters of a Palestinian state.

In her interview with Goldberg, Clinton never mentions that.

Netanyahu’s views on Palestinian statehood resembled Ehud Barak’s.

Given the evidence that during her time as secretary of state, Bibi refused to discuss territory, Clinton’s claim that “I saw Netanyahu move from being against the two-state solution to…considering all kinds of Barak-like options” is bizarre. Whatever you think of Ehud Barak’s offer at Camp David in July 2000, it was a detailed offer. Netanyahu, by contrast, refused put forward a territorial proposal not merely during Clinton’s term, but during John Kerry’s far more aggressive effort to broker a deal. During the Kerry negotiations, according to Haaretz’s Barak Ravid, Netanyahu “flatly refused to present a map or even to discuss the subject theoretically…throughout the nine months of the talks Netanyahu did not give the slightest hint about the scale of the territorial concessions he would be willing to make.”

It’s too bad Goldberg didn’t press Clinton on what kind of “Barak-like options” she heard Netanyahu propose, because the best reporting we have suggests he offered no territorial “options” at all.

Netanyahu is right to demand indefinite control of the West Bank

Most remarkable of all, Clinton tells Goldberg that, “If I were the prime minister of Israel, you’re damn right I would expect to have security [control over the West Bank].” What makes this statement so remarkable is that earlier in the interview, Hillary praised the Clinton parameters outlined by her husband in December 2000. Those parameters permit Israeli troops to remain in the Jordan Valley, along the West Bank’s border with Jordan, for three years. Later in the interview, Clinton claims that she convinced Abbas to agree to allow Israeli troops to remain for “six, seven, eight years” and that she “got Netanyahu to go from forever to 2025” as a date for their withdrawal. Even this, from a Palestinian perspective, represents painful backsliding from the position outlined by Hillary’s husband. But as Hillary must know, Bibi three weeks ago said that in light of regional developments, “there cannot be a situation, under any agreement, in which we relinquish security control of the territory west of the River Jordan.” Which is to say that, as of now, Bibi’s position really does seem to be “forever.” Yet rather than challenge that stance, Clinton endorses it.

Why does Clinton again and again endorse Netanyahu’s view of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict even when it contradicts long-standing American positions? Because she’s so willing to see the world through his eyes. Notice how she begins her statement about security control of the West Bank: “If I were the prime minister of Israel.” There’s nothing wrong with that. U.S. officials should understand, and empathize with, Israeli leaders, even right-wing ones. But what’s missing from Clinton’s interview is any willingness to do the same for Palestinians. If it’s so easy to understand why some Israelis might want perpetual military control of the West Bank, why can’t Clinton understand why Palestinians - after living for almost fifty years under a foreign army - might not want it to indefinitely patrol their supposedly independent state.

One of the hallmarks of Barack Obama’s statements about Israel and Palestine, going back to his 2008 presidential campaign, has been his insistence on giving voice to the fears and aspirations of both sides. Writing about his trip to Israel in The Audacity of Hope, Obama wrote that, “I talked to Jews who’d lost parents in the Holocaust and brothers in suicide bombings; I heard Palestinians talk of the indignities of checkpoints and reminisce about the land they had lost.” In Jerusalem last March, he spoke movingly, and in detail about the Jewish story, but also asked Israelis to “put yourself in their [the Palestinians] shoes. Look at the world through their eyes.” In her interview with Goldberg, that’s exactly what Clinton does not do. Her interpretations of recent Israeli-Palestinian history reflect from a deep imbalance: a willingness to see reality through Israeli eyes and an almost total refusal to do the same for Palestinians.

“For far too long,” wrote Aaron Miller in 2005, “many American officials involved in Arab-Israeli peacemaking, myself included, have acted as Israel's attorney, catering and coordinating with the Israelis at the expense of successful peace negotiations.” From the beginning, Barack Obama has tried to avoid that. Although he hasn’t brokered Israeli-Palestinian peace, he has tried to make good on his campaign promise to “hold up a mirror” to both sides. In Hillary Clinton, by contrast, at least judging from her interview on Sunay, Israel has yet another lawyer. And a very good one at that.

Mediaite: “RNC Chairman: I ‘Prefer’ a Hillary Run in 2016”

By Eddie Scarry

August 12, 2014, 10:54 a.m. EDT

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus is “ready for Hillary” in 2016.

Preibus said in a new interview with Real Clear Politics that though he think former secretary of state Hillary Clinton is “sending mixed signals” about her political ambitions, he would be okay with Republicans facing her in the next presidential election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think her favorables are way too low for someone that’s supposed to be inevitable,” Priebus said. “I think that she’s exhibited an uncanny ability to make mistakes politically and she completely unifies the Republican Party. And all I’m telling you is, politically, that’s not a bad place. I actually would prefer it.”

Priebus has said in the past that Republicans have a “truckload” of opposition research to use against Clinton in the event that she runs. He has also said he would use her husband’s extramarital affair with Monica Lewinsky against Clinton.

Priebus said in his interview with RCP that he has doubts, however, that Clinton will run. “Does she really want to go through with all of this?” he said. “Does she really want to deal with the politics and the grind of a primary for the next two years?”

Clinton has seen a drop in her popularity of late, due in large part to several awkward encounters and comments she made while promoting her new memoir.

I like that. Another option:

@marcorubio I'm for the Cuban people. Time to stop helping the Castros through failed policies. Going back to those would be the mistake.

They will likely attack around the argument that this decision will lead to increased energy prices for those on fixed incomes. They will also point out that if his rationale is increased CO2 exposure, HRC's State Department said there will negligible traces. Just a fyi.

Will we move forward with the op Ed and fact sheet with or with Obama KXL action?

2. Modernizing our Pipeline System – A pledge to repair or replace thousands of miles of outdated pipeline by the end of her first term, through a new "Pipeline Partnership" that supports rate relief for states, cities and rural communities that accelerate replacement of outdated pipes (good for LiUNA and UA).

3. Increase Rail Safety – Accelerate the phase-out of outdated tank cars and repair track defects (will create jobs for affiliates with exposure on the tank car manufacturing and track repair fronts, though the Teamsters may be negative if they see it as slowing oil-by-rail volumes).

4. Enhance Grid Security - Provide new tools and resources to states, cities and rural communities to make the investments necessary to improve grid resilience to both cyber-attack and extreme weather events (positive for IBEW).

5. Expanding Consumer Choice: Offer financing tools for grid investments that support the integration of distributed energy resources and for gas pipeline investments that enable households and businesses to switch away from heating oil and other petroleum products (the trades won't love the distributed energy piece but the expanded natural gas pipeline network to enable replacement of old fuel oil furnaces with natural gas furnaces is positive for LiUNA, UA and the Boilermakers) .

6. Transmission Investment: Ensure the federal government is a partner in getting low-cost wind and other renewable energy to market through improved federal coordination and cooperation with local governments and power companies (positive for IBEW).

7. Transportation Funding: Work with Congress to close corporate tax loopholes and increase invest investment in transportation solutions that expand transit access and reduce congestion, commute times, oil consumption, and pollution (positive for IBEW, ironworkers and other public transit-exposed trades).

More broadly, we are calling for a North American Climate Compact that would provide a coordinate, continent-wide energy and climate framework so we don't have to keep battling it our pipeline-by-pipeline and can provides infrastructure investment certainty. That section of the factsheet includes the following line, which the trades should like:

Infrastructure Standards: Develop common, world-class standards for North American infrastructure that create good jobs and ensure energy transportation across the continent is clean, safe, reliable and affordable.

Happy to discuss this weekend if you'd like. I'm at 917-755-5446 .

Best,

Trevor

Can we make sure that Nikki sees the statement before it goes out? Just want to make sure we don't catch anyone by surprise. We are so close to getting bldg trades and if we do this right, it will be ok even though they won't like it.

I just wanted to try to politically get ahead of this and where we are on the issue if this in fact happens. The trades are also hearing that HRC will put out a statement stating that she encouraged Obama to take this position. Politically with the building trades, this would be a very dangerous posture. Just curious what your thoughts will be if the situation goes this way on Monday.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Palin Speech in Dayton, OH 08/29/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Kelli, on the ground in Dayton, OH. She was unable to film the event, though we were able to capture it via online streaming video. Below are the notes from our effort.

Big Highlights

John McCain's Speech:

- Crowd sung "Happy Birthday"
- Said his VP choice was ready to be president
- focused on her history of being anti-corruption and anti-wasteful spending
- Mentioned her energy credentials

Sarah Palins Speech:

- Theme: Reform, Energy
- Entire first third of Palin's speech focused on her family
- Speaks of Son who enlisted into the Army and is deploying Sept 11 to Iraq.
- Highlighted her attempts to fight corruption, stand up to big oil and fight the good o' boy network
- "I Told congress thanks but no thanks on that bridge to nowhere, if our state wanted a bridge, I said, we'd build it ourselves"
- Says McCain has a "servants heart"
- Highlighted McCain's POW story
- Says McCain is the only candidate in this election who has truly fought for America
- Spoke on Foreign issues including Russia, Iran
- Congratulated HRC and Geraldine Ferraro

Dayton, OH: McCain and Palin Speech - VP announcement 08/29/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- Basketball stadium on college campus.
- Homemade signs were preplaced in empty seats prior to event.
- Signs read "Happy Birthday" and "maverick" as well as "I Love McCain".
- Guests were not allowed to bring in their own signs, food, water, cameras and spiked jewelry.
- Three foot high stage in the middle of the floor. Teleprompter. Local marching band seated on upper balcony.
- Huge banner "Country First" behind stage.
- People with VIP tickets were sat in chairs on the floor. The rest of the audience sat in upper sections.
- The venue was filled and a handful of guests were struggling to find seats.
- Tickets did not seem to be available at door.
- VERY tight security.
- About 50 demonstrators outside main entrance. Chanting four more years and holding McSame signs and McCain hearts NAFTA. SEIU and Pink shirts in the mix.

McCain's Remarks:

McCain introduced with Cindy and Lindsay
Thank you thank you

Crowd singing happy birthday

Thanks for reminding me

Twice is enough
That's three times

Very happy today to spend my birthday today and make a historic announcement in day to on good people. Industrial Midwest contributes to America. Understand what you're going through in these hard times. I'm running for POTUS to fight for you.

Spend last couple months looking for running mate to help me shake up Washington. Many good people to pick from. Continue to rely on their support and advice.
I could only choose one. I have found the right one to stand up with me. For your needs before their interests. Outstanding reputation, fought against corruption, wasteful spending, executive experience, tackling tough problems, reached across aisle, fighting spirit deep compassion Decent hard working middle class family. Parents both worked in school. Taught children to excel in sports. Was a union member and is married to a union member. Mortgage payments and health care. PTA, city council, mayor, and now a governor. Beat the long odds to win an election. In the week we celebrate women's suffrage. A devoted wife and a mother of five. She's not from these parts or Washington you'll be impressed. Common good.

She knows where she comes form and who she works for doesn't let anyone tell her to sit down. Fought oil companies and party bosses and buearocrats. She's exactly what I need and what this country needs

To help me fight the same old Washington the next vp of the united states, governor Sara Palin of the great state of Alaska.

[Joins McCain on stage with her family]

Thank you so much.
And I thank senator McCain and Cindy. I am honored

I will be honored to serve next to the next potus I know that when he gave me this opportunity he had a list of great choices. I am honored.

First there are a few people I would like you to meet. Husband todd, it's our anniversary 25 years promised todd a little surprise and I did deliver. He's a commercial fisherman, production operator snow machine racer, we met in High school. Still the man I admire most. Our son is in the army, Trac now serves in the infantry, will soon be deployed to iraq. We are so proud.

Crowd chants USA

Our daughters piper, willow, son trig

Never set out to be in public affairs, grew up working with our hands, average hockey mom in Alaska. Got involved in the PTA then city council, then mayor, I wanted to lower govt spending, then onto ethics committee, fought corruption hard, a long with fellow reformers I stood up to politics as usual, oil companies and good ole boy network. I sent a large share of oil revenues back to citizens of Alaska, building pipeline to energy independence. Ethics, appointed dems and indeps to my cabinet. Said no to ridge to nowhere. If we wanted a bridge we'd build it ourselves.

A ship In harbor is safe but that's not why the ship is built, the people of America expect us to seek public office and serve for the right reason, challenge the status quo, common good.

Govern with integrity, now no leader in America has shown these qualities more than john McCain. Always been there to serve his country not just his party. My running mate is a man who has shown those qualities in the darkest of places and in serving his country. That man did things not many people could make it through. I'm going to make sure no one forgets that in this campaign.

This is a moment when great causes can be won and great threats defeated, Iran nuclear weapons. It was John McCain that warned long ago about Russian threat to Georgia. As the commander of the Alaskan national guard that's the kind of man I want as commander in chief. Profiles of courage are hard to find. When we nominate john McCain next week we are putting one on the ballot.

88 years almost to the day since women were given the right to vote. I think today of two other women. Honor Geraldine and hillary Clinton showed such grace. It was rightly noted that hillary left 18 million cracks. Women are not done. We can shadder that ceiling after all. So for my part the mission is clear. I will go to every part of this country. If you want change if you have hope, come join our cause. And help our country to elect a great man. God bless America.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Clinton Campaign Spending: Big, and Different // NYT // Derek Willis – July 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's initial primary campaign spending total, $18.7 million, is a lot of money. And she is using it very differently from her rivals.

While others spend their money to raise more money, she has built a campaign organization with an eye toward the general election. Her campaign's "burn rate," the amount spent divided by what is raised, was just a little less than 40 percent through June 30. That's only a bit higher than the campaigns of Barack Obama and Mitt Romney at the same point four years ago, and very close to the 38 percent burn rate of Mr. Obama's campaign in the first half of 2007. But comparing Mrs. Clinton's spending with those of her rivals is complicated, because she is running a different campaign so far.

Most of the presidential candidates have emphasized spending money to raise more money, whether online or through direct mail, over other kinds of spending. Ted Cruz, a Republican, reported spending $835,798 on postage and an additional $678,730 on fund-raising phone calls. Ben Carson, another Republican hopeful, spent $1.47 million on his digital efforts and $788,114 on printing and postage. Still, Mrs. Clinton isn't ignoring fund-raising; she spent more than $2.5 million on "direct marketing" and additional amounts on events and catering.

She has spent millions of dollars on staff, advertising and polling, establishing a much broader campaign at this point than any other 2016 presidential candidate. Much of the money has gone toward mounting an effective operation in the early primary and caucus states, and for building the foundation for a broad general election campaign should she become the Democratic nominee. Her $3.7 million in staff salary expenses (not including payroll taxes and service fees) is more than 10 times the amount of Mr. Cruz, who has the next-largest campaign in terms of staff payments.

The 20 percent Mrs. Clinton spent on staff dwarfs that of all but the campaigns of the Republican Mike Huckabee (21 percent) and the Democrat Martin O'Malley (20 percent). Mrs. Clinton's campaign employed 343 people, according to Federal Election Commission data. The address of nearly all campaign workers listed in F.E.C. records is the New York campaign headquarters, which is a tactic that Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican nominee, used. That makes it harder to tell exactly how much of a footprint the campaign has in say, Iowa, where it has paid $64,369 in rent.

As of June 30, the Clinton campaign paid at least 58 field organizers, had spent more than $1 million on online advertising and paid a total of $370,000 to state parties in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina for voter data.

Jeb Bush, who spent just more than $3 million, devoted much of it to travel and other expenses related to "testing the waters" for his candidacy. He did spend $372,647 on IT equipment and consulting services.

The campaign of Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator who is also seeking the Democratic nomination, put its largest investment into digital advertising and consulting, spending $1.3 million. Its payroll expenses were just $61,045, although Mr. Sanders's campaign has not been operating as long as Mrs. Clinton's. Overall, the Sanders campaign spent 20 percent of the money it raised through June 30.

In Iowa, the first faceoff between Clinton, Sanders and other rivals // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa — The full field of candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination assembled for the first time here Friday night, with a trio of them giving fiery speeches sounding populist economic themes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Much of the focus was on Hillary Rodham Clinton, the dominant front-runner for the Democratic nomination, and two underdog candidates challenging her from the left, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley.

One by one, they vowed to fight income inequality, take on the big banks and institute a progressive agenda on a range of issues including the minimum wage, climate change and gay rights. They were joined onstage by two other candidates, with all five getting equal billing to give back-to-back speeches before about 1,200 Democratic activists at a dinner hosted by the state party.

In a tough, partisan speech, Clinton looked past her primary opponents to go after the leading Republican candidates and brought Democrats to their feet.

"I'm never going to let the Republicans rip away the progress we have made," she vowed. "Trickle-down economics has to be one of the worst ideas of the 1980s. It is right up there with New Coke, shoulder pads and big hair. I lived through it — there are photographs — and we're not going back."

Friday night's Iowa Democratic Party Hall of Fame celebration dinner, which drew about 1,200 party activists, amounted to the first faceoff between Clinton — who leads in fundraising, polling and establishment backing — and Sanders, the self-described independent socialist who has drawn thousands of people to his rallies by leading the fight against big banks and rich corporations.

Polling shows Clinton and Sanders as the two leading candidates, but O'Malley made a case for his own stock to rise here with a commanding and well-received speech that focused on his record of executive achievements in Maryland. He also laid out an ambitious platform of progressive ideas that drew sustained applause across the ballroom.

"We didn't just talk about it," O'Malley said of same-sex marriage, a state Dream Act for immigrants, a minimum-wage increase and expanded family leave. "We got it done."

Each of the candidates is trying to seize the role of the party's standard bearer in the post-Obama era, and Friday night's Iowa Democratic Party dinner was one of the first opportunities for activists to compare the rivals.

When all five candidates walked onto the stage, some people in the crowd chanted "Bernie! Bernie!" When Clinton took the lectern to give her speech, her supporters chanted, "Hill-a-ry! Hill-a-ry!" And O'Malley had a loud and enthusiastic cheering squad as well.

In her remarks, Clinton ticked through a string of recent Democratic victories, including the Supreme Court's rulings to legalize same-sex marriage nationwide and to uphold President Obama's signature Affordable Care Act.

She took aim at Republicans, attacking by name three leading GOP candidates: former Florida governor Jeb Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and businessman Donald Trump.

"We've heard a lot recently from the new Republican front-runner, Donald Trump — finally a candidate whose hair gets more attention than mine," Clinton said, drawing laughter from the crowd. "But there's nothing funny about the hate he is spewing about immigrants and their families. It really is shameful."

She said some critics ask why she talks about such issues as paid sick days, the minimum wage and child care. "There she goes again with the women's issues," Clinton said, mocking her critics.

"Well, I'm not going to stop," Clinton said. "So get ready for a long campaign."

Sanders delivered an impassioned call for a "political revolution" that he said would shake up "the billionaire class."

"Enough is enough," Sanders thundered. "The greed of the billionaire class has got to end — and we are going to end it for them."

Repeating a theme that has resonated with liberal activists across the country, Sanders said, "The issue of wealth and income inequality is the great moral issue of the time, the great economic issue of our time, the great political issue of our time."

At that, one man in crowd yelled out, "Preach!"

Sanders notably included in his speech more messages aimed at blacks, Latinos and other minority groups that make up the Democratic coalition than he has had in the early months of his campaign. He drew applause, for instance, when he said he envisioned an America in which young black men can walk in the streets without fear of being shot.

Former Virginia senator Jim Webb and former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee also spoke at the dinner.

Chafee highlighted his executive experience, as a former mayor and governor, as well as legislative experience in the Senate.

“I have tried to earn a reputation for courage and honesty,” Chafee said. “I also have shown strong convictions, sometimes under enormous political pressure.”

Webb, who spoke last and joked that he was “here to turn the lights out,” highlighted his work on criminal justice, his extensive military experience and his foreign-policy vision.

Had he been president at the time, Webb said, he would not have invaded Iraq. But Webb also said he had “grave concern” about the nuclear agreement that the United States and five other nations reached with Iran this week.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Job at Hillary Clinton’s ‘Super PAC’ Didn’t Assure a Campaign Post // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 17, 2015

In Hillary Rodham Clinton’s thick campaign finance report for the first three months of her 2016 race, more than 300 people were paid for work on her second national run.

Fewer than 15 of them appear to have come from the ranks of Ready for Hillary, the “super PAC” that tried to harness early energy behind Mrs. Clinton and develop a list of supporters in the two years before she became a candidate and which dominated much of the early chatter after she left the State Department.

The group has been a source of mixed emotions with Mrs. Clinton’s circle of advisers. Several people close to Mrs. Clinton were chagrined when the group came into existence, believing that, among other concerns, it would only make people view her through a political lens well before she was ready to announce a decision about a 2016 bid.

But others, including people like the long-serving Clinton adviser Minyon Moore, saw value in the group’s work, and Mrs. Clinton came to embrace it. The group’s supporter list was acquired by the campaign six weeks after Mrs. Clinton announced her candidacy.

In the spring, the campaign brought on Adam Parkhomenko, the Ready for Hillary co-founder and a former aide from Mrs. Clinton’s Senate office, to work on a grass-roots job. Another handful of people were hired at that time as well.

At the time, a campaign aide made clear that some people from the political action committee would be interviewed, but not all could expect jobs. Still, several people involved with the super PAC, which wound down its work once her campaign began, had hoped to work on the race in some capacity. At the time, the expectation among Ready for Hillary supporters was that most of them would play a role.

The number of Ready for Hillary staff members who tried to get jobs and didn’t is unclear.

Among those who interviewed early for a job was Seth Bringman, who handled day-to-day press for Ready for Hillary. After waiting for many weeks to hear back, Mr. Bringman ultimately moved back to Ohio, where he had worked before, and is now a public relations consultant there. Mr. Bringman declined to comment but confirmed he had moved.

Mrs. Clinton's aides declined to comment.

Also absent from the filings is Craig Smith, a former political director from Bill Clinton's White House who joined Ready for Hillary as a senior adviser in the first half of 2013, and who was seen as lending a more senior voice to the group early. Mr. Smith declined comment, but is said to be in discussions with the campaign about a role of some kind.

Another senior adviser to Ready for Hillary, Tracy Sefl, has been a surrogate for the campaign and currently lives in Chicago, advising other clients.

The group played a role in lining up support from elected officials behind Mrs. Clinton, including in Iowa, where she received two endorsements on Friday.

Jerry Crawford, an Iowa operative who worked with Ready for Hillary and has informally helped the current campaign, said the group was "phenomenal."

"If there are people who worked for Ready for Hillary who can help her become president, they'll be hired," Mr. Crawford said.

David Brock, Key Hillary Clinton Ally, to Work More Closely With Her Campaign // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 17, 2015

In the world of outside supporters to Hillary Rodham Clinton, no one has a more visible, and singular, role than David Brock, her former critic-turned-guardian.

Mr. Brock created the opposition research-focused "super PAC" American Bridge, the liberal watchdog group Media Matters, and the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record, which is now coordinating with Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign. He is also on the board of Priorities USA, the super PAC that hopes to raise large sums of money in support of Mrs. Clinton.

The question of how Mr. Brock would carry out roles with groups that have different legal definitions has come into clearer focus this week, as he is moving to the so-called coordinated side, working with Correct the Record alongside Mrs. Clinton's campaign.

Mr. Brock confirmed the move, saying that the legal restrictions on his activities if he had remained on the so-called independent expenditure side of the groups were "impractical." Such groups are forbidden from coordinating their work with the campaign.

He declined to get into specifics as to why, but people who have spoken with him say he was focused on paying attention to the activities of Correct the Record and Media Matters, which will play the biggest role in defending Mrs. Clinton throughout the campaign. Media Matters and another outlet that Mr. Brock is involved with, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, are nonpolitical 501c3 groups, which don't make independent expenditures.

What he will be missing out on is directing the opposition research functions at American Bridge, which will be training its army of staff members on mining the speeches and activities of the Republican candidates. Correct the Record can have access to the research that American Bridge produces, but Mr. Brock can't lead that group's efforts.

Still, had he remained on the independent expenditure side of the aisle, he would have been prohibited from working with any federal campaign or party committee.

As for Priorities USA, which Mr. Brock left and then returned to amid a shakeup in leadership, he will be able to serve on the board but has to be walled off from being involved in programmatic decisions by the group. His role is now basically limited to fund-raising.

Mr. Brock, who was a critic of Mrs. Clinton in the 1990s, has become one of her favorite defenders in the last 10 years. She is said to put a premium on loyalty, but his abilities as a fund-raiser have also become a valued asset.

Top Hillary Clinton Fundraisers Also Big Donors to Foundation // WaPo // Rebecca Ballhaus – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton has turned to a familiar source to find supporters willing to raise more than $100,000 each for her presidential campaign: major donors to the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation.

Twenty of the campaign's so-called Hillblazers, or supporters who promise to raise $100,000 each for her campaign, have also given a total of at least $54 million to her family's charitable foundation, according to a Wall Street Journal review of disclosures by the campaign and the foundation.

Media billionaires Haim Saban and Fred Eychaner, venture-capitalist Jay Robert Pritzkerand Esprit founder Susie Tompkins Buell were among the list of more than 150 "bundlers" Mrs. Clinton identified on Wednesday as having raised more than $100,000 in contributions for her primary election since she launched her campaign in April. They are also among some of the largest donors to her family's foundation, illustrating the overlap between Mrs. Clinton's charitable and political interests.

Among these 20 bundlers examined by the Journal, Mr. Eychaner has given more than $25 million to the Clinton Foundation, according to its disclosures. Mr. Saban's family foundation has given between $10 million and $25 million, and foundations linked to Mr. Pritzker and Ms. Buell have each given between $5 million and $10 million. All of these 20 bundlers who were also large donors to the Clinton Foundation donated some portion of their funds in 2014.

"It shouldn't come as a surprise that people who care about making the world a better place and support philanthropic work, including the Clinton Foundation's programs, also think Hillary Clinton would be a great President," said Josh Schwerin, a spokesman for her campaign. An official with the foundation also noted that it has more than 300,000 donors.

At least two dozen other Hillblazer bundlers also gave to the Clinton Foundation, but the Journal analysis focused on these 20 large donors.

Mrs. Clinton has faced criticism in recent months from Republicans and from members of her own party who have suggested that the foundation offered wealthy donors an avenue to curry favor with a former secretary of state and a possible future president. Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, created the foundation after leaving the White House, and in 2013, when Mrs. Clinton left the State Department, she added her name to the organization.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus called the foundation's fundraising "shady" in a recent statement and said Americans think Mrs. Clinton is "untrustworthy and dishonest."

Mrs. Clinton has said she is proud of the charitable work the foundation does, and the Clintons have said their political activities are separate from the foundation's work. "Nobody even suggested it or talked about it or thought about it until the political season began and somebody said, well, what about this?" Mr. Clinton said in a recent CNN interview, referring to suggestions that donors received special favor from Mrs. Clinton at the State Department.

Among the parties who are major bundlers and large donors to Clinton Foundation, the Wasserman Foundation, run by Clinton bundler Casey Wasserman, gave between $5 million and $10 million to the Clinton Foundation. Elizabeth Bagley, an attorney and former ambassador, has given between $1 million and $5 million. Nassau County, N.Y., Democratic Chairman Jay Jacobs, another bundler, gave between $500,000 and $1 million to the foundation, as did Gerald and Elaine Schuster, a longtime Democratic donor and philanthropist.

David Axelrod: Hillary Clinton and Democrats can win the Iran debate // WaPo // Greg Sargent – July 17, 2015

Ever since the Iran deal was announced, it has been widely presumed — by Republicans, and some neutral observers — that the battle over it in Congress will inevitably be a political winner for the GOP. The Iran debate just seems risky for Democrats — it involves negotiating with the enemy! — and Beltway punditry often assumes that debates over national security always favor Republicans, because, well, partly because Republicans are very good at saying so.

But in an interview with me, David Axelrod — the chief strategist of Barack Obama's two successful presidential campaigns — made the opposite case. He said the Iran debate actually could favor Hillary Clinton and Democrats, and put the GOP presidential nominee in a politically untenable spot. That is, if Democrats prosecute it correctly.

"Broadly, I don't think it's at all clear that Americans are opposed to this," Axelrod said. "Americans recognize that a verifiable agreement is a better option than war."

"The key question here is, If you walk away from this, then what?" Axelrod continued. "It's the responsibility of every single politician, Republican and Democrat, to answer the what's-the-alternative question. And 'let's go to tougher sanctions' is not a real answer."

As many Democrats remain undecided about the substance of the deal, some also appear skittish about the politics of backing it. One exception has been Clinton, who spoke positively about the deal after it was announced. In so doing, she may have offered a template for how Dems should talk about it, hailing it as an "important first step" while stressing that "the agreement will have to be enforced vigorously, relentlessly," an apparent nod to worries that Iran might try to cheat.

Nobody knows how the debate over the deal will play throughout the hot month of August, and both sides are gearing up to spend huge sums to pressure lawmakers back at home. It will also come up repeatedly for the presidential candidates. Asked whether it was reasonable for some Dems to be skittish about the politics of the deal, Axelrod said he thought Dem lawmakers were mostly worried about offending donors, not voters. And he suggested — perhaps counterintuitively — that its very riskiness could play Clinton's favor.

"For her it's very advantageous to stand by this agreement," Axelrod said. "There is a perception of risk associated with that position. Her standing strong for it will strengthen her with the Democratic base. And I think it will strengthen her generally, because the picture of her taking on an issue that may have some risk, and standing by her principles on it, will help dispel some of the attacks on her."

In the 2012 presidential race, Mitt Romney seemed to appreciate the public's war-weariness, sometimes downplaying GOP hawkishness. But since then, the international outlook has changed, and Republicans won in 2014 partly by attacking Dems as weak on ISIS and Russia, which suggests perhaps they could win the argument over foreign policy in 2016, too.

Axelrod acknowledged the changed environment, but still said Americans would ultimately support diplomacy with Iran.

"In 2012 you didn't have ISIS, Russia was more cooperative, it was a different environment," Axelrod said. "But I still don't think this means people are eager for military engagement with Iran. I think that the logic of a tough, verifiable agreement, as opposed to military action, is going to be the majority opinion in this country."

Axelrod added that the Iran debate could end up hurting the eventual GOP nominee, who will be required by the base to promise to undo the deal during the primary — and then struggle to explain that position in the general.

"Iran is like the health care debate for Republicans," Axelrod continued. "They're filled with rage but not with ideas. There hasn't been anyone who has articulated a generally viable alternative. They can get away with thundering outrage in the primary, but when you get to the general, you're going to get scrutinized more closely."

"The Republican nominee is going to be faced with, 'okay, what are you going to do?'" Axelrod also said. "There is no surgical way to take out the Iran nuclear program. You're talking about a major military commitment. So I think it becomes a risky proposition for the Republican nominee."

But it's not inevitable that the American mainstream will see the situation as nothing more than a choice between the Iran deal and war. Couldn't Republicans muddy those waters and create the impression that there's a third way?

"That is the challenge for Democrats — to expose the fact that there is no third way," Axelrod said. "If Republicans muddy the waters, that's a dereliction on the part of Democrats. There is no third way. The emptiness of that argument needs to be exposed repeatedly and aggressively."

Clinton reserves nearly $8 million in TV time for fall advertising blitz // WaPo // Dan Balz – July 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton, in a move that suggests she is taking little for granted in the early states of Iowa and New Hampshire, has reserved nearly $8 million in television time for a fall advertising blitz, a campaign official confirmed Friday.

The advertising could begin as early as the first week of November.

Once on the air in those states, Clinton is prepared to stay on almost continually through the first votes of the 2016 primary-caucus season.

Iowa's caucuses are scheduled for Feb. 1, 2016, and the New Hampshire primary is likely to be held eight days later, on Feb 9.

Politico first reported the news of the ad buy.

Despite a hefty lead in national polls, Clinton has seen her margins in Iowa and New Hampshire beginning to shrink somewhat, with Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) rising. The advertising buy sends a signal that Clinton will be prepared to wage a costly campaign to fend off her rivals.

The campaign has reserved about $3.6 million in television time across eight Iowa media markets. The remainder of the $7.7 million expenditure is devoted to a statewide buy in New Hampshire. Most of the money aimed at

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Granite State voters will be spent in markets that blanket the southern part of the state, where the population is concentrated.

The ad buy is the latest major expenditure of the Clinton campaign, which raised more than $45 million in the second quarter of the year.

The June 30 financial report filed by the campaign revealed that she also had spent $19 million in that period.

Television advertising time, especially in New Hampshire, can be costly, and ad rates rise as the primary nears. With 16 or 17 Republican candidates, five Democratic candidates and an abundance of super PACs, the airwaves will become extremely crowded later this year and in January and early February.

Iowa and New Hampshire are potential stumbling blocks even for a candidate who starts with the financial and political advantages of Clinton. Eight years ago, her third-place finish in the Iowa caucuses launched then-senator Barack Obama toward his eventual victory in the Democratic nomination contest.

Though Clinton won a comeback victory in New Hampshire, she was not able to prevail despite the advantages with which she started that campaign. This time, she enjoys even more advantages. But campaign officials have said from the beginning that they expect a competitive contest again, and they are prepared to spend more on TV ads in those states, if they are deemed necessary.

In Clinton's shadow, Democrats meet for first 2016 face-off // AP // Lisa Lerer – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Democratic presidential candidates are descending on Iowa for the first face-off of their 2016 primary, a contest that remains dominated by the outsized political influence of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

All five Democratic primary candidates are on the program for a dinnertime fundraiser sponsored by the state party in Cedar Rapids, creating an opportunity for her challengers to confront Clinton before more than 1,200 influential party activists in the crucial caucus state.

Three months into what seems like an all-but-inexorable march to the nomination, Clinton has already built a vast campaign infrastructure, establishing a multistory headquarters in Brooklyn, New York, and placing hundreds of staffers across the country.

But her first joint event with her primary rivals comes amid signs that she has yet to win over her party's most passionate supporters, the activists and small-dollar donors that will form the base of her support in the general election.

At a town hall meeting in New Hampshire on Thursday, liberal environmental protestors broke out into chants after Clinton refused to promise an immediate halt to all fossil-fuel development.

"I totally respect the passion and the urgency," she said, attempting to calm the crowd. "I understand it."

An Associated Press-GfK poll released this week found her standing falling among Democrats, with about 70 percent of Democrats giving Clinton positive marks, an 11-point drop from an April survey. Nearly a quarter of Democrats now say they see Clinton in an unfavorable light.

"I don't like seeing that, obviously," Clinton said of the poll, speaking to reporters on Thursday. "But I think people know that I will fight for them. I'll fight for their jobs, I'll fight for their families, I'll fight on behalf of better education and health care."

She added: "I'm very pleased with the support I have."

Just 17 percent of the $47 million that Clinton raised since announcing her campaign came from contributions of $200 or less. In comparison, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has fueled his insurgent challenge to Clinton with small donations, pulling in three-quarters of his more than $15.2 million haul from smaller amounts.

In recent weeks, Sanders has packed arenas with voters eager to hear the message of the self-described socialist, who's become Clinton's chief rival. So far, he's refused to directly criticize Clinton, though he's questioned her positions on issues like trade, Wall Street regulations and the Keystone XL pipeline.

"I like her. I respect her," Sanders said on Tuesday, after joining his fellow Senate Democrats at a luncheon with Clinton on Capitol Hill. "It is not necessary for people to dislike each other or attack each other just because they're running for office."

Besides Sanders and Clinton, the forum includes former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee. Each candidate will deliver 15 minutes of remarks.

Clinton Focuses on GOP at First Primary Face-off of 2016 // AP // Lisa Lerer – July 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton avoided any mention of her primary opponents in the first Democratic face-off of the 2016 presidential campaign, opting instead to focus her fire on an expanding field of would-be Republican contenders.

All five Democratic primary candidates were on the program for the Friday fundraiser for the Iowa state party, creating an opportunity for Clinton to confront her challengers before more than 1,300 influential party activists in the crucial caucus state.

Instead, she explained her White House bid as a "deeply personal" quest, vowing she would never let Republicans "rip away the progress" made during the Obama administration. In a fiery address, she slammed the economic policy of former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, joked that Donald Trump is "finally a candidate whose hair gets more attention than mine," and attacked Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker for targeting union power.

"Trickle-down economics has to be one of the worst ideas of the 1980s," Clinton said, evoking Republican policy from the Reagan era. "It is right up there with New Coke, shoulder pads and big hair. ... We are not going back to that."

The dinnertime event came as the Democratic primary fight — long assumed to be little more than a coronation of Clinton — appeared to be heating up into a slightly more serious contest.

In recent weeks, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders has risen in the polls and packed arenas with voters eager to hear the message of the self-described socialist who's become Clinton's chief rival. So far, he's refused to criticize Clinton directly, though he edged closer to an attack Friday, questioning whether she would back the kind of tough regulation on Wall Street that's becoming a rallying call for liberals.

"You'll have to ask Hillary Clinton her views on whether we should break up these large financial institutions," he said, during an afternoon appearance in Cedar Rapids. "I do."

The Clinton campaign has signaled that it considers Sanders to be a legitimate challenger who will be running for the long haul, noting the $15.2 million he's raised, largely from small donors, in the first three months of the race. They believe he will find a measure of support in Iowa, where the caucus system typically turns out the most passionate voters, and New Hampshire, given Sanders' many years representing neighboring Vermont in Congress.

On Friday, Clinton's campaign said it bought $7.7 million worth of television advertising time in early voting states, its first ad buy for the 2016 contest. In Iowa, the campaign paid $3.6 million for time in all eight media markets that serve the state. An additional $4.1 million of airtime was purchased in New Hampshire, which holds the first primary.

But so far the Clinton team has resisted any direct engagement with Sanders, fearing such an exchange might alienate the activists and small-dollar donors who will form the base of support in the general election if Clinton should win the nomination.

"You can see that Democrats are united, we are energized, and we are ready to win this election," Clinton said, opening her remarks before a cheering audience.

Besides Sanders and Clinton, the forum featured former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee.

Clinton wasn't the only candidate who shied away from attacks on fellow members of the Democratic party.

Even Chafee, who opened his quixotic self-fueled bid for the White House with attacks on Clinton's support for the war in Iraq, now opted against targeting the frontrunner.

"We have a choice in 2016, prosperity through peace or endless war," he said. "We need to reject once and for all the belligerent advocates of conflict."

Unlike her rivals, Clinton has already built a vast campaign infrastructure, run from a multistory headquarters in New York City, with hundreds of staffers across the country.

Sanders said he has "no illusions" about her political clout.

"We are going to be outspent in this campaign, but I think people all over this country are responding to a very simple message and that is that it is not acceptable that the middle class is continuing to disappear," he said.

Clinton campaign touts endorsements ahead of Iowa cattle call // Politico // Nick Gass – July 17, 2015

Two top Iowa officials announced their support for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton ahead of the first major cattle call of the Democratic primary in the state.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and state Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald endorsed Clinton, according to a press release from the campaign, as Clinton goes before heavy establishment crowds in the Hawkeye State on Friday. The endorsements also come amid signs of surprising strength for Bernie Sanders, the independent Vermont senator, in both Iowa and New Hampshire.

“Hillary Clinton will build an economy for tomorrow that raises incomes for working Americans, ensures that students don’t graduate with crushing debts and provides affordable childcare options for working families. She’ll strengthen our families by fighting for commonsense policies like comprehensive immigration reform, equal pay for women and criminal justice reform,” said Miller said in a statement.

In his endorsement, Fitzgerald praised Clinton for her “commitment to growing our economy so that everyday Iowans can get ahead and stay ahead is what Iowa Democrats believe to our core.”

“I’m proud to support Hillary Clinton and look forward to working with her to organize and win in Iowa and next November,” he said.

Clinton will meet with Iowa campaign organizers in Cedar Rapids later Friday before attending a kickoff party and the state Democratic Party’s Hall of Fame Dinner.

Hillary Clinton bundlers get inside look at campaign workings // Politico // Annie Karni – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s bundlers — individuals who raised at least $100,000 in primary dollars since April — were treated to four hours of face time with top campaign officials Thursday in Brooklyn, sources told POLITICO.

The meeting, at the Marriott hotel in downtown Brooklyn, marked the first meeting for bundlers, known as “Hillblazers,” and was designed to give them a sense of the state of the race, as well as a peek at the inner workings of the campaign. About 70 people attended, a source said.

Speakers at the meeting included vice chairman Huma Abedin, campaign chairman John Podesta, and campaign manager Robby Mook, who all participated in a “wrap-up” panel discussing the state of play. Communications director Jennifer Palmieri also spoke, along with top policy gurus Jake Sullivan and Maya Harris, and national political director Amanda Renteria, among others.

The first campaign filings released Wednesday evening showed Clinton struggled to attract small donors. Less than 20 percent of the $47.5 million Clinton raised between April and July was from individuals contributing $200 or less. A source said engaging small donors was part of a bigger conversation at Thursday’s meeting about grassroots engagement, including how to reach out to millennial voters.

The Clinton camp released the names Wednesday night of over 100 bundlers who together make up the campaign’s finance committee, which included longtime Clinton donors, Obama allies, and some elected officials

Included in the roster are former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh; Rep. Joaquin Castro; Rep. Grace Meng; Rep. Jim Hime; longtime supporter and Clinton Foundation donor Lynn Forester de Rothschild; Sean Eldridge and New Republic owner Chris Hughes; media mogul Fred Eychaner; billionaire venture capitalist J. B. Pritzker; Morgan Stanley executive Tom Nides, who served as part of Clinton’s brain trust at the State Department; megadonor and Univision owner Haim Saban; Steve Rattner; and Democratic National Committee member Robert Zimmerman, among others.

A Clinton campaign spokesman declined to comment about the meeting.

Clinton campaign mocks press coverage // Politico // Nick Gass – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s campaign is deploying a new weapon in its running battle with the press: withering sarcasm.

“If you believe the mood and headlines from some of the press, it’s been a pretty rough week for Hillary Clinton,” wrote campaign communications director Jennifer Palmieri in a Medium post published Friday. “While there was widespread and substantive coverage of the rollout of her economic agenda, politically, it's a different story,"

Clinton has so much trouble, a decidedly tongue-in-cheek Palmieri wrote, that one poll showed that "she only had a higher favorability number than any other candidate it tested." In fact, she added, Clinton is polling a "disastrous" 68 percent in approval among Hispanic voters (according to a Univision poll out Thursday), and "only leads her closest competition," Jeb Bush, by a mere 37 points in that survey.

The post also touted Clinton's record fundraising and cash on hand.

"It's true," Palmieri wrote. "Hillary is left in the terrible position of having the most resources of any candidate and being voters' top choice to be the next President of the United States."

Exclusive: Hillary's first ad buy // Politico // Glenn Thrush – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton is reserving time for her first major ad buys of the 2016 campaign — shelling out $7.7 million of TV spots in Iowa and New Hampshire for the fall, a campaign official told POLITICO.

The ad buys would allow Clinton to go on the air as early as the first week in November and stretches through Election Day in each state — Feb. 1 for the Iowa caucuses, Feb. 9 for the New Hampshire primary.

It's possible Clinton could buy additional time in either state sooner, the official emphasized, but she wanted to lock down the dates before the corroded GOP field and related super PACs drove up advertising rates.

"It's smart to do now," the official said.

In Iowa, the campaign is cutting checks worth $3.6 million to reserve space in eight media markets statewide; In New Hampshire, they are buying several slots with a high percentage of the cash going to the expensive Manchester/Boston market in the southern part of the state, and neighboring Burlington, Vt.

Clinton raised $45 million for the Democratic primary as of June 30, and the Brooklyn-based campaign burnt through $18.7 million during its first quarter, much of the cash going to polling, salaries and ramping up operations in early primary states.

The Next Phase of Hillary Clinton's Presidential Campaign Has Begun // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 17, 2015

The relaunch of Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign wasn't on Roosevelt Island in June, or when she sat down for her first nationally televised interview last week.

It happened on Thursday in New Hampshire, in the auditorium of a municipal building and the backyard of an old house, as she threw what others might call caution—and her advisers have insisted was intentional planning—to the wind.

After months of limited questioning from screened panelists or a handful of reporters on a pre-written list, she just started calling on people.

She called on 36 people in all over the course of the day, including nine members of the media.

In a steamy, cavernous room at the Dover Municipal Building, she spent close to 70 minutes answering questions. Though she began with a short version of her stump speech and tacked on a proposal to offer tax credits to companies that share profits with their employees that her campaign announced Thursday, she let the conversation go where the voters in the room wanted it to go, which didn't include profit sharing.

Instead, she fielded questions on the Iran deal, climate change, student debt, the criminal justice system and federally funded space exploration. It might be a typical range for Bernie Sanders or Jeb Bush or Marco Rubio but for Clinton, who spent the beginning of her campaign staying self-consciously on message, it was something new and marked the dawn of a new more open phase of her 2016 White House bid.

Asked about banning the extraction of fossil fuels from public lands by a young woman who demanded a yes-or-no answer, Clinton struck her own course."The answer is no until we get alternatives into place," she said, acknowledging that her response might not satisfy the questioner but was the only realistic way for her to respond.

Later, Clinton called on another young woman, who posed the same question. "I'm going to be honest, I was disappointed by the answer that you gave before about climate change," the woman said, adding that she wondered if Clinton's unwillingness to act was influenced by her campaign donors from the fossil fuel industry. "No. No it is not," Clinton said, offering up a similar response to her first one until the woman, a few dozen yards away from Clinton, shouted "act on climate" and a handful of others, including the first woman, joined in. Two men unfurled a banner reading “ban extraction on public lands.”

“You know what, I have said in this campaign I am going to tell you what I believe. Some people may like it and some people may not like it,” Clinton said. “I totally respect the passion and urgency,” she added, and “I would urge you to run for office and have your voices heard.”

Others had more personal—and unexpected—concerns.

One woman launched into an extended plea for help stopping the flood of telemarketer calls to her without changing her number and Clinton took it in stride.

“I have to tell you that’s the first time I’ve been asked that. And I don’t know the answer but I will try to find out if there is an answer,” she said, before promising that a campaign staffer would reach out to the woman and try to help.

Aides say this is where they had planned to be at this point in the campaign, past the initial listening-heavy phase of the campaign and onto the next step, sharing her views while still engaged in a back-and-forth with voters.

Still, there was a clear shift even from early last week, when Clinton took questions from several audience members at the Iowa City Public Library. In all, she took 16 questions at the Dover event, the first that her campaign’s billed as a town hall.

Later, after working her way through the crowd and posing for a long line of photos, Clinton spoke to the press. Traveling press secretary Nick Merrill was the traffic cop, calling on reporters as some tried to shout over others, but unlike at other recent press availabilities, he wasn’t calling on people based on a pre-written list of names. cut off the back-and-forth while some reporters were still clamoring for their own shot at her. But Merrill and Clinton did cut off the back-and-forth while some reporters were still clamoring for their own shot at her.

Just before sunset, an organizing house party held in the buggy backyard of an old home in Windham, Clinton spent more than half an hour calling on people in the crowd, touching on many of the same issues as she had earlier in the day.

After finishing her response to the tenth questioner and with it clear that she was running out of time, she struggled for a moment before passing along the responsibility of calling on the final questioner to someone else, her Midwestern-polite roots showing through.

Earlier in the day, though, she’d shown that she could be more casual.

“How do I address you? As ambassador or secretary or just Hillary?" one man asked her in Dover.

"Hillary is fine with me,” she said.

Hedge Fund Titans Choosing Hillary Clinton Over Top Republicans // Bloomberg // Saijel Kishan and Rebecca Spalding – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton received donations from some of the biggest names in the hedge fund industry, including Paul Tudor Jones, even as the presidential candidate wants to boost their tax rate.

Jones, the billionaire founder of Tudor Investment Corp., Jamie Dinan, who started York Capital, and Neil Chriss, who runs Hutchin Hill Capital, each contributed the maximum $2,700 to Clinton’s bid for the White House, according to Federal Election Commission filings for the second quarter.

Clinton, who’s made closing the wealth gap the centerpiece of her campaign, lured more donations from boldface industry names than Republican candidates 16 months before the election. Hedge fund managers, their employees and family members donated at least $54,000 to Clinton, a Democrat, according to the FEC. Republicans Jeb Bush got at least $27,000, Marco Rubio took in at least $10,800 while Carly Fiorina received at least $4,200.

“Something is wrong when CEOs earn more than 300 times than what the typical American worker earns and when hedge fund managers pay a lower tax rate than truck drivers or nurses,” Clinton said in May.

The candidate’s populist rhetoric didn’t dissuade many managers from supporting her. They include Frank Brosens, co-founder of Taconic Capital Advisors, Mitchell Julis, co-founder Canyon Partners, David Shaw, the billionaire founder of D.E. Shaw & Co., BlueMountain Capital Management Managing Partner James Staley, Jake Gottlieb, who runs Visum Asset Management, and Richard Perry, who heads Perry Capital.

Bush, Rubio and Fiorina drew a smaller cohort of top hedge fund managers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush drew support from Dan Loeb, the billionaire founder of Third Point, Scott Kapnick, who runs Highbridge Capital Management, and Robert Pohly, founder of Samlyn Capital. Hudson Bay's Sander Gerber and Bracebridge Young, chief executive officer of Mariner Investment Group, also donated to the candidate.

Rubio got contributions from Paul Singer, the billionaire investor who runs Elliott Management, and Greg Jensen, co-CEO of Bridgewater Associates. Fiorina won the backing of billionaire John Paulson of Paulson & Co.

Julis of Canyon Capital donated to both Clinton and Fiorina, while Omega Advisors' Steve Einhorn gave money to Bush, Rubio and Fiorina.

Jonathan Soros, the son of billionaire George Soros who runs his own firm, JS Capital, also gave money to Clinton.

Hillary Clinton's Biggest Campaign Bundlers Are Fossil Fuel Lobbyists // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal and Kate Sheppard – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Nearly all of the lobbyists bundling contributions for Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton's campaign have at one time or another worked for the fossil fuel industry.

A list of 40 registered lobbyists that the Clinton camp disclosed to the Federal Election Commission on Wednesday revealed a number of Democratic Party lobbyists who have worked against regulations to curb climate change, advocated for offshore drilling, or sought government approval for natural gas exports.

Clinton, the former secretary of state, has called climate change the most "consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and a world" and says it would be a major focus of her administration if she wins the White House. But having so many supporters who have sold their services to fossil fuel companies may complicate her emphasis on pro-environment policies.

Scott Parven and Brian Pomper, lobbyists at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, have been registered to lobby for the Southern California-based oil giant Chevron since 2006, with contracts totaling more than $3 million. The two bundled Clinton contributions of $24,700 and $29,700, respectively. They have helped Chevron over the years resist efforts to eliminate oil and gas tax breaks and to impose regulations to reduce carbon emissions.

The two Clinton bundlers also were part of a much-criticized campaign by Chevron to manipulate Congress into inserting language into the Andean Trade Preferences Act that would require Ecuador to dismiss a longstanding lawsuit against the company for polluting the Amazon jungle. Democratic lawmakers pushed back against the campaign and the lawsuit is continuing.

One prominent lobbying topic embraced by Clinton bundlers is the expansion of liquefied natural gas exports and federal approval of new LNG terminals.

Ankit Desai, vice president for government relations at top LNG exporter Cheniere Energy, bundled $82,000 to the Clinton camp, with much of it coming from Cheniere Energy executives. Cheniere executives, including Desai, have donated $38,800 to Clinton's campaign.

The company has lobbied hard in Washington and maintains close ties to the Obama administration. The company won the first approval to export gas to countries outside of U.S. free-trade agreements. The company is seeking approval to open additional terminals to export LNG, and will likely need a friend in the White House come 2017.

ML Strategies' David Leiter lobbied in 2014 on behalf of Sempra Energy when the company received approval for its LNG export facility in Hackberry, Louisiana. Leiter, who bundled $36,550 for Clinton's campaign, also is a lobbyist for ExxonMobil. Steve Coll noted in a New Yorker article derived from his book on the oil giant, Private Empire, that Leiter, an ex-staffer to former Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), was retained, along with a host of others, to increase the company's reach into the Democratic Party it had ignored for years.

ExxonMobil's top lobbyist in Washington, Theresa Fariello, may not be a bundler for Clinton's campaign, but she is a donor. Fariello, who was a Department of Energy official in President Bill Clinton's administration, gave $2,700 to Clinton's campaign. Another Washington-based Exxon lawyer, Judith Batty, donated $2,700.

Clinton also got contributions from others involved in the fossil fuel business. Her campaign received $2,700 from BP America's Mary Streett, formerly the top lobbyist for the nuclear power utility Exelon. Anadarko Petroleum lawyers Amanda McMillan and Richard Lapin each gave $2,700. Sarah Venuto and Martin Durbin, both lobbyists for America's Natural Gas Alliance, the top gas industry lobbying group, gave $2,910 and $1,000, respectively. Celia Fischer, an America's Natural Gas Alliance representative who is not a lobbyist, gave $2,700.

Aside from lobbyists currently working to advance fossil fuel interests, there is one Hillblazer bundler -- the name for Clinton boosters raising more than $100,000 -- who stands out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bundler Gordon Giffin is a former lobbyist for TransCanada, the company working to build the controversial Keystone XL pipeline. Giffin sits on the board of Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, an investor in the pipeline. The Canadian bank paid Clinton $990,000 for speeches in the months leading up to her presidential announcement. Another Canadian financial institution with an interest in Keystone XL, TD Bank, paid her $651,000 for speaking engagements.

Clinton's position on Keystone XL -- or lack thereof -- may prove the biggest challenge for her in gaining support from progressive activists. Whether to grant a permit for the leg of the pipeline that crosses the Canadian border into the U.S. is up to the State Department, which has been considering it since Clinton's time as secretary of state. In October 2010 remarks, Clinton said the department was "inclined" to sign off on the pipeline, a statement that enraged environmental groups working to stop it. On the campaign trail, Clinton has largely evaded questions about the pipeline.

But the issue has dogged Clinton. The speaking fees from Canadian banks came to light in May. In June, Clinton's campaign announced the hiring of former TransCanada lobbyist Jeff Berman as a consultant.

The issue of campaign donations from fossil fuel interests has become a topic in the Democratic Party primary, as both Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have pledged they will not accept contributions from oil, gas or coal companies. Clinton has not signed that pledge.

Fossil fuel campaign contributions came up at a town hall event Clinton hosted in New Hampshire on Thursday.

"I'm disappointed about the answer you gave to climate change," Giselle Hart, an activist with 350 Action, told Clinton. I'm wondering if your answer ... is due to contributions from the fossil fuel industry to your campaign."

Activists unfurled banners and demanded that Clinton support a ban on fossil fuel extraction on public lands. Clinton responded that she would phase out extraction over time, though not immediately. "We still have to run our economy, we still have to turn on the lights," she said.

Reached for comment, a representative for the campaign simply pointed HuffPost to Clinton's remarks at the Thursday's town hall.

Bill Clinton Is Sorry For A Lot Of Things // HuffPo // Marina Fang and Amber Ferguson – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- As president, Bill Clinton was wrong about Wall Street deregulation and various elements of his foreign policy, pushed trade policies that painfully drove up drug prices around the world, sowed chaos in Mexico through his prosecution of the drug war and exacerbated the problem of mass incarceration through an overly punitive approach to sentencing.

It may be a harsh judgment, but it's one that carries weight considering the source: former President Bill Clinton.

Unlike a lot of politicians, Clinton has shown a willingness to own up to his mistakes. Earlier this week, he offered a mea culpa around sentencing at the NAACP convention. Here's an incomplete list of policies he pursued as president that he has since acknowledged were not the best choices.

Criminal justice

Clinton's 1994 omnibus crime bill included mandatory minimum sentences, even for minor offenses such as drug crimes. It also contained a federal "three strikes" provision, which imposed life sentences for anyone convicted of a violent felony after two or more previous convictions.

Addressing the NAACP convention on Wednesday, Clinton admitted that his tough crime laws led to swelling prison populations.

"I signed a bill that made the problem worse," he said. "And I want to admit it."

In April, Clinton acknowledged in an introduction to a book of essays about criminal justice that these policies were "overly broad instead of appropriately tailored."

"Some are in prison who shouldn't be, others are in for too long, and without a plan to educate, train, and reintegrate them into our communities, we all suffer," he wrote.

He again referenced his mistake in May, telling CNN that "we had too many people in prison" and that criminal justice policies did not place enough emphasis on rehabilitating criminals and supporting them once they were out of prison.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We wound up … putting so many people in prison that there wasn't enough money left to educate them, train them for new jobs and increase the chances when they came out so they could live productive lives,” he said.

Financial deregulation

As president, Clinton turned a blind eye to big banks when he repealed FDR’s Glass-Steagall Act, which separated commercial and investment banking. This allowed big banks to merge, becoming “too big to fail.” Clinton also signed the Commodity Futures Modernization Act, which prevented derivatives from being regulated, opening the door for risky business on the part of banks. Finally, he passed policies that made it easier for banks to practice predatory lending and give risky mortgages to low-income homebuyers. All of these policies eventually wrecked havoc on the global economy in the form of the 2007-08 financial crisis.

In 2010, Clinton said his decision to exempt derivatives from regulation was shortsighted and that he should not have listened to his economic advisers, who urged him to do it.

"On derivatives, yeah, I think they were wrong, and I think I was wrong to take [their advice],” he said. "Now, I think if I had tried to regulate them, because the Republicans were the majority in the Congress, they would have stopped it. But I wish I should have been caught trying. I mean, that was a mistake I made."

The drug war

While speaking in Mexico in February, Clinton apologized for the U.S. war on drugs that led to drug smuggling, which led to corruption, crime and violence across Central America. Though it began under President Ronald Reagan, the drug war escalated as a result of the NAFTA treaty championed by Clinton. Free trade benefitted drug cartels and enabled more drug trafficking.

“I wish you had no narco-trafficking, but it’s not really your fault,” Clinton said. “Basically, we did too good of a job of taking the transportation out of the air and water, and so we ran it over land. I apologize for that.”

Marriage equality

In 1996, Clinton signed the Defense of Marriage Act, defining marriage to be between a man and a woman. Though he had reservations about the bill and understood its impact on LGBT couples, he feared that not signing it would cost him the 1996 election.

In the years since, his public stance has evolved on marriage equality. When the Supreme Court heard oral arguments in the case to overturn DOMA in 2013, Clinton admitted the law was a mistake and urged the court to rule against it.

Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell

A political compromise was the reason Clinton signed Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell, which required LGBT military members to keep their sexual orientation a secret. The House had voted for an outright ban on gays in the military, while Clinton supported completely allowing gays to serve.

When asked in 2010 if he regretted the policy, he said: “Oh yeah, but keep in mind, I didn’t choose this policy. The reason I accepted it was because I thought it was better than an absolute ban.”

Rwandan genocide

Clinton has said that one of his biggest regrets as president was not intervening in the 1994 Rwandan genocide. Administration officials knew of the potential magnitude of the genocide but chose not to send troops to support the relatively small and ineffective United Nations peacekeeping force.

In 2006 while on a trip to Rwanda, he was blunt in his assessment of how he handled the situation. “The United States just blew it in Rwanda,” he said.

"If we'd gone in sooner, I believe we could have saved at least a third of the lives that were lost,” he told CNBC in 2013. “It had an enduring impact on me."

Haitian rice tariffs

As president, Clinton called for Haiti to eliminate tariffs on imported, subsidized U.S. rice, which crippled Haiti’s rice farmers, a major contributor to the country’s economy. He became a UN special envoy to Haiti in 2009, and after the devastating earthquake in 2010, Clinton called the tariff decision “a devil’s bargain.”

“It was a mistake. It was a mistake that I was a party to. I am not pointing the finger at anybody. I did that,” he said. “I have to live every day with the consequences of the lost capacity to produce a rice crop in Haiti to feed those people, because of what I did. Nobody else.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HIV/AIDS & drug prices

HIV/AIDS experts have criticized Clinton for not doing enough to fight the global AIDS epidemic as it grew in the 1990s. Worse than what he didn't do was what his trade office did do: fought hard for trade policies that strengthened and extended pharmaceutical patents, driving up prices worldwide, making not just HIV medications unaffordable. "It was wrong," Clinton later said of the patent push. In the 15 years since his presidency, he has committed himself to the AIDS cause through the Clinton Foundation, working to undo the damage.

Yeah, that famous apology.

Here Are The Celebrities Contributing To Hillary Clinton's Campaign // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- The Democratic Party and Hollywood have a long history together, and former secretary of state and Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton is making the most of it. She has already received financial backing from celebrities big and small.

In May, Clinton swung through southern California to attend fundraisers hosted by entertainment industry producers Haim Saban and Steven Boccho. Those events were populated with a raft of celebrities who cut maximum $2,700 checks to the Democratic front-runner's campaign account. Actor Tobey Maguire later hosted Clinton for a fundraiser at his Los Angeles home in June.

Celebrity money did not just come from the West Coast, but also from New York. Clinton attended a fundraiser hosted by music producer L.A. Reid in May that made news when a photo of pop star Beyoncé Knowles with the candidate showed up online.

Contributions from celebrities aren't just fodder for entertainment. These donors work in industries that have very particular interests that a president (or any other politician) could influence.

Hollywood and the music industry were the primary supporters of anti-piracy legislation variously known as the Stop Online Piracy Act and the Protect IP Act. These bills would have clamped down on online piracy of movies, music, television and many other files, but in an incredibly broad manner that brought intense opposition from Silicon Valley companies and open Internet activists. The bills stalled in Congress after a grassroots campaign against them combined with a blackout of some of the largest websites, including Facebook and Wikipedia.

Musicians have personally battled Silicon Valley on another front -- royalty payments from streaming services and online music stores. Music streaming sites like Spotify and Pandora pay artists infinitesimal amounts per stream and have cut deeply into the amounts artists can earn. This affects big-name acts like Taylor Swift, who famously pulled her music from Spotify and fought Apple for royalty payments from their streaming service and won, as well as smaller indie acts trying to make a living. The streaming sites and tech companies that own them have lobbied Congress to help them reduce royalty payments to artists.

Clinton donor Beyoncé and her husband, rapper and businessman Jay-Z, were among a list of music stars, including Madonna and Daft Punk, who launched a streaming service called Tidal to provide better royalty payments to artists.

Celebrities also use the free media they get to promote policy issues they want to see action on. Singer John Legend, who donated to Clinton's campaign, launched a campaign in April to support criminal justice reform and an end to the era of mass incarceration.

And then there are the policy priorities of the increasingly influential Hollywood executives and producers. Take Haim Saban, a $100,000-plus bundler to Clinton's campaign. The Israeli-American television producer is a major Israel booster and promotes the policies of the Middle Eastern country.

Recently, Saban has joined forces with right-wing casino billionaire Sheldon Adelson in an effort to stamp out a boycott, divestment and sanction campaign (known as BDS) seeking to use economic pressure to end Israel's occupation of and control over the 4.4 million Palestinians living in the West Bank and Gaza.

After Saban hosted Clinton for a fundraiser at his home in May, the former secretary of state penned a letter to the billionaire Hollywood producer detailing her opposition to BDS.

Hillary Clinton Has An Office // HuffPo // Jason Linkins – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign has an office. It's in Brooklyn, a New York City borough famed for its high rents, like all New York City boroughs. People work in that office, at desks, with laptops, doing campaign stuff. When asked, those people all express a willingness to be there.

That's basically the "too long; didn't read" version of this week's important race to chase the big story, in which Bloomberg and Politico competed to be the first organization to get "exclusive" access to Clinton's campaign digs. The race ended in a draw. Why was the existence of a campaign office, and the need to be temporarily embedded within its prosaic confines, of such importance to these institutions? Therein hangs a semi-boring story!

See, a few weeks ago, a great hue and cry was raised after a reporter at a Clinton campaign event in New Hampshire were corralled by Clinton campaign staff in an actual rope, held by those staffers for the purpose of keeping the press at arm's length from the campaign. This was, justly, a moment of marginal embarrassment for the Clinton campaign, as it reinforced an already existing meme about Clinton as a politician: that she is press-averse, and that this aversion has led to a toxic relationship with the media.

All of this happened over the Independence Day holiday weekend. Also happening that weekend: Hillary Clinton was meeting with the New York Times reporter and This Town author Mark Leibovich, a gifted profiler of public figures and media professionals. Leibovich's piece, which was published in the New York Times Magazine less than two weeks later, specifically burrowed into this meme, capturing Clinton as a veteran politician striving for a fresh start both with voters and with the media.

I think that part of the fun of being Mark Leibovich is getting to see what part of his article becomes the thing that everyone decides is "the big takeaway" and being amused by this decision. This time out, he was surely not disappointed. Upon the profile's publication, the hive mind of the political media, which broadcasts its collective unconsciousness on Twitter, decided there were two things worth remembering about Leibovich's story. The first thing was that Hillary Clinton had once eaten moose stew. And then there was this part:

In June, I visited Clinton’s Brooklyn Heights headquarters to interview Robby Mook, her 35-year-old campaign manager. The meeting had been arranged through Jesse Ferguson, a campaign press minder, who in advance of my arrival sent me an email that said the following: "The ground rules we’ve had with others in our office is that the office itself is OTR," meaning off the record. "I don’t want to get into a contest of people tweeting pic from our office to show they were there."

I wrote back that I was not abiding by any "office is off the record" provisions and that it was not clear to me how you could declare a 40,000-square-foot space off the record. I did agree not to tweet.

Ferguson came back asking me if I would "embargo" anything that I saw in the office until the time my article was published. He made it sound as if I were gaining access to the Situation Room. "Regardless when the story runs," he wrote, it "still means you’re the first reporter who can report anything from the office."

And that's how "visiting Hillary Clinton's Brooklyn campaign office" suddenly took on paramount importance with some campaign journalists. Which is weird! As Leibovich warned in his piece, "the office ... basically resembled a large insurance company." There's a great irony there, because political reporters could probably learn a lot more about contemporary American life and the people living it if they actually did visit the offices of a large insurance company.

Unfortunately for everyone involved, Bloomberg and Politico visited the Clinton campaign office instead, where they learned that "campaign offices" are full of eager people who come ready to dispense pleasing bromides about civic duty and the importance of playing a part in a big presidential campaign. Or, as Bloomberg's Mark Halperin enthused as he began a broadcast of his show "With All Due Respect" live and exclusive from Clinton HQ, "They've got it all ... computers, telephones, partial wall dividers."

Maybe I'm wrong to say that this battle of who could care the most about something insignificant ended in a draw, because I suppose that it is objectively "cooler" to get to broadcast your Internet television show from a previously well-guarded aerie than it is to merely tour the office and shoot still photographs, as Politico did. On the other hand, no one at Politico has to work for Michael Bloomberg, who is rumored to have taken a very dim view of Halperin's antics. So I guess it's a wash either way you look at it.

Politico's Annie Karni, who drew the assignment of wandering through Clinton's office, looking for meaning, comes home with a slideshow of images, documenting the existence of several offices and three sets of cubicles into which varying "teams" of the Clinton campaign have settled themselves. Clinton's communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, tells Karni that everyone who heard that reporters were not welcome at the office just got the wrong idea:

“We want to make sure people can do their work, but otherwise we’re happy to have people come check it out,”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Palmieri said.

The original policy of prohibiting journalists from reporting on the campaign headquarters, she said, was misinterpreted as overly controlling. “When people come in for meetings, you want the operation to continue to function and that if something is overheard, or a memo is seen, it’s not going to get reported on,” Palmieri said. “It seems like that was received the wrong way.”

There is very little of interest that Politico discovers in the Clinton campaign office. Maybe the only interesting thing is that in campaign chairman John Podesta's office, there is "a dark painting of two suited men holding plates and silverware in preparation to eat another man, who appears to be dead."

"POLITICO was not allowed to document the memos and papers on his desk," Politico reports, in case anyone out there thought that this sort of thing would ever be tacitly allowed by anyone working in any office, anywhere.

Karni describes this visit as "part of a new effort [from the Clinton campaign] to engage with the national media that follows on the heels of Clinton’s first national television interview last week." Considering that this was just a guided tour of an office, conducted by Clinton's communications director -- the only person quoted in the piece -- this would seem to be an exercise in low-bar clearance.

Halperin seems to fare better in his foray into the Clinton office, as he and his cohost Margaret Talev at least get to speak to a number of fresh-faced Clinton campaign workers (including former Winter Olympian Michelle Kwan), all of whom seem to be well-prepared (probably because they were specifically prepped) to offer cheerful homilies about working on the Clinton campaign.

The centerpiece of the "With All Due Respect" broadcast is a sit-down interview in which Halperin and Talev talk shop with Clinton political director Amanda Renteria and campaign "director of states" Marlon Marshall, each of whom capably responds to each question with an array of safe platitudes. Asked about the "ethos of this particular campaign," Renteria offers, "It's interesting, it's creative, we really are trying to push the envelope of 'give us your ideas and let's try it out.'" They "work together, not in silos." They are "very deliberate about culture."

I'll say! When Halperin asks if they require the younger members of the campaign team to follow any specific "political rules," Renteria says that everyone is told, "Don't forget why you're here" and "Look around and breathe in and enjoy it." This probably goes without saying, but these aren't "political rules" -- they're "stuff people put on motivational posters."

Halperin asks about the success Sen. Bernie Sanders has had, making headway in the primary race while Clinton's other Democratic rivals haven't. "Can he beat Clinton in either Iowa or New Hampshire or both?"

Clinton campaign states' director Marlon Marshall responds: "First of all, we always expected a competitive primary --"

Halperin cuts him off: "I've heard that line."

"I'm repeating it," said Marshall. "It's a true line."

OK, well, we're really making headway now.

Here are other things I learned, thanks to Bloomberg and Politico:

The Clinton volunteers "work hard."

They have a board that lists who rode around on the campaign bus.

"Each team has come up with its own slogan, which flies above the team’s seating area. The communications team, for instance, calls itself 'sources close to the campaign.' The policy team is known as 'wonks for the win.'"

They have an old, brown refrigerator.

When asked, the people who work on the Clinton campaign can briefly summarize their particular jobs.

Campaign manager Robby Mook's office has a "standing desk" and a "cheerful flowering plant," in case you thought he maybe had a really sulky flowering plant.

That brown refrigerator is apparently "infamous."

There is one "off-message" moment, in which Renteria seems to imply to Halperin that she'd punch Donald Trump if she ran up on him in the streets. Should that happen, The Huffington Post will cover it in our Entertainment section.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This one guy made an edible arrangement with berries that looked like the Clinton campaign logo and put it on Instagram, and this is "social media."

Halperin works really hard to get to the bottom of the whole berry thing. Where did they come from? Why berries? A dogged pursuit of the truth, about berries.

The brown refrigerator was donated, maybe?

"It's like a family."

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, is the "Brooklyn of the Midwest."

Per Politico, this is the most important thing I learned:

Clinton herself does not keep an office at the Brooklyn HQ -- she typically works out of a separate Midtown office and so far has visited the Brooklyn office just once.

So, that brown refrigerator has actually been a greater presence in this office than the candidate. Good thing all this effort was made to gain access to it. And yes, we have to thank Mark Leibovich for all of this:

Anyway, this was a nice trick. Candidate wants a fresh start with the press. The press sets terms: Let us into your office. This turns out to be the easiest, no-risk thing in the world for the candidate. So after a bit of prep and spit-shining (but not too much spit-shining -- that old brown refrigerator stands in testament to the campaign's middle-class frugality, after all!), the reporters enter, gather their quotes and depart, firm in the knowledge that they have done something special.

So what if the reader is left with no insight into the candidate or her policy preferences? So what if the content generated from these escapades ranges from poll-tested platitudes to annotated interior decoration? The point of this exercise is that the campaign press believes that they have a sacred role to play and that the Clinton campaign had sinned by not honoring that role with sufficient solemnity.

In the end, everyone got what they wanted. Quite cheaply, at that.

When Donald Trump Praised Hillary Clinton // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 17, 2015

Republican presidential candidate and reality television star Donald Trump has been deeply critical of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as he has embarked on his campaign, but it wasn't always so.

The real estate magnate has a long history of delivering admiring comments about the woman he now calls the "worst Secretary of State in the history of the United States," and a "desperate" and "sad" candidate.

When Clinton last ran for office, Trump was torn between supporting her and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. " They're both terrific people, and I hope they both get the nomination," he told CNN in 2007, adding that he thought Clinton would surround herself with good people to negotiate a deal with Iran. A year later, Trump wondered publicly why Clinton wasn't chosen as President Obama's running-mate.

In 2012, as Obama was running for re-election, Trump called Clinton "terrific" again in an interview with Fox News, saying she performed well as Secretary of State.

"Hillary Clinton I think is a terrific woman," he told Greta Van Susteren. "I am biased because I have known her for years. I live in New York. She lives in New York. I really like her and her husband both a lot. I think she really works hard. And I think, again, she's given an agenda, it is not all of her, but I think she really works hard and I think she does a good job. I like her.

And on Fox and Friends on Wednesday, Trump explained why he donated to Clinton's campaigns.

"I'm a businessman. I contribute to everybody," Trump said. "When I needed Hillary, she was there. If I say 'go to my wedding,' they go to my wedding."

Would Hillary Clinton's Profit-Sharing Plan Put More Money in Your Pocket? // TIME // Pat Regnier – July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Thursday outlined a plan to encourage companies to share more of their earnings with workers. It's a tax credit companies could get for two years if they set up a profit-sharing plan tilted toward the lower- and middle-income employees on the payroll. (The tax credit would phase out for higher-paid workers.) In an example used by the campaign, if an employee was paid $5,000 in a profit-sharing bonus, the company would get a tax break of up to $750.

At least at first, the plan has generally been interpreted as part of Clinton's tilt toward the progressive side of the economic debate. "Veering left…" is how the insider political paper The Hill put it.

Clinton herself has fit profit sharing into her broader message about fixing economic inequality. Here's a graphic from the campaign website that illustrates the story Clinton is telling about what's driving inequality. Companies are doing great and getting more productive, but they haven't haven't been sharing those gains with workers:

But even though profit sharing has the word "sharing" in it, it's a pretty business-friendly solution. Lots of companies like the idea of paying their people more only when the business is doing well; the flip side is they can pay less in fallow years. In the jargon of human resources, other names for profit sharing are the much less warm and fuzzy sounding "pay-at-risk" and "variable pay." Wal-Mart, a company that's famously tough about holding down its labor costs, used to be well-known for profit sharing.

At qz.com , writer Alison Shrager worries that more profit-sharing would just shift more pay out of steady wages and into up-and-down bonuses, adding another source of instability to the finacial lives of low-and middle-income workers. The Clinton campaign told Vox.com that companies would only be able to get the credit for profit sharing above regualr wages—presumably meaning they couldn't cut salaries and then get a credit for adding a profit-sharing plan. But over time, as companies gave out regular raises and made new hires, or as new firms started up, the mix of pay might still shift toward variable bonuses. (Profit sharing eligible for the credit would be capped at 10% of salary.)

If Clinton's proposal became law, it would really be just one more of several tax policies that shape how companies structure their pay. If you get health insurance at work or a 401(k) match, that's because the tax code makes it appealing for companies to pay you that way. You pay less tax on $1 of health insurance or $1 of a 401(k) match than you do on $1 of straight cash pay, so companies like to offer those benefits; similarly, it would be slightly cheaper for a company to give you $1 of profit sharing than to give you $1 of a raise. As an economist will tell you, the health insurance you get at work isn't a free gift on top of your pay. It's part of your overall compensation. If companies didn't offer health coverage, they'd have to pay us more. (Of course, then we'd still have use that money to buy insurance.)

So perhaps Clinton's plan would largely move money from one line in your pay stub to another. But it might be better than a zero-sum game. For one thing, it's effectively a tax cut on pay, which the Clinton campaign says is worth $10 billion to $20 billion over ten years (not huge as these things go.) Though companies would get the credit directly, to the extent that it encouraged companies to make more money available for profit-based bonuses, the tax break should flow through to workers.

And there's at least some evidence that companies with profit sharing actually do pay more overall. An influential think-tank policy paper on "inclusive prosperity," which the Clinton campaign is reported to be be drawing from, points to a study of the effects of profit sharing by the economists Joseph Blasi, Richard Freeman, and Douglas Kruse. Drawing on surveys of workers, it found that pay was generally as high or higher among companies that gave workers some kind of stake in company performance. (That includes not just profit-sharing bonuses but employee stock options and other programs.)

Why? Partly it may be because you have to give people a shot at higher total pay to compensate for the risk that they might not do as well in some years. Or, the economists write, it could be that people are getting paid more because profit sharing spurs them to be more productive. That looks like a win-win, but its not exactly money for nothing. Maybe profit sharing works because it improve morale and gives people an incentive to worker smarter and more creatively. Or perhaps anxiety over losing a bonus scares people into working harder and faster.

But the wage stagnation of the past several decades isn't mainly a productivity problem—just look at the Clinton campaign's own graphic above. People with jobs these days are already working smart and working hard.

Profit-sharing tax credits might nudge some companies to share more of the gains from that productivity with people outside the C-suites. But the story of the last several years is that it's taken employment a long time to climb back from the hit it took in 2008. One thing that really helps people get more pay—whether it's in cash, bonuses, stock option, pensions, or insurance—is full employment and a hot labor market, where companies have to do everything they can to get the workers they need. That's something Washington has had a hard time delivering.

Elizabeth Warren Sends Hillary Clinton a Message // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 17, 2015

Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren drew a bright red line on Friday for 2016 presidential candidates, calling for them to commit to end the so-called "revolving door" between Wall Street and the Cabinet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The firebrand populist said specifically that all the presidential candidates should support Wisconsin Sen. Tammy Baldwin's bill introduced this week that would prohibit bonuses for Wall Street executives who take government jobs.

"Anyone who wants to be President should appoint only people who have already demonstrated they are independent, who have already demonstrated that they can hold giant banks accountable," said Warren, speaking in Phoenix at Netroots Nation, a convention of liberal activists.

While the call to action was aimed at everyone running in 2016, its clearest target was Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who is courting the very types of progressive activists in the audience in both the primary and general election.

While Warren declined to run for president, her supporters give her credit for pushing Clinton to the left and setting the liberal standard on a host of issues.

Clinton has already gone at least part of the way to satisfying Warren's demands. During a speech Monday on her vision for the American economy, Clinton called for greater regulation of financial institutions.

"I will appoint and empower regulators who understand that Too Big To Fail is still too big a problem," Clinton said on Monday. She outlined plans to rein in Wall Street and "go beyond Dodd-Frank."

Baldwin's bill is aimed at addressing what progressives see as a profound governmental problem: that government finance appointees often have close ties to Wall Street. In her speech, Warren pointed out that three of the last four Treasury Secretaries, the vice chair of the Federal Reserve and other key government officials have had close ties with Citigroup, a major Wall Street bank.

"Elizabeth Warren offered a framework for how Democratic presidential candidates can reduce Wall Street influence in key appointments," said Stephanie Taylor, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee after Warren's speech.

Unhappy with President Obama's less aggressive approach to Wall Street, the Democratic left has searched for a liberal champion who can address issues like income inequality and campaign finance reforms and found some of its voice in Warren, a former Harvard law professor and consumer protection advocate.

While Clinton has rhetorically embraced much of Warren's logic, she has not gone as far as her fellow Democratic presidential candidates, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

In her speech Friday, Warren spoke about a surging progressive movement across the country, calling Washington, D.C., out of touch with the rest of America.

She ticked off a litany of issues that she said Americans are further to the left on than elected officials, including raising the minimum wage, reducing the cost of college, requiring paid sick leave, increasing social security benefits, and enacting campaign finance reform.

"I'm here to make an announcement to insider Washington: America is far more progressive than you are," Warren said.

It's a message Warren is counting on resonating in the 2016 election. Warren added that the economic crisis in 2008 would have been different if there had been left-leaning economists in high governmental positions instead of Wall Street alums.

"How would the world be different today if, when the economic crisis hit [in 2008], Joe Stiglitz had been Secretary of the Treasury?" Warren said.

Stiglitz is now advising Hillary Clinton.

Hillary Clinton's Digital Team Likes Barack Obama's Style // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 17, 2015

Democratic U.S. presidential hopeful and former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton speaks to members of the media July 14, 2015 on Capitol Hill in Washington, DC.

Hillary Clinton campaign's deputy digital director said Friday that the White House's online outreach is a model for how public figures can connect with voters, offering a hint into how the Democratic frontrunner will Instagram, Tweet, and email during the 2016 race.

Speaking during a panel at Netroots Nation, a convention of liberal activists in Phoenix, Jenna Lowenstein pointed to the increasing importance of using the web to create a feeling of intimacy with voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You can have a candidate who everyone loves and wants to sit down and have a drink with them, 99% of people aren't going to be able to do that. Digital is an opportunity," Lowenstein said "to be a proxy of that."

Lowenstein said the White House has been notably effective at different kinds of digital outreach, pointing to Obama's hour-long interview with Marc Maron, and the president unveiling his proposal for free community college in a nine-second Vine.

"When the president rolled out free community college, they did it in this Vine and it was the perfect delivery mechanism," said Lowenstein. "It was kind of this badass moment where the president was sitting on Air Force One and in 9 seconds explained the policy."

The Clinton campaign has projected its candidates' persona online as personable, funny, and approachable. Clinton's first Instagram was a photo of pantsuits with a tongue-in-cheek hashtag of the title of her book, "Hard Choices," and the campaign has frequently posted childhood pictures of Clinton.

Hillary Clinton 1, Protesters 0? Climate hecklers m ay have a point // MSNBC // T ony Dokoupil – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton delivered a dose of self-styled climate change real talk to some silly college kids on Thursday. But the content doesn't hold up well against the facts. And it certainly won't silence the likes of Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley, Clinton's fellow presidential hopefuls and her two most potent critics on the left.

The confrontation occurred during open questions at Clinton's first New Hampshire town hall appearance. A young woman asked the former secretary of state if, as president, she'd ban fossil fuel extraction on public lands. Clinton said no: "The answer is not until we've got the alternatives in place. That may not be a satisfactory answer to you but I think I have to take the responsible answer."

Then a second young woman stood up, and said she was "disappointed" in the first answer. She wondered if Clinton's "refusal to take leadership on climate change" was because of big campaign donations from the fossil fuel industry. "No. No, it is not," Clinton said, adding that the feel good response — "you bet I will ban extraction on public lands" — would have also been a reckless one. "We still have to run our economy, we still have to turn on the lights."

You can expect this to be a popular line in 2016. With a sigh and shrug, it allows politicians to distance themselves from fossil fuels without actually curbing them in the slightest. But while it used to have the added virtue of being true, we don't really need fossil fuels to keep the lights on and run the economy.

Not anymore.

The alternatives are in place. They've won the sprint against fossil fuels, according to data presented this spring at the Bloomberg New Energy Finance annual summit in New York.

The world is adding more capacity for renewable power each year than coal, natural gas, and oil combined. And there's no going back. The age of fossil fuel is ending.

This wasn't the case just a few years ago.

And there remain's a lot that's right about Clinton's answer. We get about 30% of our energy from fossil fuel extracted from federal land and waters, according to an analysis this year by the Center for American Progress and The Wilderness Society. The Powder River Basin of southeast Montana and northeast Wyoming alone supplies coal for some 200 power plants.

That's about 40% of the market. And it's lashed together and superglued by leases and contracts, courts and lawyers. It obeys the natural law of profits and loss: if billions are invested, billions must be made.

But this is a slow motion scandal for environmentalists. The single biggest source of greenhouse gas emissions in the U. S. isn't planes or cars. It isn't fracking or meat farming. It's coal harvested from that federally owned land—land that belongs to everyone.

The extraction of fossil fuels from taxpayer owned land is responsible for a quarter of national carbon emissions, the stuff that scientists say warms the atmosphere and harms the planet. That's why many people see this as an an issue worthy of heckling the former first lady. It's an extension of the divestment movement, a push for intellectual honesty by people who support action on climate change.

It's also more than a protest position. Increasingly, scientific research and real world examples show that the next president could responsibly ban this extraction on federal land. In other words, counter to her answer Thursday,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton could deliver the applause line. And she could do it without the layoffs, recessions, and blackouts she suggested.

Here's the math behind it: renewable sources of energy account for about 10% of total U.S. energy consumption and 13% of electricity generation, according to federal data. We'd need to just about triple our use to offset the 30% of our energy currently generated off federal lands. Impossible? Hardly. Unheard of? Not at all.

More than a dozen countries get more than 30% of their electricity from renewable sources, according to the Paris-based International Energy Agency. Most of that would need to be solar, which President Obama will happily tell you is already adding jobs at 10 times the rate of the rest of the economy. Thanks to Elon Musk, the world even has a way to store solar and wind. We can now save it up for when the sun don't shine and the wind doesn't blow.

What we need now is the infrastructure to actually tap all this renewable potential. Mark Jacobson, a professor of civil and environmental engineering at Stanford University, has been saying it for years: "You could power America with renewables from a technical and economic standpoint."

What we need is the will to do it. So the question remains: does Hillary Clinton have it?

Hillary Clinton's campaign wrote a sarcastic blog post mocking reporters critical of her poll numbers // Business Insider // Colin Campbell – July 17, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign publicly rolled its eyes at the media this week.

Clinton's communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, wrote a sarcastic blog post mocking reporters for trying to draw a narrative that Clinton is sinking in recent polls.

In the Thursday piece — titled, "Hillary Clinton's No Good, (Record-Breaking, Poll-Winning), Very Bad Week" — Palmieri argued that the latest polls actually were full of good news for Clinton.

"If you believe the mood and headlines from some of the press, it's been a pretty rough week for Hillary Clinton. While there was widespread and substantive coverage of the rollout of her economic agenda, politically, it's a different story. One poll showed so much trouble for Hillary that she only had a higher favorability number than any other candidate it tested," she wrote.

Though Palmieri didn't name the media outlets she was criticizing, she linked to several polls that were widely covered in the press. On Thursday, The Associated Press covered its own AP-GfK survey by focusing on Clinton's drop among Democratic voters, for example.

"Clinton's standing is falling among Democrats, and voters view her as less decisive and inspiring than when she launched her presidential campaign just three months ago," the AP reported. "The survey offers a series of warning signs for the leading Democratic candidate. Most troubling, perhaps, for her prospects are questions about her compassion for average Americans, a quality that fueled President Barack Obama's two White House victories."

However, Palmieri was clearly not convinced. Her blog post went on to sarcastically lament "even worse" polls showing Clinton leading potential Republican opponents in key demographics.

"Even worse, multiple polls released this week show that she leads every candidate running in head-to-head matchups," she continued. "While it is widely known that the growing Hispanic electorate is critical in deciding the election, new polling shows that Hillary Clinton has a disastrous 68 percent approval rating among Hispanic voters and only leads her closest Republican competition (Bush) by 37 points, 64% to 27%."

Palmieri also took shots at the media for focusing on the Clinton campaign's burn rate in its Wednesday finance report. The AP and other outlets led their stories by noting she "spent more than $18 million hiring hundreds of employees in the first three months of her presidential campaign."

Palmieri fired back by pointing to the size of the campaign's overall fundraising haul.

"Not only that, she raised a record amount of primary money for a candidate in their first quarter, with only $8 million (a sum larger than most Republican campaigns raised in total) in donations of less than $200. Hillary also spent too much money building her organization and was only left with more cash on hand than any other campaign raised and more in the bank than the top three Republican campaigns combined," she wrote.

"It's true," Palmieri concluded. "Hillary is left in the terrible position of having the most resources of any candidate and being voters' top choice to be the next President of the United States."

"Act on climate!": Hillary Clinton gets heckled by protestors who want her to crack down on fossil fuels // Salon // Lindsay Abrams – July 17, 2015

Calling climate change "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face as a nation and a world" may not be enough for Hillary Clinton to convince climate hawks she's ready to rise to challenge.

The Democratic presidential candidate temporarily lost control of the crowd at a New Hampshire town hall event Thursday after an audience member called her out for not giving a satisfactory answer to an earlier question about fossil fuel extraction.

"I know what the right answer, in terms of getting votes, would have been," Clinton responded. "The right answer would have been, 'You bet I will ban extraction on public lands.'"

"We have to change our energy policy," Clinton continued. "I have been clear about that; I will continue to be clear about that." But she went on to explain why she's not willing to give the answer the audience member wanted to hear, explaining, "we also have to do it in a way that doesn't disrupt our economy."

The question of how committed Clinton is to fighting climate change is a major one: President Obama set the stage for (mostly) strong executive action on the issue, and the platforms of fellow candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley are to her left on most climate issues. In her formal campaign launch speech, Clinton did propose "using additional fees and royalties from fossil fuel extraction to protect the environment." But Sanders co-sponsored a bill this spring that would end tax breaks and other subsidies for the oil, gas and coal industries, while O'Malley's called for an end to all fossil fuels by 2050. If that's perhaps not as politically feasible as Clinton's proposals, it at least demonstrates what it looks like for a candidate to recognize the necessity of "substantial and sustained" reductions in emissions.

Clinton's town hall questioner also brought up the contributions made to her campaign by the fossil fuel industry, suggesting that may be the reason why the candidate is unwilling to commit to stronger climate action. Sanders and O'Malley both signed a pledge promising to "neither solicit nor accept campaign contributions from any oil, gas, or coal company;" Hillary has not. And all 40 of the registered lobbyists bundling contributions for her campaign, the Huffington Post reported, have in the past worked to advance the interests of the fossil fuel industry.

Clinton dismissed the implication that fossil fuel backing influenced her refusal to say she'd ban oil and gas extraction on public lands. But she lost the crowd as a group of protestors began loudly chanting, "Act on climate! Act on climate!"

"That's okay, that's okay, that's okay," Clinton shouted over them. "I am all in favor of acting on climate."

Hillary Clinton Thinks Telemarketers Are 'Really Annoying,' Too // ABC // Liz Kreutz – July 17, 2015

Apparently, even Hillary Clinton gets calls from telemarketers. (And yes, just like the rest of us, she can't stand them).

During a town hall at the Dover City Hall on Thursday, Clinton commiserated about telemarketing scams with a voter who stood up to ask what the Democratic presidential candidate could do to stop them.

"It's really annoying. It's really annoying. I know," Clinton said. "I mean, we have the same issue at home. It's really so annoying when you've told somebody 'I'm not interested, please don't call me,' and they just kind of go through the cycle and they call you again and call you again, and all the rest of it."

The voter told Clinton that she was getting robocalls up to 20 times a day, despite putting her number on the national "Do Not Call" list, and was desperate for some help.

"I've tried everything," the woman said. "Short of me changing my phone number that everybody knows. I really don't want to do that. We have elderly, we have sick relatives, we have children that need to reach us, and this phone is constantly bouncing across the country."

Clinton, who said she had never before been asked about telemarketing, assured the woman she would look into it.

"I don't know the answer, but I will try to find out if there is an answer," Clinton said.

Even so, the image of Clinton answering a telemarketing call over and over in her Chappaqua, New York, apparently left an impression.

Democrats eager to exploit contrast between Trump, Clinton // Boston Globe // Sean Sullivan –

DOVER, N.H. — Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton spent 15 minutes here Thursday calmly unveiling a corporate profit-sharing plan as part of her proposal to grow middle class incomes and rein in the power of Wall Street banks.

Later in the afternoon, about an hour's drive up State Highway 11, Donald Trump held a rowdy campaign rally where he lashed out at opponents in both parties and stressed his controversial immigration positions. There were no concrete policy ideas.

The contrast highlighted a development that thrills Democratic operatives even as it unsettles their Republican counterparts: Trump, long seen as a political sideshow, is surging in the polls — offering Clinton a plum chance to boost her preferred image as a serious, seasoned alternative to a chaotic field of Republican presidential hopefuls now headlined by the brash billionaire.

"The juxtaposition of the two — your head may explode," said Kathy Sullivan, a former New Hampshire Democratic Party chair, who is backing Clinton.

Holding her first town hall meeting of the campaign, Clinton made a detailed pitch for her plan to spur more companies to share their profits with employees by offering a two-year tax credit as an incentive. The credit would be equal to at least 15 percent of profit sharing distributions and the profit sharing would be capped at 10 percent on top of current employee wages.

"Everybody running on the other side has a different economic philosophy," Clinton said at the town hall, which came the same week she gave a speech laying out her economic message. "They really still believe if you cut taxes on the wealthy, if you lift regulations on corporations, that somehow economic activity will trickle down to all the rest of us."

Trump's explosion onto the Republican campaign has complicated the Republican effort to counterpunch. It's hard to get people to focus on middle class pocketbook issues when the headline-grabbing mogul is on the trail boasting of his vast wealth, offending neighboring nations and tangling with critics in both parties.

In a sweltering room in Laconia, Trump took swipes at a laundry list of foes, from Clinton and President Barack Obama to GOP rival Jeb Bush, as supporters cheered him on. He stood by his recent remarks that illegal immigrants from Mexico are "rapists" who are bringing "drugs" and "crime" into the country.

"It turns out I was right," Trump said, citing an illegal immigrant who allegedly killed a woman in California, and a Mexican drug kingpin who escaped from prison.

Later in his remarks, Trump summed up his candidacy: "The American dream is dead, but I'm going to make it bigger and better and stronger than ever before."

While Trump's Republican primary opponents were initially slow to critique him, some have recently become more forceful.

"I have a message for my fellow Republicans and the independents who will be voting in the primary process: what Mr. Trump is offering is not conservatism, it is Trump-ism - a toxic mix of demagoguery and nonsense," said former Texas governor Rick Perry, a Republican, in a Thursday statement.

Still, Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, who huddled with Trump on Wednesday, has praised his blunt tone. Other presidential contenders have shown reluctance to openly bash him.

"Donald Trump can speak for himself, and I'm not going to put words in the mouth of any candidate, him or anybody else out there," said Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, a Republican who also campaigned in New Hampshire on Thursday.

Trump, who has flirted with running for president in past elections, is diving deeper into the race with each passing day. He has launched an full-fledged campaign, hired early state staff and on Wednesday said he filed a financial disclosure with the Federal Election Commission, though he did not release a copy of that disclosure.

National polls show him to be a top-tier candidate. But many Republicans remain unconvinced he is committed for the long haul.

"I don't think he is looking at all like serious candidate," said former New Hampshire Republican Party chairman Fergus Cullen. "There are some trappings of a serious campaign, but this is a Potemkin effort at best."

His effort may not be built for the long haul — his campaign's burn rate, a comparison of money raised with money spent, was an astounding 74 percent, highest in the Republican field. But some Republicans worry that even a primary season Trump candidacy may cost them next year, as a new Univision News Poll shows that 70 percent of Hispanic voters say they have an unfavorable impression of him.

The Clinton-Trump roadshow isn't over yet: Trump is the feature speaker at a Republican dinner on Friday in Arkansas, where Clinton — whose husband, Bill Clinton, was the state's governor — will speak Saturday at a Democratic dinner.

8 things to watch for at Iowa Dems' Hall of Fame dinner // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – July 17, 2015

1. Friday night's Hall of Fame Celebration in Iowa will be the first time the cast of five current Democratic presidential hopefuls has shared a stage.

The audience will be most interested in Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders, predicted Bret Niles, chairman of the Linn County Democrats.

"The crowd reaction will be a big thing: How are people going to react to Bernie with Hillary there as well?" Niles said.

Niles speculated that ticket holders at the state party fundraiser would be a more monied, moderate crowd that might not be as receptive to Sanders as crowds at his solo events.

A strong performance by Sanders, a Vermont U.S. senator who is calling for a progressive people's revolution, would go a long way to impress upon politics watchers that he's not a flash in the pan but a real contender, said Democratic operative Grant Woodard.

2. Who will deliver the best-received anti-Republican line?

The Democratic candidates are unlikely to go after each other explicitly — it would be notable if they did — but will likely hit the Republicans hard.

Political operatives said they expect to see jabs toward: 1. Donald Trump. 2. Ted Cruz. 3. Steve King.

Those three Republicans have given the Democrats plenty of material.

Trump has taken heat since saying in his June 16 presidential announcement speech that Mexico is deliberately sending drug smugglers, rapists and other criminals illegally into the United States.

Cruz, the only presidential candidate to send a news release saying he was "pleased to welcome Donald Trump into the race," later saluted Trump "for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration."

And King, an Iowa congressman famous for his own remarks about canteloupe-calved Mexican drug smugglers, told the National Journal this week that Trump is "riding a good wave and right now if the caucus were held today, he'd probably come out on top."

Trump topped the GOP field in a recent USA Today/Suffolk University poll of national primary voters, but fared the worst against Clinton among seven GOP competitors tested in a survey of adults nationwide last Thursday through Sunday.

3. Can Clinton's pre-event rally match the crowd size and energy that Sanders has been seeing?

Sanders has been making headlines nationally for attracting audiences of thousands, including a raucous crowd of 2,500 in Council Bluffs in early July.

The most Clinton has drawn so far was about 700 to her debut Iowa rally, held June 14, the same day as Iowa's biggest gay pride parade.

For the Hall of Fame dinner, party officials capped the number of tickets each campaign could purchase at 200 to prevent any single camp from dominating the 1,200-seat room.

All the tickets sold out in less than three weeks, which left some activists locked out.

Clinton's Iowa staff decided to do a free pre-rally, set for 3:45 p.m. Friday in the armory at the nearby Veterans Memorial Building, which can accommodate about 600.

"Hillary Clinton has some great supporters in Cedar Rapids, and we wanted to make sure they all got a chance to see her during Friday's visit, regardless of whether they were able to buy a ticket to the dinner," Iowa spokeswoman Lily Adams said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Expectations are high for Clinton to have a packed house bursting with energy, since she's the undisputed frontrunner in Iowa and has the largest campaign staff here. She has amassed more than 60 paid staff and a phalanx of volunteers.

4. Will either Jim Webb or newcomer Lincoln Chafee make a dent?

This is the first Iowa visit for Lincoln Chafee, a longtime Republican who served as a Rhode Island U.S. senator, then led the state as an independent-turned-Democratic governor.

Webb, a former U.S. senator from Virginia and secretary of the U.S. Navy under President Ronald Reagan, has done 25 events in Iowa this presidential election cycle, but remains little known.

Iowa Democrats, if they've even heard of them, said they're mystified about why they're running.

Cedar Rapids Democrat Linda Langston, a county supervisor, said she mentioned during a conference in Washington, D.C., that Iowa would feature all five candidates on one stage.

"People said, 'Five? Five Democrats? Who else is in?' And these are people in D.C.," she said.

Webb, who was a Republican for most of his political career, said on "Fox News Sunday" last weekend that the Democratic party "has moved way far to the left. That's not my Democratic party in and of itself." And he made headlines recently for urging thoughtfulness during the emotional debate over Confederate flag symbolism, saying the Civil War had a "complicated history."

"Webb's comments regarding the Confederate flag are beyond odd coming from someone that showed so much promise in the party at one time," Woodard said.

5. Will Martin O'Malley break through?

O'Malley, a former Baltimore mayor and Maryland governor, will also have a pre-rally, at 5:15 p.m. at White Star Ale House in Cedar Rapids.

Webb and Chafee are "fringe characters who I don't think will gain much traction — I just don't think there's a lane for them," said Douglas Burns, an opinion columnist at the Carroll Daily Times Herald who frequently attends Iowa campaign events.

But O'Malley checks all the boxes: He's viewed as less radical than Sanders, he appeals to populists and progressives, and he has some of Clinton's establishment appeal, Burns said.

His organizers filled all of their 200 seats, an effort that could signal a foothold, Iowa insiders said.

6. Will the messages motivate Iowa activists worried about boredom?

Iowa activists said Clinton and the other contenders need to show they can overcome frustration with Democratic losses in 2014 and general boredom on the Democratic side in 2016.

"All of the candidates on the same stage? I want to say what's on my mind and that's: 'So what?'" Steven Lynch, chairman of the Chickasaw County Democrats told the Register. "I mean, the caucuses are Feb. 1."

Lynch said he doesn't want to hear crowd-pleasing quips from the Democratic contenders; he wants them to reassure him they know how to fix the economy.

"The Republicans clobbered us statewide and nationally in 2014. I'm concerned that we have the right message on the economic growth of our nation," he said.

7. Will the party chairwoman make inroads with activists looking for governor candidates?

The presidential candidate appearances will follow introduction of seven Hall of Fame inductees and other speeches, one of them from Iowa Democratic Party Chairwoman Andy McGuire.

McGuire is considered a possible candidate for governor in 2018, and this will be her first time publicly handling the reins of the party. If activists believe she's organizing properly for the caucuses, it could boost her stature.

8. How will national and world news outlets showcase post-flood Cedar Rapids?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When the Cedar River swamped 10 square miles of the city in June 2008, it forced 22,000 people from their homes, and walloped about 1,100 businesses and 300 governmental facilities, causing more than $7 billion in damage.

The flooded convention center was replaced with the $76 million Convention Complex, where the Hall of Fame dinner is being staged.

“It’s a monument to coming back from the flood,” said Cedar Rapids Democrat Monica Vernon, who is making her second bid for Congress and is seeing key Democrats coalescing behind her.

A massive infusion of state and federal grants and disaster relief funding also gave Cedar Rapids a new $50 million library, two new fire stations for $35 million, a $36 million public works building, a $44.5 million school district headquarters, a $7.5 million riverside amphitheater and other projects.

Altogether, Iowa was awarded or eligible for more than $4.7 billion in flood recovery money.

Cedar Rapids’ Czech Village and the New Bohemia district, reached by going south on Third Street from the convention center, are areas that tell the post-flood victory story, said state Sen. Rob Hogg, a Cedar Rapids Democrat exploring a bid for U.S. Senate.

Tom Miller, Michael Fitzgerald endorse Clinton // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 17, 2015

Two of Iowa’s top elected Democrats are endorsing Hillary Clinton for president.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and State Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald have both decided to back the front-runner over her challengers.

Both men supported then-Sen. Barack Obama over Clinton early in the Iowa campaign in 2007. Their endorsements in February of that year helped Obama gain a foothold among Iowa Democrats and upset Clinton in the 2008 caucuses.

Miller said in an interview Thursday that he always admired Clinton. “Barack was just an exceptional candidate. … Had he not been in the race, I would have been for Hillary all the way.”

He said Clinton has continued to grow in the past eight years, including during her service as Obama’s secretary of state. He said she has the intelligence, experience and judgment to be a good president. He also is impressed with the formidable organization her campaign has already built in the state.

Miller said he likes Clinton’s Democratic rivals, including the surging populist Bernie Sanders, “but I think she’s the strongest candidate in the field.”

Fitzgerald echoed Miller’s thoughts in a prepared statement Thursday.

“Hillary Clinton is the candidate that is boldly speaking out on the fundamental issues facing our country, and her progressive vision for our country is exactly what we need to keep our country moving forward," Fitzgerald wrote. "Hillary Clinton's commitment to growing our economy so that everyday Iowans can get ahead and stay ahead is what Iowa Democrats believe to our core."

Clinton says U.S. can't afford GOP's economics // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, Ia. – Hillary Clinton fired up supporters here Friday by vowing that her Democratic presidential campaign would highlight the stark differences she has with Republicans, especially on the economy.

"We already know what the Republicans stand for, because we have seen it, we understand it," she told about 500 cheering voters at Cedar Rapids' Veterans Memorial Building. "We know they still believe in what they call trickle-down economics. We have been trickled-down enough. And it's time to say we're not going back there."

Clinton stressed that she would push to raise incomes of everyone, not just wealthy people who have benefited in the past from Republicans' tax cuts.

She said her husband, former President Bill Clinton, and President Barack Obama both were left with economies that had been crippled by Republican policies. Both Democratic presidents managed to turn the economy around, she said. "President Obama deserves more credit than he's been given for saving us from a Great Depression," she said to applause. She added that she would build on Obama's progress to bring stronger growth for everyone.

The afternoon rally was designed to energize Clinton's troops before she took the stage with her Democratic challengers at the Iowa Democratic Party Hall of Fame Celebration on Friday evening. The room was only about three-quarters full for the rally, but participants gave Clinton an enthusiastic reception.

Tom Hennessey, a retired union construction worker who attended the rally, said he was impressed by Clinton's performance. He backed her when she ran in 2008, and he's glad she's running again. "My opinion has not changed one bit — she's still the same strong-willed woman," said Hennessey, 72, of Cedar Rapids.

Hennessey said he's not bothered by the surge of support liberal challenger Bernie Sanders is seeing among Democrats in Iowa and elsewhere. Competition should sharpen Clinton, he said, and help draw off some conservative fire. "At least she's not the only target on the target range," he said, chuckling.

Earlier Friday afternoon, Clinton greeted several dozen young staffers and volunteers at the "Need Pizza" restaurant in downtown Cedar Rapids.

Clinton recalled how much she learned by volunteering to sign up Democratic voters in Texas in 1972. She urged her young supporters to embrace the voters and other volunteers they meet.

"I can't tell you how pleased I am that not only are you working for me here in Iowa, but that you're having these experiences," she said. "And I hope you really cherish that. I mean, people that I met in Texas are still the closest of friends, and now we're exchanging pictures of our grandchildren, that's how long it's been. ... I am thrilled that you have chosen to come work for me, but also that you're part of this process."

Clinton aims most of her fire at Republicans // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton struck back at Republican ideas and candidates Friday in her speech at the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner.

The former senator and secretary of state chided Republican candidate Jeb Bush for saying that Americans need to work more hours. "Americans don't need lectures. They need raises," she said to applause.

She also hit Donald Trump, first with a joke: "Finally, a candidate whose hair gets more attention than mine!" Then she called Trump out for suggesting immigrants are criminals. "There's nothing funny about the hate he's spewing toward immigrants and their families. It really is shameful," she said. "And so is the fact that it took weeks for most of his fellow Republican candidates to stand up to him."

Clinton mocked Republicans for claiming they can't take a stand on climate change because they're not scientists. "I'm not a scientist either," she said. "I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain."

She drew some of her strongest applause for calling out Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad, a Republican, for recently vetoing millions of dollars for schools and a plan to keep open two mental hospitals he had decided to close. "Iowa families don't need a standoff. They need solutions," she said.

AT THE EVENT

QUOTE: "Trickle-down economics has to be one of the worst ideas of the 1980s. It is right up there with New Coke, shoulder pads and big hair."

BEST MOMENT: Clinton closed by talking about her vision for a strong, safe country and world for her granddaughter to grow up in. "I'm running to make our country work for you and for every American, the struggling, the striving and the successful. ... I am running for everyone who has been knocked down but refused to be knocked out."

AUDIENCE REACTION: As she took the stage, Clinton was greeted by chants of "Hillary, Hillary, Hillary," from her many fans in the crowd. She drew several standing ovations from large portions of the crowd.

California donors have given more to Clinton than all other presidential hopefuls combined //
LA Times // Kurtis Lee and Sahil Chinoy – July 17, 2015

California donors have provided strong backing to several candidates in the crowded field of Republican presidential hopefuls, although none have come close to the cash pile amassed here by Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former Hewlett-Packard Chief Executive Carly Fiorina raised significant chunks of their fundraising totals from donors dotting Orange County, the Central Valley and other traditionally Republican areas, according to fundraising reports the campaigns released this week.

California has long bankrolled presidential campaigns, and 2016 is shaping up to be no different.

The state's money has constituted 16% of all itemized contributions so far in the 2016 presidential race. That's more than any other state – followed by New York and Texas at 13% each, based on a Times analysis of fundraising reports.

The totals reflect only money given directly to candidates' campaigns – contributions that are limited to no more than $2,700 from each donor for the primary races. The really big contributions – to the "super PACs" that are theoretically independent from the campaigns, but in practice closely allied with them – won't be publicly disclosed until the end of the month.

Dollars given directly to a campaign can stretch farther than money raised by super PACs, in part because campaigns get a preferential rate for television advertising and in part because the money is directly controlled by the candidates, making it easier for them to focus their message and marshal get-out-the-vote efforts.

"The state is critical in presidential elections and will continue to be critical," said Paul Seamus Ryan, senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center, a nonpartisan group that tracks campaign finance and laws that regulate it. "California and New York are where the money is ... no question when it comes to national politics."

Both Rubio and Perry got 22% of their itemized contributions from California, $1.5 million in Rubio's case and just short of $219,000 for Perry.

Clinton has raised more than $8 million for her campaign committee in California so far, just over 20% of her total. Her campaign took in more from California than all the other presidential candidates combined.

Her strongest challenger, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a self-described socialist, raised $806,000 from the state – about 25% of his itemized haul.

Fiorina, a former California resident who ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate in 2010, is most dependent on California. More than 40% of her contributions came from the state.

By contrast, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has raised more than any of the GOP hopefuls, received less than 7% of his contributions from California. He has been in the state for several days this week raising money in Los Angeles and Silicon Valley.

Of Southern California's donations, 65% went to Clinton.

More than 40% of the money donated from California came from Los Angeles, and about 33% from the Bay Area, according to finance reports.

Among Republicans, Los Angeles and Bay Area donors supported Rubio the most, doling out $664,000 and $280,000 respectively to his campaign.

On the Democratic side, Clinton dominated both portions of the state, raking in $3.8 million in itemized contributions from Los Angeles and $3.1 million from the Bay Area.

Ryan, who works for the Campaign Legal Center, notes that the super PAC filings will be when many of the big-money donors are revealed, since these committees can receive unlimited contributions.

"A lot of campaign fundraising is being outsourced to super PACs because that's really where the money is raised," he said.

Clinton campaign rebuilds from a digital meltdown // LA Times // Michael A. Memoli – July 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton wound down her political operation in 2008 with 2.5 million email addresses in her campaign database. Seven years later, when campaign officials turned on the lights in April, they were stunned to find fewer than 100,000 still worked.

Campaign aides learned the bad news in much the same way a reunion organizer trying to reconnect with old friends might, albeit on a much larger scale: an in-box clogged with bounce-back messages on the day Clinton announced her campaign and sent messages to supporters.

The savvy tech strategy fueling Bernie Sanders' upstart 2016 campaign

The huge attrition of valuable data is not unique to Clinton -- a typical email list will lose 1 in 5 subscribers each year, said Jordan Cohen, chief marketing officer for Fluent, which specializes in email list acquisition. But it created one of the first big challenges for the campaign's growing digital team and sparked a response that illustrates the high priority campaigns now place on acquiring digital data.

"It wasn't like we all had time to retreat to a local bar and drown our sorrows," said Teddy Goff, the Clinton campaign's digital director – a role he also filled for President Obama's reelection campaign. "It was an instantaneous recognition on the part of a lot of us that we had a bigger challenge ahead of us than we realized."

Rebuilding that digital infrastructure became one of the most critical goals that campaign officials set this year, prompting what became known as the "Hillbuilder" program.

During the campaign's first all-staff meeting, on the day before Clinton's public campaign launch on Roosevelt Island in June, campaign manager Robby Mook identified building the email list as one of the top three goals in the year's third quarter. On the cubicle walls of the offices used by the digital staff, a sign asks: "What are you doing to grow the list today?"

In 2012, Obama's reelection campaign, which boasted 30 million addresses at its peak, raised $485 million – more than 40% of its total haul – through its endless, and often parodied, email appeals, according to a former campaign official who provided the internal fundraising data on condition of anonymity. The rest of the fundraising total was split equally between major donors and direct marketing through traditional mail and phone contacts.

Clinton and Bush lead in early campaign fundraising

Increasingly sophisticated methods for analyzing large amounts of data have made emails more and more valuable to campaigns, and not just as a vehicle for direct communication. The ability to track a user's online experience helps the campaign develop a profile that is then used to send more-targeted communications.

"The campaigns are looking at not just 'are they going to contribute $1, $10 when I send them an email,' but 'are they opening, are they clicking, are they forwarding this email to their friends. Are they taking the email and posting it onto social,'" Cohen said. "There is just inherent value in having engagement that will lead, hopefully, into votes."

The Clinton campaign's digital handicap wasn't limited to its email lists. The former secretary of State had no Facebook page, no Instagram account and only 3.3 million Twitter followers at her launch date (President Obama's campaign-run account has more than 60 million today, by comparison).

The campaign would not disclose how much its list has grown since April. But it has reached 5 million followers across its accounts on Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, LinkedIn, Spotify and Pinterest, officials said.

The campaign launched each of those platforms over the last few months, with a goal of reaching would-be supporters where they normally spend time online and creating a ripple effect that would expand their contact lists.

One early, successful tactic was to create a daily, rapid-response-style newsletter that supporters could subscribe to called "The Briefing," launched to coincide with a new book critical of the Clinton Foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign also sought to build suspense around the Roosevelt Island rally by promising exclusive details about the event to those who signed up on Clinton's website. And last week, Clinton emailed supporters inviting them to tell her when their birthdays are, so she – or her digital avatar, at least -- can send a note when the day arrives.

"We're part of a team together," the email read. "We're going to work hard and have a lot of fun through it all. Part of that is taking some time to celebrate and appreciate each other, and that's what I'd like to do on your birthday."

The idea, Goff said, grew out of the fact – attested to by her own, now public, emails – that Clinton has always gone out of her way to offer birthday wishes to those around her. A successful digital effort, he noted, depends on the authenticity of each communication.

"That's a true thing about her that reflects something that we think people are going to enjoy that can also be turned into an online program that's going to help us build our community," he said.

Expanding the digital infrastructure isn't just happening organically, of course. The campaign also engaged in more transactional efforts, including exchanging active contacts with the Ready for Hillary organization. They have also already spent $2 million on an online advertising campaign that has helped add names to the list.

"The core of what we're trying to do is serve people with an experience that they're going to enjoy, that's going to enlighten them and hopefully inspire them to get more deeply involved in the campaign," Goff said.

Hillary Clinton visits home in Windham // Eagle-Tribune // Breanna Edelstein – July 17, 2015

WINDHAM — Last night, Hillary Clinton brought her campaign to the Windham home of Susan and Henri Azibert. Several hundred locals gathered in the backyard of the 240 year old house in support of the presidential hopeful.

"This house was built the same year that the Declaration of Independence was signed," Henri Azibert said. "And we are honored to be hosting this event here tonight."

Clinton was introduced to the crowd by Laura Aguilar, the campaign's Salem-area organizer. She shared the story of her immigrant parents, their hard work and her resulting graduation from Harvard University two months ago.

"Secretary Clinton is fighting for the idea of getting ahead and staying ahead," Aguilar said.

Drawing on the theme of Aguilar's personal story, Clinton began the night by discussing, "the creation of a ladder that every American should have."

"The center of my economic plan would be raising incomes for the middle class," Clinton said. "Paychecks should reflect the hard work and productivity of Americans."

The crowd's applause was continuous as Clinton worked her way through a range of topics, from the heroin problem plaguing the Granite State, to worldwide climate change.

Michelle Hare and her daughter, Amanda Hare, who live two doors down from where the event was hosted on Lowell Road, went to show their support.

"This is the first time I'll be voting," said the 16-year-old. "And I'm very excited about that."

Her mother said, "tonight is a chance to show my daughter a good example of a strong woman."
Also in the crowd was State Rep. Benjamin Baroody, D-Hillsborough.

"She certainly knows how to campaign," he said. "I think she will follow in her husband's footsteps in that he didn't forget the people who got him places."

When Clinton wrapped up her speech and asked for any questions, almost every hand was raised. Clinton answered several questions about caring for veterans and seniors.
Tom Thibeault of Manchester has been one of Clinton's volunteers on the campaign trail.

"I'm a Vietnam veteran," he said. "So these issues hit close to my heart. New Hampshire is one of the only states without a VA hospital."

Thibeault was among many who got to express their concerns and pose questions to Clinton directly.

"Thank you for coming out here and talking to us like this," a spectator yelled.
Earlier in the day, Clinton's campaign hosted a similar event in Dover.

How Clinton and Bush Agree and Diverge on Workplace Discrimination // National Journal // Ronald Brownstein – July 17, 2015

As Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush took voters' questions on opposite coasts on Thursday, they sharpened a key difference between them in the next front of the gay-rights debate.

In a New Hampshire town hall, Clinton pledged that as president she would seek to pass federal legislation barring workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity; such legislation died in Congress two years ago. In a meeting with employees at a technology company in San Francisco, Bush declared flatly that he opposed such discrimination but then said the issue should be left to the states.

In November 2013, the Senate, then controlled by Democrats, passed the Employee Non-Discrimination Act (ENDA) that barred workplace discrimination against homosexual or transgender workers across the nation. But the legislation failed when the Republican-controlled House of Representatives refused to consider it.

Without a national standard on the issue, states have divided.

Currently, 22 states and the District of Columbia have passed laws barring workplace discrimination based on sexual orientation; 18 of those states and D.C. have mandated equal rights based on gender identity. The remaining states without laws ensuring equal workplace treatment include almost all of the Republican-leaning red states across the South, the Plains, and the Mountain West.

The sharp difference between Clinton and Bush over federal action makes clear that the recent Supreme Court ruling establishing a nationwide right to same-sex marriage is not likely to eliminate debate on issues relating to the rights of gay and transgender Americans in the 2016 general election. More broadly, it shows how Democrats, confident that they now command majority support, have taken the offense on most cultural differences between the parties.

Bush has generally sought to mute contrasts on questions relating to gay rights in the campaign's early stages. While Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker reacted to the Supreme Court decision by calling for a constitutional amendment that would allow states to ban gay marriage, Bush said he would not support an effort to overturn the decision (although he criticized the Court for reaching it).

Speaking Thursday in San Francisco at Thumbtack, a firm that helps consumers find services, Bush said flatly: "I don't think you should be discriminated because of your sexual orientation. Period. Over and out," as Time magazine reported. But when pressed by an employee who identified himself as gay about whether he would support legislation barring such discrimination in employment and housing, Bush said: "I think this should be done state by state, I totally agree with that."

Asked if that response meant Bush opposed federal legislation to provide workplace protections for gays and transgender workers, a campaign spokesperson said, "Governor Bush's answer speaks for itself. He believes this issue should be left to states."

By contrast, Clinton, at a town-hall meeting in Dover, New Hampshire, pledged to revive the federal legislation ensuring workplace protection for gay and transgender workers if elected. When a questioner who identified herself as a high school student asked Clinton what she would "do about anti-discrimination laws in the workplace," Clinton responded: "You put your finger on what the next big challenge is, and that is discrimination. And when I was in the Senate, I supported the ENDA law to end discrimination against people based in—those days, we used to say in sexual orientation. And I think we do have to do more to make sure we end discrimination in the workplace in particular."

Clinton continued: "So I am committed to that. I will work for that. And as president, I will do everything I can to get that enacted into law."

The Senate passed the ENDA law in 2013 with support from all 52 Democrats who voted, independents Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Angus King of Maine, and 10 Republicans, including Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire, Mark Kirk of Illinois, Rob Portman of Ohio, and Patrick Toomey of Pennsylvania—four incumbents in blue or swing states who are seeking reelection in 2016.

Can Hillary Clinton Really Get Away With Skipping Netroots? // National Journal // S.V. Dáte – July 17, 2015

PHOENIX, Arizona – The annual Netroots Nation conference has attracted thousands of liberal activists, the core of the Democratic Party's base, to the 100-degree-plus desert heat. It attracted its latest hero, Elizabeth Warren. It has attracted two Democratic presidential candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But someone it could not attract: Hillary Clinton, the person most likely to need its attendees' help at the top of next November's ballot.

"Major unforced error. Showing up is important," said Adam Green, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, which three years ago raised more than $1 million to help Warren win a Republican-held Senate seat in Massachusetts. "It's important that people address those whom they expect a lot from. So, it's unfortunate."

The Democratic presidential frontrunner is instead speaking at a state party dinner in Arkansas, where she was once first lady, but which is unlikely to go her way in 2016. "It wasn't working with her schedule," said Clinton's communications director Jennifer Palmieri. "There are lots of opportunities that we aren't able to do, but that (the Arkansas dinner) had already been locked in."

It's unclear what will be the long-term consequences, if any, of Clinton's choice. As the most dedicated of the party's activists, participants here are highly unlikely to support a Republican over Clinton, should she wind up the nominee. Yet her absence, and the hard feelings it is causing, once more point to Clinton's difficult relationship with her party's base.

Her last appearance at a Netroots conference was 2007. She was booed, in part over her vote supporting the Iraq war. Her problems with progressives that year created room for fellow Sen. Barack Obama to overcome her enormous advantages and win the nomination in 2008.

Eight years later, in her second run, a continued lack of enthusiasm for Clinton first led to an effort to persuade Warren to run for the White House, and is now fueling much of the excitement behind the huge crowds and impressive small-donor fundraising for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

"I love Bernie because he's a man of integrity," said Elizabeth Cloud, a 68-year-old retired schoolteacher who wore a Sanders button. She and the other 3,000 participants have shelled out an average $300 in registration fees, on top of travel expenses. "Hillary is a political animal," Cloud said. "I think she's a bit of a political opportunist."

Both Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley are scheduled to attend a Saturday morning "presidential town hall." Sanders added to his trip a campaign rally Saturday evening at the same Phoenix Convention Center venue, except, his campaign says, in a larger room to accommodate the expected crowd.

And Warren's appearance Friday morning had conference goers lining up for a half hour prior to her speech to get close-in seats, even though she has unequivocally said she is not running. When in her remarks she noted: "We have a presidential election coming up," a voice in the cavernous hall shouted "Run!" which brought prolonged applause.

The Clinton campaign has so far declined to discuss any of her Democratic opponents, other than to say it has always assumed it would face a competitive primary. Campaign officials also argue that Clinton is getting somewhat of a bum rap when it comes to her record.

They point out that in 2007, even before the financial crisis, Clinton pushed for a crackdown on the trade of subprime mortgages, favored regulating derivatives, and even introduced legislation on executive compensation.

"She has a long track record as a senator from New York," said Jake Sullivan, a senior policy adviser to Clinton's campaign and a former top aide to her when she was secretary of state. "I think there is a sort of general misunderstanding that somehow Sec. Clinton was silent on these issues in 2008 and now she's speaking about them."

Palmieri said Clinton also bears the burden of her husband's record. Many liberals believe former President Bill Clinton frequently abandoned the party's principles in order to gain and hold power, and Palmieri said people assume Hillary Clinton always shared his views.

"I think it's understandable why there's a tendency to go compare back to her husband's administration, but -- this is part of the point she's trying to make -- that was 20 years ago," Palmieri said. "A lot of the things that she advocates for, child care, paid leave, et cetera, the sort of workforce issues, are things that she's advocated for a long time."

As to the timing of Clinton's recent calls for changes to the tax code, criminal prosecution of Wall Street bankers who engage in fraud, or profit sharing, Palmieri said the speeches rolling out these ideas are part of a long-term plan, not a reaction to Sanders and Warren.

The Progressive Change Campaign's Green said he has been heartened to hear Clinton's new ideas, but is convinced the change in the Democratic Party was the main factor driving it. "That might be something that she genuinely believes, but it took shifts in the environment for her to get to that place," he said. "And that's why the activism that we're doing both on Capitol Hill and on the campaign trail as well as voices like Bernie Sanders are playing a critical role in moving the Democratic Party in an economic populist direction."

In any event, Green said, if Clinton can continue filling in the details on her new ideas, she will find a party base eager to listen. "I don't think people dislike her. People want to believe in someone, and are looking for her to embrace this economic populist moment in a real way," he said.

And many in attendance, while wishing Clinton had made an appearance and could be as full-throated a liberal as Sanders, allowed that they will enthusiastically support her when the time comes.

"I wish she was here, but I can kind of understand why she isn't," said Dee Austin, a Democratic researcher from Omaha, Nebraska. "To us, this is a really big deal. But she's a really big deal, too, and has got a lot of things to do.... I think we will support whoever the nominee is. If we're smart we will."

Iowa Democrats throw support behind Hillary Clinton as she prepares to meet rivals on stage // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON — Hillary Clinton rolled out endorsements from Iowa's only two statewide elected Democrats Friday morning, a show of strength in the Hawkeye State just hours ahead of the first time she'll share the stage with her primary rivals.

Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald threw their support behind Clinton, a boost in her quest to win the first-in-the-nation caucuses.

"Hillary Clinton is the candidate that is boldly speaking out on the fundamental issues facing our country and her progressive vision for our country is exactly what we need to keep our country moving forward," Fitzgerald said in a statement.

Miller said Clinton "will build an economy for tomorrow that raises incomes for working Americans."

The former secretary of State has held wide leads in recent polling of the state and nationally, though Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has been gaining hard on her in the last month.

The two will meet onstage Friday night in Cedar Rapids at the Iowa Democratic Party Hall of Fame celebration, the first time they've appeared publicly together since the campaign began.

Clinton is building a huge campaign team in Iowa, eager to avoid a repeat of her 2008 fate, when she was out-organized on the ground and finished a disappointing third place behind President Obama and then-Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.).

Hillary Clinton Returns To A Very Different Arkansas // NPR // Lauren Leatherby - July 18, 2015

Hillary Clinton and her husband, Bill Clinton, celebrate his victory in the Democratic runoff for Arkansas Governor on June 8, 1982 in Little Rock, Ark. Clinton defeated former Lt. Gov. Joe Purcell.

Hillary Clinton may find you can't go home again when she returns to Arkansas Saturday night.

The 2016 hopeful returns to Razorback State for the first time since she announced her second bid for president, keynoting the Arkansas Democratic Party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in Little Rock.

But the state is hardly politically recognizable to the one that first launched the Clinton name to national political prominence and where she served as first lady for 12 years.

After serving as the state's governor for a decade, Bill Clinton carried the state by wide margins in both the 1992 and 1996 presidential elections.

But that Arkansas is gone. As recently as 2008, the state had a Democratic governor, both senators were Democrats and so were three of the four House members. Today, in a total sweep, Republicans control the governor's mansion, the state legislature and every Senate and congressional seat.

"Just compare 2008 to 2012, and you'll leave the room with a windswept look," said Janine Parry, a political science professor at the University of Arkansas and director of the Arkansas Poll. "It's pretty wild. I keep wanting to measure it, but I'm 99 percent sure that no state at any time in history has made a transformation this dramatic this swiftly."

Unfortunately for Clinton, this change means if she wins the nomination, a general election win is likely out of reach in the place she called home for nearly two decades.

When matched up against a generic Republican presidential candidate in Arkansas, Hillary Clinton would only take home 33 percent of the vote, compared to 50 percent for the Republican nominee, according to a June 2015 poll.

Those numbers are a far cry from her well-loved husband's performance.

"[Bill Clinton] sits well within a long line of Arkansas politicians who are affable, accessible, smart, and they have extraordinary charisma," Parry said.

Though Hillary Clinton certainly still enjoys residual goodwill in the state, she had to work harder to enjoy the support that seemed to come naturally for her husband, a magnetic Arkansas native.

"I think it took some time for her to adjust to Arkansas and for Arkansas to adjust to her, but I think eventually that did happen to a considerable extent," said Hoyt Purvis, founder of the Fulbright Institute for International Relations at the University of Arkansas, who first met Bill Clinton when Clinton worked for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee as a Georgetown undergraduate.

More important, though, than the personality difference between Clinton and her husband is the wider political shift that has swept the South in the last few decades.

The South used to be home to the "yellow-dog Democrats" — voters who claimed they would rather vote for a canine than a Republican. Arkansas and the states of the Deep South went nearly a century without electing a Republican governor, and only nine of the 115 Senators who served in those states during the 20th century were Republicans.

Near the turn of the century, a new breed of Southern Democrats had emerged — Blue Dog Democrats who embraced more centrist positions on fiscal and social issues, often bridging the gap between the two parties.

But in 2014, Georgia Rep. John Barrow's loss marked the last of the once-powerful bloc of white Democrats representing the Deep South in the House. Republicans now control every governor's mansion and Senate seat from Texas to the Atlantic Coast, with the exception of Senator Bill Nelson from Florida.

For some time, even as its neighbors shifted to the right, Arkansas still clung to its Democratic roots. It was still represented by Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor and Gov. Mike Beebe until this year.

The state's eventual shift to the right may have been a long time coming, but Parry attributes the swiftness of its switch to two main factors: the effect of President Obama's presidency and the massive amounts of money in elections all the way down to the county level.

"Arkansas is overwhelmingly white and rural, and Barack Obama is neither of those things," Parry said. "He's just foreign to folks here, and they just can't identify. And that's particularly in a state where people are used to being able to identify with candidates."

Additionally, the increasing amount of money in politics has meant that elections that were once largely protected from fierce partisanship are now much more influenced by national politics.

For decades, Arkansas Democrats touted themselves as different from national Democrats, speaking a language that Arkansans understood. But the influx of national money into state politics in the past few years nationalized races in a way they could no longer overcome.

"Parties have become much more important," Purvis said. "I think what we've seen is that candidates in some cases got elected almost exclusively on the basis of if they had an 'R' after their name. It has just been a tidal wave of Republican support that has really taken hold in the last four or five years."

Despite the legacy of Arkansas Democrats setting their own course, the increased money flowing into the state has finally brought the national polarization to a state that had, for the most part, avoided it.

"Post-Citizens United, there has been really strategic investment by Republican allies," Parry said. "It's just completely changed the game so that Arkansas can't be the holdout that it was, and charisma and contact with the candidates just matters much less than it did now that you can have all these high-dollar advertisements and glossy flyers arriving in people's mail in Piggott, Ark."

A prime example of this is Republican Sen. Tom Cotton's overwhelming defeat of Pryor. The Democrat and his family had been longtime fixtures of the Arkansas political scene, and the Pryor name had been on Arkansas ballots for nearly 50 years. Even as recently as 2012, only 20 percent of Arkansans disapproved of his record.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An Arkansas native, Cotton had lived outside Arkansas — attending law school, working for law firms, management consulting, and serving in the military — for the majority of the years that Pryor was in the Senate.

As a House freshman, Cotton upset many Arkansans when he voted against federal funding for the Arkansas Children's Hospital and voted twice against the farm bill. It also ruffled feathers when Cotton skipped events like the Bradley County Pink Tomato Festival, often considered the unofficial kickoff of the Arkansas general election season.

Still, Cotton thumped Pryor in 2014 by 17 points.

"He was such a packaged, glossy campaign by the Republicans and by the well-endowed Republican allies that they could run someone who doesn't do all the things that Arkansans have demanded for 100 years from their candidates," Parry said. "And it wasn't even close. I think he's a really emblematic case of how much the state has changed and how quickly that's happened."

And it doesn't seem like the trend of Arkansas going red will reverse itself any time soon.

In addition to the changing party landscape of Arkansas, it doesn't help that many of Hillary Clinton's policy positions conflict with Arkansas residents' viewpoints. For instance, while Clinton embraced the Supreme Court's same-sex marriage decision, only 21 percent of Arkansans believe same-sex couples should be allowed to marry, according to 2014 polls.

Clinton still has plenty of friends in her former dwellings of Fayetteville and Little Rock, Ark., but don't count on her making many stops to see them on her campaign trail. Arkansas and its neighbors don't look to turn back to their blue roots anytime soon.

Hillary Clinton happy to hear Jeb Bush's Uber driver would vote for her // NY Daily News // Celeste Katz – July 17, 2015

Hillary uber Jeb.

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton cheered Friday after learning she's likely to score the vote of an Uber driver who chauffeured rival Jeb Bush in California.

"Thanks for the support, Munir!" the ex-secretary of state tweeted over a link to a story about Bush's Thursday journey to visit a startup company in one of the ride-hail hawker's cars.

Bush tweeted a photo of himself in San Francisco with Munir Algazaly at the wheel, reporting, "Rode shotgun in @Uber this morning to @Thumbtack here in SF. 5 stars for Munir."

Algazaly told reporters he hadn't realized the tall passenger who sat up front with him was the former Florida governor and 2016 GOP presidential hopeful.

The driver, who described himself as a 35-year-old Yemeni immigrant, said he doesn't usually vote, but would probably support Clinton, according to Time.

Hillary Clinton ignores Democratic primary opponents in first onstage appearance with them, slamming the GOP instead // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA - Hillary Clinton ignored her Democratic opponents in her first time sharing the stage with them Friday, focusing her ire on the GOP in a fiery speech aimed at showing she's ready to take the fight to the other side.

"I'm never going to let the Republicans rip away the progress we have made," she said to cheers from the 1,300 Democratic activists in the key early-voting state.

She made a point to call out her GOP opponents by name, with Donald Trump high on her hit list.

"Finally a candidate whose hair gets more attention than mine," she said to laughs. "But there is nothing funny about the hate he's spewing towards immigrants and their families."

Clinton, speaking alongside Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and their three other primary opponents, repeatedly sought to portray herself as the candidate of the future, pushing back on concerns that she's been around too long.

"We Democrats are in the future business... They may have some fresh faces but they are the party of the past," she said before accusing Republicans of sticking to economic policies that haven't worked since they were first introduced.

"Trickle down economics has to be one of the worst ideas of the '80s. It is right up there with New Coke, shoulder pads and big hair," she said to big cheers and laughs.

Clinton also slammed former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker on economic issues before hitting the GOP field for using the excuse that they're not scientists for refusing to say climate change is real.

"I'm not a scientist either. I'm just a grandmother with two eyes and a brain, and I'm not going to let them take us backwards," she thundered, drawing a standing ovation.

While Clinton ignored her opponents, some of them made some clear contrasts with her in a state where she finished a damaging third place three years ago. Iowa Democrats have long been more economically populist and dovish than the party as a whole, two areas where Clinton has at times struggled with the base.

Many of the others highlighted votes or early opposition to the Iraq War, an issue that was her undoing last time around, as well as their fights against the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a trade agreement hated by unions that Clinton has avoided taking a firm stand on.

Sanders has been coalescing liberal voters who aren't crazy about Clinton, and delivered a stem-winder that got strong applause.

"The greed of the billionaire class has got to end, and we're going to end it for them," he said to roars from his backers, some of whom clinked silverware against their glasses at every applause line to deafening effect.

But while his calls for a "political revolution" drew loud cheers from his supporters in the audience, many gave a more tepid response to some of his zingers, a sign of his appeal likely has a ceiling in the party.

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley got a big response from his speech as well a sign that he shouldn't be written off as a player down the line despite his poor standing in the polls and weak fundraising. He drew strong contrasts with Clinton, getting big applause.

"We didn't just talk about it, we got it done," he said before rattling off his accomplishments including raising the minimum wage, legalizing gay marriage and implementing gun control.

Doting Grandpa Bill! Former President Clinton Takes Baby Charlotte to an N.Y.C. Kids Concert / / People // Kathy Ehrich Dowd – July 17, 2015

He might be busy campaigning for his wife and making public appearances as a former President of the United States of America, but that doesn't mean Bill Clinton is too busy to squeeze in some granddaughter bonding time.

The former Leader of the Free World was spotted taking granddaughter Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky to a children's concert in Manhattan's Madison Square Park Thursday morning.

Clinton, 68, could be seen holding on to baby Charlotte, 9 ½ months, as the duo bopped along to the music of Songs for Seeds, a music class put on by Apple Seeds, an indoor play space mom Chelsea Clinton and daughter Charlotte enjoy.

"They were dancing along to the music, moving to the beat," says an observer. "He has the most present, positive energy and he was exuding that to her. He seemed like a very, very happy grandfather."

The sweet outing comes just after Clinton gushed about his role as grandpa during a Texas event alongside another former president and current grandfather: George W. Bush.

"When we started this program, he said to me that when you becomes a grandfather, you fall in love all over again," Clinton said while sitting next to Bush at the graduation of the inaugural class of the Presidential Leadership Scholars program in Dallas last week. "And that's what happened."

He also got giddy talking about how Charlotte reached a milestone that lit up his life.

"[Last night] my granddaughter – 9 ½ months – for the first time when I walked to her room, [Hillary] said "Oh, there's your granddad," and she turned around and pointed at me," said Clinton. "That was worth more than anything anybody has said or done."

Hillary Clinton's New York State of Mind // NY Observer // Will Bredderman and Jillian Jorgensen – July 17, 2015

Out-of-town reporters whined in advance about Roosevelt Island's supposed inaccessibility, but it might have been the ideal location for Hillary Clinton to launch her presidential campaign.

Four Freedoms Park offered the kind of green space typical of a more Middle American city as well as a plum view of Manhattan's skyline. More importantly, it gave Ms. Clinton ample opportunity to compare herself to Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the last president from New York.

In her speech, Ms. Clinton seemed at pains to evoke F.D.R.: from the location to her "Four Fights," which paralleled one of Roosevelt's most famous speeches.

The Broadway-worthy production raised questions that the Illinois-born Ms. Clinton has faced since she moved to Chappaqua in 1999: is she a New Yorker—and what does that mean for her candidacy?

"Of course she's a New Yorker," said attorney and Clinton fundraiser Jerry Goldfeder. "She lives here, she votes here."

But when she first arrived here to run for Senate, her presumptive opponent, Rudolph Giuliani, answered unequivocally "no." To underscore the point, Mr. Giuliani scheduled a fundraiser in Arkansas and asked locals whether they considered him an authentic Arkansan. But 16 years later, the architect of that stunt, former Giuliani aide Bruce Teitelbaum, has come around.

"Back then, I think people raised questions about her connections to New York, and about her reasons for moving to New York. Those were legitimate questions," he said. "Anyone who would raise those same questions today would be unfair and unreasonable. She's a New Yorker at this point in her life."

Political hands, including officials in early voting states, doubt whether Ms. Clinton's affiliation with New York will matter much to voters.

Tom Henderson, chairman of the Polk County Democrats, recalled watching Ms. Clinton declare Chicago her hometown when the Windy City hosted the Democratic convention in 1996. He argued that Ms. Clinton is not a product of New York or Illinois or Arkansas—or any state. "She's more cosmopolitan than that," he told the Observer, suggesting that Ms. Clinton's roles as first lady and secretary of state have elevated her above any one region.

Some experts said New York roots could prove a problem in New Hampshire—if you're a Republican. GOP candidates from our area run muscular state governments—causing them to struggle when wooing primary voters in libertarian New Hampshire.

But Democrats in New York aren't much different than Democrats in New Hampshire, said Dante Scala, author of Stormy Weather: The New Hampshire Primary and Presidential Politics. And if you asked a New Hampshire voter to list characteristics about Ms. Clinton, he thought New Yorker would be low on the list.

"She's much more of a national politician than a regional politician hoping to step up," Mr. Scala said, adding she's also a well-known entity to locals. "We've had Clintons up here campaigning for president for two decades, not just Hillary but Bill as well."

Ms. Clinton's persona, noted prominent Democratic pollster Mark Mellman, "transcends any one place."

Part of that transcendence might be her lack of a strong regional accent—something that distinguished her from Sen. Bernie Sanders, the Brooklyn native whose decades in Vermont have not dulled his Kings Highway inflections.

"This might be a problem for some politicians, who sound like a New Yorker … She doesn't," said Larry Sabato, founder of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics.

In this way, she again echoes Roosevelt, whose voice conveyed to a troubled nation a patrician paternalism—in contrast to the previous New Yorker to seek the White House, Gov. Al Smith. His accent, wrote Herbert Mitgang in the Times, "was no asset when he talked about 'woik' on the 'raddio.'"

"He was thought the embodiment of New York, and the campaign was something of a referendum on the city," historian Michael Wallace said by email of Smith. "His enemies saw Gotham as the anti-U.S.: an offshoot of Europe, home to Catholics, communists, Tammanyites, anti-prohibitionists, gangsters, blacks, Jews, a plethora of immigrants, religious liberals, feminists, antiracists."

New York's image is now rosier in the rest of the country. In fact, New York City repeatedly ranks atop the Harris' annual poll of cities Americans want to live in. But the city's toned-down image is also a less forceful presence on the national scene.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Mr. Wallace pointed out, "I don't think [Ms. Clinton's] identification with New York, if she chooses to stress that—which I doubt she would—would make a great deal of difference one way or the other."

Hillary Clinton's 'natural instincts' lean toward 'hiding the truth,' six in 10 voters say // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 17, 2015

Nearly six in 10 voters say former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton's natural instincts lean more toward hiding the truth, and a third say they lean more toward telling the truth, a new poll said.

Fifty-eight percent of voters said they believe Mrs. Clinton's "natural instincts lean toward hiding the truth," and 33 percent said they believe her natural instincts lean toward telling the truth, said a Fox News poll released Thursday.

Among Democratic primary voters, 61 percent said her natural instincts lean toward telling the truth, while 29 percent of Democrats said she's more prone to hide the truth.

Forty-seven percent of voters overall said Congress should continue to investigate her handling of the Sept. 11, 2012, terrorist attack on a U.S. consulate in Benghazi that claimed the lives of four Americans, while 49 percent said Congress should move on.

Mrs. Clinton, a 2016 presidential candidate, was still the first choice of 59 percent of Democratic primary voters, with Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont in second at 19 percent and Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr., who has not yet indicated his plans, in third at 8 percent.

Last month, Mrs. Clinton was at 61 percent to Mr. Sanders' 15 percent and Mr. Biden's 11 percent.

The survey of 1,019 registered voters was taken from July 13-15 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points, with a margin of error of plus or minus 5 percent for the smaller subset of Democratic primary voters.

Hillary Clinton's plan for the minimum wage: low on details, big on going local // The Guardian // Jana Kasperkevic – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton might have rolled out her economic policy on Monday, but many specifics of what she intends to do as president of the United States remain unclear. Among them: the federal minimum wage.

The former secretary of state and current frontrunner for the Democratic party's presidential nomination has so far declined to say what she thinks would be the ideal national minimum wage. While campaigning in New Hampshire this week, she implied that the ideal wage might differ depending on location.

"I support the local efforts that are going on that are making it possible for people working in certain localities to actually earn $15," Clinton said in a response to a question from a BuzzFeed News reporter on Thursday while campaigning in New Hampshire.

"I think part of the reason that the Congress and very strong Democratic supporters of increasing the minimum wage are trying to debate and determine what's the national floor is because there are different economic environments. And what you can do in Los Angeles or in New York may not work in other places."

Democrats in Congress have put forward proposals in the House and the Senate to raise the federally mandated minimum wage to $12 an hour by 2020. The federal minimum wage has been $7.25 since July 2009. While she has previously said that US wages need to be higher, Clinton has not yet revealed whether she is more inclined to support a national minimum wage of $12 an hour that of $15 an hour.

Among those opposing raising the federal minimum wage are businesses big and large. As she has campaigned the past few months, more than once Clinton has said she wants to be a small-business president, and referring the issue of minimum wage increases to local government could be just the way to win them over.

Other Democratic presidential candidates have a different approach.
"I strongly support the national movement to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour, because it will lift millions of families out of poverty and create better customers for American businesses," said former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley. "Some people will say this is hard to do. And it will be. But leadership is about forging public consensus – not following it. On this issue, we must lead with our progressive values to rebuild the American Dream."

Earlier this week, Vermont senator Bernie Sanders pointed out that he, too, supports raising the federal minimum wage to $15 an hour – an issue that he says Clinton "has not been quite so clear on".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And while Clinton might be taking heat from her own party, those on the other side share a similar sentiment – that the minimum wage should be left to the individual states. In March, while speaking at a campaign stop in South Carolina, Jeb Bush said that the raising of wages should be left to the private sector and local governments.

"We need to leave it to the private sector. I think state minimum wages are fine; the federal government shouldn't be doing this," he said.

"I'm sure, on the surface, without any conversation, without any digging into it, people say: 'Yeah, everyone's wages should be up.' But the federal government doing this will make it harder for the first rung of the ladder to be reached, particularly for young people. Particularly for people that have less education."

At that time, the Democratic National Committee criticized Bush for siding with big corporations instead of working families.

Berlin Rosen, a public relations consulting firm that represents the Fight for $15 movement and many of the working families that would be affected, declined to comment on Clinton's remarks when reached by the Guardian.

Shortly after, however, the agency issued a statement on a Thursday vote by the Kansas City council to raise the city's minimum wage to $13 an hour by 2020. The press release said that such an increase would not have happened without the Fight for $15 movement and added that $13 an hour did not go far enough.

"Even though $13 is a decent start, it doesn't go nearly far enough. Workers in Kansas City need $15 to support our families and we can't wait," Osmara Ortiz, who works at Burger King and earns $8.30 an hour, said in the press release. "Across the country, $15 is fast becoming the new baseline minimum wage."

Elizabeth Warren Challenges Hillary Clinton to Stop the Revolving Door // National Journal // David Dayen – July 17, 2015

At the Netroots Nation convention on Friday, Senator Elizabeth Warren delivered a direct challenge to Hillary Clinton and all Democratic presidential campaigns to support legislation that would end the "revolving door" between top government positions and corporate America.

"Anyone who wants to be president should appoint only people who have already demonstrated they are independent," Warren said to the progressive convention-goers, "who have already demonstrated that they can hold giant banks accountable, who have already demonstrated that they embrace the kind of ambitious economic policies that we need to rebuild opportunity and a strong middle class in this country."

This is the first time Warren has decided to engage in the presidential election, which activists tried for months to get her to enter. Instead of asking candidates to endorse one of her particular policies on bank reform or student loans, Warren is focusing on the personnel who will implement those policies. It's a notable choice that dovetails with Warren's interest in ensuring that executive branch appointments will not tip the scales in favor of Wall Street or private industry, seen most directly in the fight to block Antonio Weiss from the No. 3 position in the Treasury Department. Warren raised the profile of Weiss, a longtime bank executive, enough for the administration to revoke his nomination.

"Sure, laws matter. But it also matters who interprets those laws, who enforces those laws," Warren said. "Think of it this way: How would the world be different today if, when the economic crisis hit, Joe Stiglitz had been secretary of the Treasury and Simon Johnson and Robert Reich had been key economic advisers?"

Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, has struggled with a perception from the liberal wing of the party that she has close ties to Wall Street, fueled by big bank donations to the Clinton family foundation and speeches she's made at places like Goldman Sachs. While Warren doesn't mention Clinton by name, the implication is clearly to force her to embrace ending the revolving door.

Specifically, Warren challenged all presidential candidates to endorse a bill introduced this week by Senator Tammy Baldwin and Representative Elijah Cummings called the Financial Services Conflict of Interest Act, which would change a variety of ethics laws around presidential appointments. The bill would ban the golden parachutes for government service given by financial services firms to executives who leave for jobs in the White House or regulatory agencies. Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, and other firms have handed out these bonuses, which provide incentives for bank executives to get hired for positions regulating the industries they came from.

The Baldwin-Cummings bill would also increase prohibitions on former executive branch officials from lobbying the government, from one to two years. It expands "lobbying contact" to close loopholes and cover any lobbying activities. Finally, the bill requires executive branch personnel to recuse themselves from any official activities that would directly benefit their former employers, or clients they might have worked for as a lobbyist. "Wall Street insiders have enough influence in Washington already without locking up one powerful job after another in the executive branch of our government," Warren said.

While the Baldwin-Cummings legislation faces long odds of passage in a Republican Congress, they can serve as a model for an incoming Democratic President. Warren is trying to use those new rules as a benchmark of conduct, and signaling that she would work just as hard to torpedo any nominations that diverged from this standard.

Most recently, Warren has helped to stop the nomination of Keir Gumbs, a lawyer with corporate law firm Covington and Burling, whom the Obama administration sought to install on the five-member panel of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Gumbs ran a seminar for corporate clients on how to dodge taxes, in particular through shifting their headquarters overseas in a corporate "inversion."

The Obama White House has plucked many of its top regulatory officers from the corporate world, or from the Robert Rubin wing of the Clinton administration. It has been difficult for progressives and financial reformers to build an experienced bench, and often people like Warren have to play defense. But these anti-revolving door principles would provide a forcing mechanism for future presidents to look elsewhere to fill their administrations, such as academia or progressive advocacy organizations.

These issues aren't always a major focus of progressive activists, and Warren wants to change that. "The only way that candidates for president—or for any office—will slow down the revolving door, the only way candidates will say 'enough is enough' is if you—YOU—demand that they say it."

Adam Green of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee responded to Warren's remarks by saying they "offered a framework for how Democratic presidential candidates can promise to reduce Wall Street influence in key appointments." The PCCC added that they would "ask all Democratic presidential candidates to make specific commitments—and to make down payments on that promise by ensuring progressive economic thinkers are on their campaign policy teams."

Planned Parenthood Pours Cash to Clinton // Free Beacon // Bill McMorris – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton is the presidential candidate of choice for Planned Parenthood employees, according to campaign financial records released Wednesday.

The former secretary of state collected nearly $10,000 from nine individuals who work for the country's largest abortion provider, including from several high ranking executives at the billion-dollar operation. The first quarter fundraising total nearly matches the amount Clinton received over the course of her previous three political runs.

She received far more from Planned Parenthood employees than her Democratic rivals, the former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I., VT), the former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee, and the former Virginia senator Jim Webb. Webb, O'Malley, and Sanders have perfect pro-abortion voting records, while Chafee scored a 90, according to NARAL rankings. But Clinton raised 20 times as much money from Planned Parenthood employees. Sanders was the only other candidate to receive money from the abortion provider, garnering two donations totaling $500.

Vicki Cowart, the CEO of Planned Parenthood Rocky Mountains, Melissa Flournoy, the state director of Louisiana Planned Parenthood, and Catherine Valentine, general counsel for the San Jose-based Planned Parenthood Mar Monte, all contributed the primary maximum of $2,700 to Clinton's campaign. Clinton led the entire presidential field with more than $46 million in total fundraising.

The FEC disclosures were released one day after video emerged of a top doctor from Planned Parenthood discussing the harvesting of organs from aborted babies. The non-profit Center for Medical Progress released footage of a nearly three-hour lunch two activists had with Dr. Deborah Nucatola, who ate salad and sipped wine during the conversation.

The organization's president, Cecile Richards, apologized on Thursday for Nucatola's tone while defending the practice.

Nearly every Republican candidate, including the pro-choice former New York governor George Pataki, condemned the video and Planned Parenthood following the release. No Democratic candidate for president has publicly addressed the controversy.

Planned Parenthood has supported the Democratic party in the past. It poured $18 million into outside spending groups in 2014 and 2012, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Most of its nearly $6 million in direct contributions since 1990 have gone to Democrats. Every Democratic candidate except for Webb has benefitted from this cash influx at the federal level. Sanders and Chafee have received nearly $25,000 combined over the course of their careers.

The Washington Free Beacon reached out to the Clinton campaign asking whether the cash-rich frontrunner planned on returning Planned Parenthood donations, as she did contributions from the pornographer Larry Flynt. A spokesman did not respond to a request for comment.

Clintons Facilitated Donor's Haiti Project that Defrauded U.S. Out of Millions // Free Beacon // Alana Goodman – July 17, 2015

A federal agency rushed to approve funding for a Clinton donor's sham Haiti recovery project that ended up defrauding the U.S. government out of millions, according to court transcripts and internal government documents obtained by the Washington Free Beacon.

Miami businessman Claudio Osorio, who is currently serving 12 years in federal prison on fraud charges, leveraged his relationship with Bill and Hillary Clinton to help his company InnoVida obtain a $10 million loan from the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) for a Haiti housing project in 2010.

OPIC is an independent government agency that submits its annual budget requests through the State Department and works closely with the agency.

Bill Clinton helped arrange for a high-powered Florida law firm to represent Osorio during loan negotiations with OPIC, according to court testimony. An internal OPIC memo said Hillary Clinton was prepared to marshal State Department resources to assist with the donor's project.

InnoVida was supposed to use the funding to build houses in Haiti after the earthquake, but it defaulted on the loan and the homes were never built.

After InnoVida went bankrupt in 2011, a court-appointed investigator said it appeared that over $30 million of its funds had been diverted to foreign bank accounts and were not retrievable.

Osorio was later accused of using the company to run a Ponzi-like scheme, bilking government and private investors out of a collective $40 million and using their money to fund his lavish lifestyle—making payments on his Miami Beach mansion, buying a Maserati and maintaining his Colorado ski chalet.

He pleaded guilty to wire fraud and money laundering in 2013.

Much of the media coverage of InnoVida has focused on Jeb Bush's involvement as a consultant and board member. But previously unreported government documents and testimony from the 2013 fraud trial of InnoVida's chief financial officer reveal that Osorio's relationship with the Clintons played a central role in InnoVida's efforts to obtain OPIC funding for the house-building scam.

The OPIC official who helped approve the InnoVida loan wrote in a 2010 internal memo that "secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, has made available State Department resources to assist with logistical arrangements" for the project and "Former president Bill Clinton is personally in contact with the company [InnoVida] to organize its logistical and support needs."

The memo added that the Clinton Global Initiative had agreed to purchase "6500 homes in Haiti from InnoVida within the next year."

During the loan process, Osorio repeatedly emphasized his connections to the Clintons during conversations with OPIC officials, boasting about taking a trip to Haiti with the former president after the earthquake and telling an OPIC manager that he had a direct line to Hillary Clinton.

He also brought members of the Clintons' inner circle on board with the project. InnoVida brought on Jonathan Mantz, Hillary Clinton's 2008 finance director and currently the senior financial adviser at the Clinton-supporting Priorities USA PAC, to lobby OPIC for the loan. The company's board included Chris Korge, a top Clinton moneyman who has raised millions for them, and close ally Gen. Wesley Clark.

InnoVida also retained top Florida law firm Shutts & Bowen to help negotiate the loan agreement with OPIC.

An attorney at Shutts & Bowen testified that Bill Clinton asked the firm to represent InnoVida in the negotiations. One of the Clintons' top bundlers, Alexander Heckler, was a partner at the law group.

A spokesperson for Hillary Clinton did not respond to request for comment.

OPIC officials denied in court testimony that they approved the loan under political pressure. They also said they never tried to verify Osorio's claims that the Clintons were assisting him with the Haiti project, even after OPIC used this information to justify the loan approval and began dispensing millions of dollars to his company.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

InnoVida's loan request was approved by OPIC after just two weeks. The process typically takes months or years, agency officials testified. The loan was also approved before InnoVida had turned over its financial statements.

In a rare move, OPIC waived a requirement that the company provide an independently audited financial report up-front, even though Osorio had previously run a company that was sued for manipulating its stock prices.

The National Legal and Policy Center, a government watchdog group that has spent months investigating the documents related to this case, told the Free Beacon that it was "a textbook example of a corrupt pay-to-play scheme" and called for an investigation of OPIC.

"This case represents a new low in the misuse of public funds by Clinton allies," said NLPC chairman Ken Boehm. "There must be an investigation into why this Clinton donor was using a law firm recommended by Bill Clinton and one of Hillary Clinton's top fund raisers to improperly obtain millions from the Overseas Private Investment Corporation."

A spokesperson for OPIC did not respond to request for comment.

Osorio's relationship with the Clintons dates back to at least 2007. That fall, Osorio hosted a fundraiser for Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign at his Star Island mansion in Miami Beach. Bill Clinton gave a speech at the event and "explain[ed] to an audience that Osorio planned to build 10,000 houses at $5,000 apiece for impoverished Haitians," according to an NPR report.

Osorio contributed between $10,000 and $25,000 to the Clinton Foundation in 2009. His company InnoVida followed up with another $10,000 to $25,000 donation. The foundation returned the money in 2013, after a court-appointed receiver sued to recover funds for swindled investors.

InnoVida approached OPIC in late 2009 through its lobbyist Mantz, according to an OPIC email. Initially the company said it wanted the loan to build a panel manufacturing facility in Haiti. OPIC reportedly expressed interest in the idea, but InnoVida allegedly neglected to pay a $20,000 retainer and dropped out of contact that December.

On Jan. 13, 2010, the day after the earthquake in Haiti, Osorio reached out again to OPIC's renewable energy director Lynn Tabernacki, this time with a proposal to build houses on the island.

After that discussion, Tabernacki said her team rushed to approve the project, working "day and night and weekends to make sure that we followed all of our credit policies and procedures to get it done as quickly as possible."

Tabernacki helped InnoVida's chief finance officer write the loan application, telling him in a Jan. 19 email to "[p]lease let me know when you've finished so that I can immediately send it to our policy group."

Two days later, Tabernacki and another OPIC official flew to Miami to visit the InnoVida offices. During the meeting, Osorio reiterated to Tabernacki he was in close contact with Bill Clinton and that he had Hillary Clinton's "ear" at the State Department.

Five days later, on Jan. 26, Tabernacki sent a memo to her supervisors at OPIC requesting approval for the InnoVida loan.

She wrote that InnoVida was "well placed to support the recovery efforts in Haiti," noting its relationship with the Clinton Global Initiative and "U.S. persons of political influence that are able to assist in advancing the company's plans."

"Former president Bill Clinton is personally in contact with the company to organize its logistical and support needs," added Tabernacki. "[InnoVida board member] Wesley Clark is arranging for military transport of the initial structural panels. Steven Green (former CEO of Samsonite Corporation and former ambassador to Singapore) will provide barge space on ocean vessels, when necessary, to ship the factory components. And secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, has made available State Department resources to assist with logistical arrangements."

Tabernacki later testified that this memo was based on claims from Osorio, and she did not take any steps to corroborate the information. However, she said the part about Hillary Clinton was accurate.

"The Hillary Clinton aspect was true, because at that point, we had—not myself, but there were others within OPIC that had been making arrangements with the State Department for the activities that were going on the ground [in Haiti]," said Tabernacki.

InnoVida was the only company to receive an OPIC loan for a Haiti-related project in 2010, according to the agency's annual report.

Senior OPIC officials green-lighted the InnoVida loan the same day Tabernacki sent the approval request. At the time, the company had yet to turn over any financial statements. Lawyers for OPIC and InnoVida had still not negotiated certain contractual terms.

While OPIC typically requires companies to turn over audited financial information before receiving a loan, it granted InnoVida a six-month extension. The company turned over an unaudited financial statement—reportedly based on questionable numbers—on January 28, two days after the loan was approved.

Tabernacki testified that the agency expedited the approval process because it was trying to expand relief efforts in Haiti after the earthquake.

The defense attorney who cross-examined Tabernacki was not available to comment because he died shortly after the case ended. His client, InnoVida's CFO Craig Toll, was sentenced to four years in prison for his role in the company.

The NLPC said an investigation into OPIC is necessary.

"When a criminal like Osorio steals money meant for earthquake victims, the public is entitled to answers," said Boehm.

Hillary Clinton Doesn't Even Maintain an Office at Brooklyn Headquarters // Free Beacon // Morgan Chalfant – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton does not maintain an office at her campaign headquarters at 1 Pierrepont Plaza in Brooklyn, New York, electing instead to work exclusively out of an upscale midtown Manhattan office when she visits the state.

According to Politico, a recent tour of the two floors of office space occupied by the Clinton campaign in Brooklyn revealed that Hillary has no literal place in the headquarters despite the fact that the Democratic presidential candidate has demonstrated her enthusiasm for the less pricey New York neighborhood.

"Greetings from Brooklyn, USA!" Clinton tweeted in May, including a photo of her posing with a New York license plate with the lettering "BKLYNUSA." The campaign has also released video of Clinton introducing herself to Brooklyn residents as their "new neighbor."

However, the Democratic presidential candidate has forgone an office in the Brooklyn neighborhood for one in a Manhattan space near Times Square. The seven offices on the 27th floor of an office building on West 45th Street are paid for by the Clinton campaign, the rent for which amounts to about $25,000 per month.

She has visited the Brooklyn space a single time.

The midtown office also houses 10 to 15 campaign staffers, though the majority of individuals working on Hillary's presidential campaign — including chairman John Podesta and manager Robby Mook–hold offices and work regularly out of the Brooklyn office space.

The Clinton campaign, known for its frugality, has spent $18.7 million since its launch in April.

Clinton campaign fails to disclose bundler actively lobbying for Morocco // Free Beacon // Brent Scher – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign failed to list a registered lobbyist for Morocco in its legally required disclosure of all bundled fundraising done by lobbyists, according to a Washington Free Beacon analysis.

Edward Gabriel, who was named U.S. Ambassador to Morocco by former President Bill Clinton in 1997, now runs the Gabriel Company, a Washington, D.C., lobbying firm that has had the government of Morocco as a client since 2002 and has been paid more than $3.7 million by the nation since that point.

Though Gabriel appeared on a list posted to the Clinton campaign website on Wednesday afternoon of all the bundlers that have raised over $100,000, his name is absent from documents filed to the Federal Election Commission listing all the other registered lobbyists that have been fundraising for the campaign.

All contributions bundled by registered lobbyists must be disclosed to the FEC each quarter.

A search conducted on Friday afternoon using the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA) database found that the Gabriel Company is still an active registrant. Edward Gabriel signed its most recently filed continuation. FARA requires all groups hired to lobby on behalf of a foreign government to register with the Justice Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gabriel was one of the many listed members of Clinton's National Finance Committee that had raised over $100,000 for the campaign. He also contributed to the Clinton Foundation, to which he has contributed as recently as 2014 and given between $100,001 and $250,000.

Although the fact that Gabriel has been fundraising for the campaign was disclosed through her campaign website provided list, significantly less information is made available on that list than would be made available through the FEC filing.

The list of "Hillblazers," as the campaign has dubbed them, only provides a name and a city of residence without disclosing any information about how much each has raised. Each entry on the FEC filing of lobbyist bundlers, however, is required to include name, address, employer, and the exact amount that has been raised.

Gabriel is not Clinton's only bundler that is registered to lobby for foreign governments.

It was reported on Thursday by Buzzfeed's Andrew Kaczynski that two of Clinton's listed bundlers, Matthew Bernstein and John Merrigan of DLA Piper, are also both registered to lobby for foreign governments. Bernstein has lobbied for the United Arab Emirates and the German State of Rheinland-Pfalz, while Merrigan is registered to lobby for the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia.

Both Bernstein and Merrigan are listed on Clinton's official FEC disclosure.

The Clinton-Gabriel relationship extends to before he was named ambassador in 1997. Gabriel was a donor to Bill Clinton's 1996 presidential campaign and maxed out his contributions to Hillary Clinton's failed presidential campaign in 2008.

Money from Morocco has flowed toward the Clintons as well. On the day that Clinton announced her current presidential campaign, it was reported that the Clinton Foundation would be paid at least $1 million to hold a May event in Marrakech.

The event was paid for by OCM, the state-owned energy company that is despised by many in Morocco.

"Hillary Clinton sold her soul when they accepted that money," a former miner for the company told Politico's Ken Vogel in Morocco. "We are concerned that if Hillary Clinton wins the presidency of the United States of America, she will take the side of Moroccans even more."

The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment.

PolitiFact: Hillary Clinton addressed financial regulations early in crisis // Tampa Bay Times // Lauren Carroll – July 17, 2015

The statement

Says she "called for addressing risks of derivatives, cracking down on subprime mortgages and improving financial oversight" early on in the financial crisis.

Hillary Clinton, July 13, in remarks in Manhattan

The ruling

Clinton used to be the senator from New York, the home of Wall Street. She has a history of campaign backing from the finance industry and of delivering high-priced speeches to finance firms, such as Goldman Sachs. And her husband, former President Bill Clinton, signed the repeal of a bank break-up bill, the Glass-Steagall Act — a deregulation that some critics think contributed to the financial crisis.

So we questioned Hillary Clinton's record of addressing financial regulations. Did she address derivatives, subprime mortgages and financial oversight so early in the crisis?

While the financial crisis came to a head in summer 2008, problems with housing started to bubble up in 2007 during Clinton's ill-fated presidential primary campaign. On the trail, Clinton addressed these nascent issues — particularly the mortgage crisis — as early as March of that year.

Clinton, still a senator at the time, delivered a speech on the volatility of the subprime mortgage market on March 15, 2007. She said too many people were ignoring warning signs.

"The subprime problems are now creating massive issues on Wall Street," Clinton said. "It's a serious problem affecting our housing market and millions of hard-working families."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She gave specific proposals for addressing subprime mortgages, including expanding the role of the Federal Housing Administration, more borrowing options for underprivileged and first-time home buyers, more safeguards against predatory lending practices and policies intended to prevent foreclosures.

In August 2007, she delivered a similar speech about dealing with problems from subprime mortgages. There, she reiterated earlier proposals, and also suggested laws establishing national standards and registration for loan brokers, as well as regulations on lenders.

"I think the subprime market was sort of like the canary in the mine," she said. "You know, it was telling us loudly and clearly, 'There are problems here.' "

It didn't become law, but Clinton sponsored a bill to implement these policies in September 2007.

The first time she mentioned derivatives was in a November 2007 speech in Iowa. (A derivative is a financial product that allows investors to hedge against price fluctuations in an underlying asset.)

"We need to start addressing the risks posed by derivatives and other complex financial products," she said. "You can't let Wall Street send the bill to your street with the bright ideas that just don't work out. Derivatives and products like them are posing real risks to families, as Wall Street writes down tens of billions of dollars in investments. Companies are taking the loss of a billion here and a billion there simply because the securities they own are worth less than they thought."

In the same speech, she spoke again of the risky lending that led to the subprime mortgage crisis, adding that she called on then-President George W. Bush to convene a conference to find a solution.

And she also pushed for more oversight of financial markets: "So as president, I will move to establish the 21st century oversight we need in a 21st century global marketplace. I will call for an immediate review of these new investment products and for plans to make them more transparent."

At the tail end of her campaign, in March 2008 — still before the financial crisis hit a peak later that summer — Clinton released a six-point plan to increase financial regulation. The plan included, in part, more oversight of derivatives and other new financial products, establishment of mortgage standards and strengthening of some consumer protections.

After becoming secretary of state in 2009, Clinton made noticeably fewer comments on domestic policy and financial regulation. But the record shows that establishing policies to address the then-nascent financial crisis was a key point of her campaign platform in 2007 and 2008.

We rate her claim True.

Clinton's campaign claims to be small donor driven; facts show otherwise // Daily Caller // Derek Hunter – July 17, 2015

In an email to supporters, John Podesta, Hillary Clinton's campaign chairman and founder of the pro-Clinton Center for American Progress, warned Republicans were out-fundraising the former secretary of state.

Podesta also declared the campaign to be under "a ferocious onslaught of dark money" from Republicans, but that Hillary is funded by grassroots Americans who've "chipped in $1, $5, or $10." An examination of the facts shows something different.

The email, under the subject line: "A ferocious onslaught of dark money," says, "Republicans are out-raising us 4 to 1. If we win the Democratic nomination for president and this pace keeps up, we are in for a ferocious onslaught of dark money, regardless of who the nominee is on the other side." But what does that "4 to 1″ margin mean?

The Clinton campaign took in $46.7 million in its first quarter of existence, no small sum. Even NBC News called it a "Huge Fundraising Haul." The next highest total for a campaign was another Democrat, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders raised $15 million. Sen. Marco Rubio came in third with $12 million. So where does the "4 to 1″ come from? Turns out it's creative math.

The Clinton campaign combined the totals each of the current top-tier Republican campaign raised, $53 million, with the money raised by Super PACs associated with them, $203 million, for a total of $256 million for the GOP. Clinton's super PACs raised $24.3 million. If you add that to her total, as she does with the GOP, her total is $71 million. That's roughly 3 to 1, not 4 to 1, but it's still a false number.

The Clinton camp combines all the money raised by GOP candidates, but ignores the money raised by Sanders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If you add in the money Sanders raised, the Democrats' total increases to $86 million, closer to 2.5 to one. But Clinton's team created a false equivalence — one against all. Clinton's campaign, by itself, has raised more than the top four GOP candidates combined — $46 million to $43 million.

The Clinton email also attempts to give the impression of a grassroots movement. It reads, in part:

> We're running a different kind of race. More than 250,000 people have chipped in $1, $5, or $10 because they care enough about this election to have a financial stake in it.

The wording is a deliberate attempt to mislead the reader into thinking the Clinton campaign is funded by small dollar donors, average Americans simply "chipping in" what they can. But again, math tells a different story.

If each of Clinton's 250,000 donors "chipped in" all the low dollar amounts listed in the email — $1, $5, $10, for a total of $16 each — that would total $4 million. That leaves $42 million unaccounted for.

The Washington Post reports only 17 percent of Clinton's haul, or $7 million, came from donations of $200 or less, which leaves $39 million from high dollar donors. Not exactly the grassroots "different kind of campaign" Podesta is telling supporters.

Add further fudging to the numbers, the New York Post reported the Clinton campaign made concerted effort to attract $1 donations from as many people as possible to dilute the high dollar donor numbers.

17 Things Hillary Says She Will Change About the Economy // Newsweek // Ken McIntyre – July 17, 2015

In a speech designed to float ideas for raising incomes for "hardworking Americans," Hillary Clinton says she'd make some changes if elected president.

Clinton, considered the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, used her appearance July 13 at the New School in New York's Greenwich Village to outline an economic message organized by what she called "strong growth," "fair growth" and "long-term growth."

"We can't create enough jobs and new businesses without more growth, and we can't build strong families and support our consumer economy without more fairness," she said, adding:

> The defining economic challenge of our time is clear: We must raise incomes for hardworking Americans so they can afford a middle-class life. We must drive strong and steady income growth that lifts up families and lifts up our country.

Much of what Clinton advocated—from family-friendly leave to equal pay for women—reflected familiar liberal or progressive goals, including tweaks of programs installed by President Barack Obama.

Here are 17 specific things the former first lady and secretary of state said she would do if she returns to the White House as president:

1 Achieve "comprehensive immigration reform" as an engine of growth. "Bringing millions of hardworking people into the formal economy," she said, "would increase our gross domestic product by an estimated $700 billion over 10 years."

2 Set up an "infrastructure bank" that channels public and private funds to finance "world-class airports, railways, roads, bridges and ports."

3 Spend more on "scientific and medical research that spawns innovative companies and creates entire new industries."

4 Provide "quality, affordable child care" as a "growth strategy." Clinton said it could be done "in a way that doesn't impose unfair burdens on businesses—especially small businesses."

5 Change "the current rules for our economy" so that jobs such as "actually building and selling things" don't pay so much less than work such as financial trading. She would not only raise the minimum wage but "go further," Clinton said. "I'll crack down on bosses who exploit employees by misclassifying them as contractors or even steal their wages."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6 Propose ways to “encourage companies to share profits with their employees.”

7 Ensure that tax reforms target “hugely successful companies,” which “should not be able to game the system and avoid paying their fair share.” She decried the fact that “companies who can’t afford high-price lawyers and lobbyists end up paying more.”

8 To reverse the decline of unions in the private sector, “stand up to efforts across our country to undermine worker bargaining power.”

9 Ensure that, in the next 10 years, every 4-year-old has access to “high-quality preschool.” She added, “I want to call for a great outpouring of support from our faith community, our business community, our academic institutions, from philanthropy and civic groups and concerned citizens, to really help parents, particularly parents who are facing a lot of obstacles.”

10 To revitalize poor neighborhoods, embrace conservative ideas such as “reviving the New Markets Tax Credit and Empowerment Zones” to create greater incentives for private investors.

11 Promote “clear-eyed capitalism,” which she said is not charity. “Many companies have prospered by improving wages and training their workers that then yield higher productivity, better service and larger profits.” One proposal: a $1,500 apprenticeship tax credit for every worker trained and hired by an employer.

12 Change capital gains taxes “to reward longer-term investments that create jobs more than just quick trades” and propose other ways “to help CEOs and shareholders alike focus on the next decade rather than just the next day.”

13 Impose regulations on financial institutions that “go beyond Dodd-Frank” and “rein in excessive risks” identified by the government. “Too many of our major financial institutions are still too complex and too risky,” she said.

14 Appoint regulators “who understand that [the philosophy of] ‘too big to fail’ is still too big a problem” and who will “ensure that no firm is too complex to manage or oversee.”

15 Prosecute individuals and companies suspected of fraud or “other criminal wrongdoing” and funnel any recovered damages into a trust fund “to benefit the public.”

16 “Make sure Washington learns from how well local governments, business and non-profits are working together in successful cities and towns across America.”

17 “Drive progress” without passing bills and making rules. “As president, I’ll use the power to convene, connect and collaborate to build partnerships that actually get things done.”

Nah-nah: For Clinton, 'It's easy to get attention in mainstream media' // Washington Examiner // Paul Bedard – July 17, 2015

Not that they're bragging or anything, but Hillary Clinton's campaign team says it's so easy to get the attention of the mainstream media that they are also focusing now on getting the eyeballs of the rest of America that doesn't follow the general press.

While most other candidates are media-starved, Clinton's campaign spends much of its time fielding questions from big city newspapers and network TV. The coverage was so heavy during July 4, for example, that a rope was used near the candidate to prod reporters along.

At a media breakfast this week hosted by the Christian Science Monitor, campaign communications boss Jennifer Palmieri said with such a wealth of mainstream media coverage, the challenge is getting others not plugged in to pay attention.

"The folks around this table are particularly focused on our campaign, there's a lot of interest, so it's easy to get attention in the mainstream media world and that's a big part, a majority of what we do," she told the reporters.

"But you can't just talk to audiences following mainstream media and think you've done your job, so I don't look at as going around the media, you just can't talk to just the media and not utilize these other platforms," namely social media, she added.

Not so for so many other candidates, especially among the second tier of 15 GOP candidates.

Take former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum for example. He won the 2012 Iowa straw poll and was among the last to challenge Mitt Romney for the Republican nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When he did the same breakfast this week, he arrived on foot with just one aide, no ropes. And about a third of the number of reporters showed up to hear the presidential candidate than Clinton's aides.

Santorum said he is confident, but wouldn't mind a little more press coverage. He spoke the truth about the impact of the media:

"What's driving national [poll] numbers is news coverage, that's what drives national numbers. If you folks had written as many stories about Jeb Bush as you have Lindsey Graham, my guess is that Bush's numbers wouldn't be anywhere near what they are today," he said.

How often do Clinton campaign staffers really ride the bus? // Washington Examiner // Ariel Cohen – July 17, 2015

Despite reports that Hillary Clinton's campaign is skimping on transportation costs by relying on buses, Federal Elections Committee reports show that the Democratic front-runner's campaign spent more money on train rides and air travel.

In this first quarter of the election cycle, the Clinton campaign spent $42,397.98 on Delta airline trips, $8713.10 on Amtrak rides, but only $661 on bus rides from Best Bus and BoltBus. The FEC fact sheet showed no Greyhound trips, MegaBus rides or jaunts on the Vamoose Bus.

In early June, the Washington Post published a story reporting the Clinton campaign was making an effort to cut costs by sending stafferson buses between their New York City and Washington, D.C., offices. The piece was headlined "How Cheap is Hillary Clinton's campaign? This cheap." Reporter Anne Gearan rode the Vamoose bus from NYC to D.C. with Clinton campaign Chairman John Podesta, as he spoke of how "staffer must schlep on the bus."

"The expectation is that if you're going to D.C., you're supposed to take the bus," press secretary Brian Fallon said in the article.

But the average bus ticket from D.C. to NYC is $30, so at $661, the Clinton campaign appears to have only paid for about 11 bus tickets over the past two and a half months.

The Clinton campaign says these numbers don't tell the whole story, however.

"The low cost of a bus ticket is both the reason we encourage staff to take it and the reason it doesn't add up as quickly as significantly more expensive train tickets.," Hillary for America spokesman Josh Schwerin told the Washington Examiner. "Bus tickets are so cheap they don't always meet the threshold of being itemized expenses on a report and staffers can also be reimbursed for their travel rather than the campaign paying the vendor up front."

In 2008, Clinton's campaign was criticized being too flashy, using devices such as the "Hill-a-copter" to transport the candidate between events. This time around, the campaign chose a black van, fondly referred to as "the Scooby Van," to transport Clinton around states.

This time around, the campaign has boasted a more tight-fisted image. A late June New York Times article described lower level staffers having trouble finding an apartment and paying rent in New York City, where Clinton's headquarters are located. A recent email to donors begged supporters to open up their homes to staffers with "a spare room — or just a spare couch!" as they struggle to find affordable housing on the Clinton payroll.

Bill Clinton to attend Starkey gala in St. Paul honoring George W. Bush // MinnPost // Joe Kimball – July 17, 2015

President Bill Clinton is now on the guest list for the July 26 Starkey Hearing Foundation Gala in St. Paul. He joins President George W. Bush, who is being honored at the annual event this year for his contributions to the foundation's charitable work.

Katy Perry is the headline entertainer at the event at St. Paul's RiverCentre, which always features many celebrities. Last year, it raised nearly $9 million.

Foundation officials say Bush helped provide customized hearing devices to 222 people in Tanzania.

In announcing that Clinton will attend next week's gala as a special guest, officials said he'd been honored by the foundation in 2011 and that he has joined many global hearing missions, including work in Zambia, Rwanda and Kenya.

New institute to carry on work of HIV pioneer and MH17 victim Joep Lange // Science Magazine / / Martin Enserink – July 17, 2015

AMSTERDAM—One year ago today, the missile attack on Malaysia Airlines flight 17 (MH17) ended the life of Joep Lange, a towering figure in the world of HIV/AIDS and global health. But Lange's work will live on in a new institute that aims to bring his characteristic combination of research and on-the-ground action to bear on health problems in developing countries.

The Joep Lange Institute was formally announced on Wednesday, along with a new, rotating chair and fellowship program at the Academic Medical Center, where Lange was a professor and founded the Amsterdam Institute for Global Health and Development. The new institute will open its doors in Amsterdam later this year, supported by some $20 million from various private sources in the United States. A spokesperson declined to name these benefactors but says they will be announced later this year. The Joep Lange Chair and Fellows program will be partly funded by the Dutch Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Lange died while traveling to an international AIDS conference in Melbourne, Australia, along with his partner and co-worker Jacqueline van Tongeren and 296 other people on board MH17. Their plane was shot down in eastern Ukraine while en route from Amsterdam to Kuala Lumpur.

In the global health community, Lange is remembered as a scientist who didn't just study problems but also tried to solve them. For instance, he was instrumental in convincing pharmaceutical companies in the mid-1990s that a cocktail of drugs was the best way to fight HIV, said David Cooper, the head of the Kirby Institute for infection and immunity in society in Sydney, Australia, in an interview last year with ScienceInsider.

Once those cocktails had proven successful and had been widely introduced in Western countries, Lange became a passionate and effective advocate for bringing them to the millions of HIV-infected people in developing countries, which many at the time deemed impractical or impossible. In a video tribute released on Wednesday, former U.S. President Bill Clinton recalled that Lange was one of the first partners of the Clinton Health Access Initiative, with programs to dramatically increase access to HIV medication in South Africa and Tanzania.

In the last decade of his life, Lange became interested in increasing access to health care in general—by setting up health insurance plans in Africa, for instance—and driving down poverty. "Joep was a true hero in the world of health and development. Always ahead of this time, always a driving force for innovation and inclusive economics," Clinton said. "I am very grateful for the creation of the Joep Lange Institute so that his legacy will live on."

Four others involved in the fight against HIV, all headed for the Melbourne meeting, died a year ago: Glenn Thomas, a spokesman for the World Health Organization; Pim de Kuijer and Martine de Schutter, who both worked for STOP AIDS NOW!, a Dutch advocacy group; and Lucie van Mens, an advocate for the use of female condoms at the Female Health Company.

O'Malley-aligned super PAC hiring dozens of organizers in Iowa // WaPo // John Wagner - July 17, 2015

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is joined by his wife Katie O'Malley as he announces his intention to seek the Democratic presidential nomination during a speech in Federal Hill Park in Baltimore on Saturday, May 30. (Jim Bourg/Reuters)
A super PAC backing Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley says it has hired nearly 50 staffers so far to do on-the-ground organizing in Iowa and could add as many as 100 more in advance of the state's first-in-the-nation caucuses.
Ron Boehmer, a spokesman for the Generation Forward PAC, said the effort will include knocking on doors, phone banking and holding events to promote O'Malley's candidacy -- functions typically taken on by a campaign itself.
By law, the super PAC can't coordinate with O'Malley's campaign, so there is bound to be some overlap as the group's activities get underway later this month, Boehmer said.
"Our view is that if people get touched by both us and the campaign, that's positive," he said."Every campaign in Iowa will be working to find caucus voters, build a relationship with them and get them to caucus for their candidate. O'Malley will have two organizations working to do that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowa is crucial to the fate of the former Maryland governor, who in early state polls is lagging far behind Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). O'Malley's campaign is counting on a much stronger-than-anticipated showing in Iowa to propel his candidacy forward early next year.
In a memo to "interested parties" released Friday, Jake Oeth, O'Malley's Iowa director, argued that his candidate would be well-positioned in the state because of the amount of time O'Malley is spending on "retail politics, where a hand-shake and an honest conversation matter far more than even the largest rally." Oeth said that by the end of summer, O'Malley's campaign will have "hired staff across the state, who call thousands of Iowans and meet one-on-one with caucus goers every day."
Generation Forward is led by several relatively young supporters and former staffers of O'Malley. The group has not disclosed how much it has raised so far. O'Malley's campaign reported taking in a relatively modest $2 million during the first month after formally declaring his candidacy.
Unlike campaign organizations, super PACs can accept unlimited contributions from donors.
Boehmer, a former O'Malley press aide, said the PAC has already opened an office in Des Moines and is planning to open at least two additional offices, in Cedar Rapids and Iowa City.
O'Malley was in Iowa on Thursday promoting a plan on immigration that he released earlier this week in New York. On Friday night, he plans to speak at a Democratic dinner in Cedar Rapids along with four others seeking the party's nomination: Clinton; Sanders; former Virginia senator Jim Webb; and former Rhode Island governor and senator Lincoln Chafee.
Generation Forward plans a late-night social gathering nearby that will include live music, an open bar and desserts, Boehmer said.

Martin O'Malley finances: Solid pensions, modest assets // AP // Jeff Horwitz - July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley's time in public office in Baltimore and Maryland has left him with limited assets but valuable public pensions, according to new financial and tax records O'Malley released Wednesday.
O'Malley and his wife, Catherine Curran O'Malley, a district court judge in Baltimore, have earned solid salaries in recent years as public officials, together bringing in nearly $270,000 in wages last year, supplemented by an additional $61,000 in pension payments stemming from O'Malley's sixteen years as a Baltimore mayor and councilman.
O'Malley will begin collecting in 2018 an additional pension from his time as governor — which will be $90,000 a year based on the current governor's salary. As a state judge, his wife is also in line to eventually receive a pension as well. O'Malley's pensions alone, converted into the form of an annuity, would be worth well over a million dollars.
But the O'Malleys have little savings aside from their pensions, a circumstance that his campaign said reflects the cost of Catholic school for the couple's four children and college tuition for two of them so far. O'Malley's financial disclosure lists at least $300,000 in student loan from the children's education.
"They made sacrifices and took on debt to invest in something they really believe in - the best education possible for their daughters," spokeswoman Haley Morris wrote in an e-mail.
In addition to the educational debt, the O'Malleys list a personal line of credit between $100,000 and $250,000, and a mortgage of undisclosed size. Other public records indicate O'Malley took out a 30-year mortgage for $494,100 in December 2014 for the family's Baltimore home, which they purchased for $549,000.
By law, presidential candidates must file a statement of their finances with the Federal Election Commission — but O'Malley additionally released the last five years of tax returns. Both the relatively straightforward nature of the O'Malley's finances and the release of the tax returns contrast with the disclosures by Hillary Rodham Clinton, the heavily favored contender for the Democratic nomination.
Since leaving office, O'Malley has more than replaced his salary as governor with fees from speaking engagements, a salary for a visiting professorship at John Hopkins and a seat on the board of directors of Barcoding Inc., a Baltimore-based technology company. Speaking fees account for the majority of that income, with fees ranging from $5,000 for an event hosted by JetBlue to $147,000 for a series of speeches delivered to Environmental Systems Research Institute Inc., a California-based geo-location and data company. During his time as Baltimore's mayor, O'Malley championed the increasing use of such data to guide government services and policy decisions.
O'Malley's speaking-fee income — while lavish by most Americans' standards — pales next to that of Bill and Hillary Clinton. Hillary Clinton's financial disclosure form, released in May, showed that the Clintons earned more than $25 million in speaking fees since the beginning of 2014.

Super Pac backing Democrat Martin O'Malley could have 150 staffers in Iowa // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – July 17, 2015

A Super Pac supporting former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley's campaign for the Democratic party presidential nomination could have more than 150 staffers on the ground in Iowa.

Ron Boehmer, a spokesman for Generation Forward, a pro-O'Malley Super Pac confirmed to the Guardian that his organization had already hired 45 staffers to do on-the-ground organizing for the Iowa caucuses and was planning on hiring between 50-100 more staffers in the state.

The group has already opened an office in Des Moines and is planning to open at least two more offices in Cedar Rapids and Iowa City on behalf of the underdog Democrat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boehmer told the Guardian that while they can not legally coordinate with the O'Malley campaign, they are not worried about duplicating efforts. He thought it wouldn't be a problem "if we [contact] people two or three times and not just once.". Boehmer maintained "we're not doing robo calls, we're going up and having conversations" which will not hassle or bother Iowa Democrats.

The question is how that interaction between the campaign and the Super Pac will work. O'Malley has already built a strong and well-respected campaign apparatus in Iowa and led by experienced operatives and there are major two parallel campaigns supporting the same candidate to work in tandem without legally being allowed to communicate. An O'Malley spokesperson said the campaign was not affiliated with the outside group and declined to comment further.

In an op-ed in Thursday's Des Moines Register, Generation Forward's chief executive Damian O'Doherty described the group as one that "won't be focused on the Super Pac politics of the past". Instead, he pledged that "rather than thinking about what a Super Pac can do, we want to show what a Super Pac should do".

Generation Forward would not disclose how much money it had raised in advance of the 15 July deadline for campaigns to disclose money. This was a step taken by the Super Pac's affiliated with a number of other presidential campaigns. O'Malley had a relatively disappointing fundraising quarter, raising just over $2m, $13m less than Bernie Sanders and $43m less than Hillary Clinton. Only 4% of O'Malley's donations came from small donors.

The Iowa caucuses are currently scheduled to be held on 1 February 2016 and O'Malley currently polls at around 3% among likely Democratic caucus-goers.

Martin O'Malley: US should 'probably' arm Kurdish forces against Isis // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs - July 17, 2015

Martin O'Malley on Thursday appeared to differ from the Obama administration on a key question of Middle East policy.
In Iowa on Thursday, in response to a question from the Guardian about whether the White House should take further steps towards arming Kurdish forces fighting Islamic State militants in Syria and Iraq, the former Maryland governor and 2016 Democratic candidate said: "Probably, yes."
The Obama administration has long hesitated over directly arming Kurdish militias in the north of Iraq, for fear of further aggravating sectarian tensions.
In testimony to Congress earlier this month, the secretary of defense, Ashton Carter, said: "When we provide arms to the Kurds we do it with the consent of the Iraqi government in order to indicate that we support the idea of a single Iraqi government in Baghdad."
Turkey, a significant regional partner of the US, has long been wary of any effort to arm Kurdish militias.
Doug Wilson, a top foreign policy adviser to O'Malley, made clear that the candidate "was not unilaterally proposing that we step up additional arms to the Kurds". Instead, Wilson said, O'Malley would only do so "if it was determined by the US military that it was appropriate to up the arms to the Kurds".
O'Malley, who in polls of the Democratic field for 2016 is some way behind frontrunner Hillary Clinton and second-place Bernie Sanders, has rarely deviated significantly from the Obama administration on foreign policy.
His initial reaction to the Iran nuclear deal, for example, was relatively positive.
O'Malley told reporters on Tuesday: "I still haven't reviewed the agreement, but I am of the belief that a negotiated agreement, provided it's verifiable and enforceable, is the best path to a nuclear-free Iran. So I think that the initial news is promising."
In response to a question from the Guardian on Thursday, O'Malley refused to follow some opponents of the deal and criticize the White House for leaving four Americans held captive in Iran.
"I understand why the president and his negotiating team in their judgment would want to have their negotiations concluded which were complicated enough in a siloed basis," O'Malley said.
He added: "I think all of us are right to demand that our government continue to advocate for the release of those Americans in Iran."

Fact Checker: Was O'Malley on the money for wind jobs? // The Gazette - July 17, 2015

"Clean energy is a job creator, pure and simple. Iowa and Maryland prove it. Both of our states set standards and targets to encourage investment in renewable fuels. Iowa did this first among states, and now is a leader in biofuel production and wind generation. Last year, the number of Iowans working in the wind industry increased by 50 percent."
Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, a 2016 Democratic presidential candidate, in a guest opinion in The Des Moines Register
A representative with O'Malley's campaign named an April Register article citing a 2014 American Wind Energy Association report as the original source for O'Malley's statement.
A quick look at the numbers shows O'Malley's claim actually understates last year's growth in Iowa wind-power jobs, which roughly doubled from the 3,001-to-4,000 range in 2013 to the 6,001-to-7,000 range last year, according to figures provided by AWEA. This could have been as simple as a math error when looking at job

However, looking back a few years further shows the number of wind jobs in Iowa has merely returned to similar levels present in 2011 and 2012, when jobs first reached that 6,001-to-7,000 range.
Mike Prior, executive director of the Iowa Wind Energy Association, said the roughly 7,000 jobs counted are directly related to the industry, specifically in operation and maintenance. Indirect jobs in education, development or construction would push that number higher, he added.
Jobs in the wind industry dropped significantly in 2013 due to layoffs following the expiration of the Federal Production Tax Credit for wind energy — an inflation-adjusted per-kilowatt-hour tax credit that was ultimately renewed at the close of 2012.
“There was quite a bit of uncertainty in that time frame,” Prior said.
A December 2014 Iowa Advanced Energy Employment Survey indicated Iowa’s wind-power workforce in 2014 represented a decline of as much as 50 percent of jobs achieved in 2011 and 2012.
“This decline occurred during a sharp downturn in the U.S. wind industry associated with the expiration, followed by renewal, of the federal production tax credit (PTC), which resulted in a 90 percent drop in wind industry revenue in 2013,” according to the survey.
Enacted in 1992, the PTC has traditionally been renewed every one or two years, but the extended delay in its 2012 renewal caused manufacturing jobs for wind power to drop nationwide, said David Ward, deputy director in strategic communications for AWEA.
“New orders that would have started but didn’t because of the uncertainty, a lot of those jobs would have been lost at some point,” Ward said. “Once the PTC was extended and new orders could start coming in 2013 ... they kind of restarted the industry in a way.”
However, the lull in production carried down the pipeline, affecting jobs in development, operation and maintenance across the industry. Wind power jobs are coming back, but the industry itself still hasn’t reached the levels of 2012, Ward said.
Nationwide, there were 73,000 wind jobs last year, compared to 85,000 in 2012, according to AWEA.
While specific data was unavailable, Ward and Prior said it is safe to say a portion of the jobs added last year represented investors from previous years returning to the industry following the PTC’s renewal.
Wind energy jobs are again in a state of flux, as the PTC expired at the end of last year, which means manufacturing jobs are projected to again see a lull in production, with the bigger effects more noticeable next year.
“There will be more installation at the end of this year, but then you’ll start to see kind of a leveling off if there’s no extension,” Ward said.
While added context in Iowa’s wind industry trends better explain the large increase in jobs last year, O’Malley’s claim on job growth remains accurate, albeit a little off on the numbers, according to data.
The background helps us see that many of those jobs are likely investors returning to the market following the PTC renewal, and not entirely new growth.
O’Malley may have made a simple math error when looking at Iowa’s wind-power growth, but we give his comment an A.

O'Malley vows to lead on immigration // Washington Examiner // Ariel Cohen - July 17, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa — Sitting in a crowded church basement, Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley touted his recently released immigration platform, calling for amnesty and healthcare for all illegal immigrants as well as a new White House agency to handle immigration.
Asked about Hillary Clinton's recent push on immigration, the former Maryland governor stated that he hadn't seen enough of the other candidates' plans on the issue to pass judgment but left no doubt that he believed he was at the forefront.
"I haven't seen her plan or any of the other candidates' plans," O'Malley said. "I can tell you from my part I intend to lead with policy initiatives and ideas that serve our national good ... and I believe that immigration reform is one of those things we must do to get wages to go up again. One of the biggest drags you can have on wages is having an underground economy."
In Maryland, O'Malley made it easier for illegal immigrants to attend college, along with other legislation. Today he argues that by bringing 11 million people out of the shadows, American wages will go up. He often calls illegal immigrants "New Americans.”
"This is a political challenge. In the past we doomed ourselves to failure by treating immigration as if it is some political check-off," O'Malley said.
Only two dozen people, not including media and those running the event, came out to see O'Malley Thursday, but those who did attend could be seen clapping and nodding in agreement throughout the 50-minute discussion.
"I think he's pretty darned with this assessment and ways of dealing with it," Iowa resident Tom Leffler said. "I think the other candidates haven't addressed it as fully as Governor O'Malley, but we'll see.”

Cronyism in Maryland // CATO Institute // David Boaz - July 17, 2015

Martin O’Malley, the former governor of Maryland and Democratic presidential candidate, is no Bill and Hillary Clinton, who have made more than $100 million from speeches, much of it from companies and governments who just might like to have a friend in the White House or the State Department. But consider these paragraphs deep in a Washington Post story today about O’Malley’s financial disclosure form:

> While O’Malley commanded far smaller fees than the former secretary of state – and gave only a handful of > speeches – he also seemed to benefit from government and political connections forged during his time in public service.

>
> Among his most lucrative speeches was a $50,000 appearance at a conference in Baltimore sponsored by Center Maryland, an organization whose leaders include a former O'Malley communications director, the finance director of his presidential campaign and the director of a super PAC formed to support O'Malley's presidential bid.
> O'Malley also lists $147,812 for a series of speeches to Environmental Systems Research Institute, a company that makes mapping software that O'Malley heavily employed as governor as part of an initiative to use data and technology to guide policy decisions.

I scratch your back, you scratch mine. That's the sort of insider dealing that sends voters fleeing to such unlikely candidates as Donald Trump and Bernie Sanders.
These sorts of lucrative "public service" arrangements are nothing new in Maryland (or elsewhere). In The Libertarian Mind I retell the story of how Gov. Parris Glendening and his aides scammed the state pension system and hired one another's relatives.
In some countries governors still get suitcases full of cash . Speaking fees are much more modern.
Martin O'Malley Trails Rivals in Fundraising with $2 Million Haul // PPP Focus // River Gaines - July 17, 2015

O'Malley, who said he purposefully chose New York, the home of the Statue of Liberty, for this particular announcement, is expected to talk more about his immigration plan later this week in early-voting Iowa.
Presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley told Fusion's Jorge Ramos today that Donald Trump's anti-immigrant rhetoric had risen to the level of "hate speech".
Immigration is a hot button issue for the 2016 presidential campaign and Martin O'Malley is trying to play it to his advantage.
"Now, to continue to attract the next generation of strivers, dreamers and risk-takers and to be true to the values we hold dear, we must pursue a dynamic, modern approach to immigration policy as a nation", he wrote.
In the latest of a series of detailed policy papers from his campaign, the former Maryland governor said he would expand President Barack Obama's controversial deferred action program to "all individuals" covered by a sweeping and bipartisan immigration bill approved by the Senate in 2013.
"Comprehensive immigration reform will help all families – by lifting wages, creating new jobs, growing our economy, expanding our tax base and improving standards for all workers", according to O'Malley. "We are moving toward a more connected, compassionate, and generous place".
"Unlike other candidates of both parties, Governor O'Malley's immigration platform is bold and has concrete details, particularly that he will commit to executive action first year of office", the Dream Action Coalition said in a statement.
"What the hell kind of sense does that make?" to ban undocumented people from buying health insurance even if they can afford it, O'Malley asked. Clinton is far and away the leader, while O'Malley's campaign has been overshadowed in recent weeks by the growing popularity of Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders.
O'Malley is now behind in the Democratic primary, getting only one to two percent in the most recent polls.
In the interview, O'Malley stressed his executive experience and said his accomplishments set him apart from his opponents. He helped push legislation through Annapolis in 2011 that provides in-state tuition at state universities for young immigrants brought to the country illegally, and he also ushered in a system that allowed undocumented immigrants to obtain drivers licenses.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders and Third Parties // NYT // Oliver B. Hall - July 17, 2015

Todd Gitlin's vivid account of Bernie Sanders's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 conveys the impression that 1960s-style "radical politics" is now — or at least should be — practiced only within the Democratic Party. Except for Senator Sanders, the only radicals Mr. Gitlin cites with approval are Democrats. He broadly dismisses third-party politics as not "popular on the left" since Ralph Nader ran for president as the Green Party candidate in 2000.
But if "radical politics" signifies anything, apart from the "countercultural baggage" to which Mr. Gitlin alludes, surely it includes a willingness to challenge existing power structures, including the two major political parties. That's what the progressives thought who first championed the abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, the minimum wage, a progressive income tax, the 40-hour workweek and many other reforms that originated with third parties.
Mr. Nader's presidential campaigns carried on that tradition by advancing a platform that Democrats wouldn't touch. It included, for example, cracking down on corporate crime, supporting single-payer health care and opposing the war in Iraq.
Bernie Sanders Presses Hillary Clinton on Her Views on Banks // NYT // Jonathan Martin – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa — Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont edged closer on Friday to directly attacking Hillary Rodham Clinton, pointedly asking whether the Democratic presidential front-runner would support measures to break up the country's largest financial institutions and reinstate a firewall between commercial and investment banking.

Mr. Sanders, whose campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination has galvanized liberal activists driven by questions of economic fairness, highlighted his efforts to cut down the so-called too big to fail banks and restore Glass-Steagall, the Depression-era banking law repealed under President Bill Clinton. "You'll have to ask Hillary Clinton about her views on whether she thinks we should break up these large financial institutions. I do," Mr. Sanders, an independent, said at a news conference here. "You will have to ask her views on whether we should re-establish Glass-Steagall."

He boasted that he had not received financial contributions from Goldman Sachs, which he said sought "undue influence" in American politics, but stopped short of calling on Mrs. Clinton to reject the nearly $50,000 in donations she has received from employees of the Wall Street firm. "That's her decision," Mr. Sanders said, after pausing for a moment to consider the question.

Mr. Sanders spoke the afternoon before the Iowa Democratic Party's annual fund-raising dinner, the first event this year at which all of the party's five presidential candidates appeared together. Mrs. Clinton addressed her supporters at an early evening rally before the banquet, but trained her fire entirely on Republicans, making no mention, direct or implied, of Mr. Sanders.

The banquet illustrated the populist fervor coursing through the Democratic base, offering an explanation for Mr. Sanders' early success. Mrs. Clinton received ovations for her attacks on some of the Republican presidential hopefuls and gender-oriented appeals, but Mr. Sanders and Martin O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, found booming applause for their full-throated attacks on Wall Street and free-trade deals.

Asked whether Mrs. Clinton would seek to break up the country's largest banks or reinstate Glass-Steagall, an aide to Mrs. Clinton said she would speak in more detail about both issues in the coming weeks. (Alan Blinder, an economist who is advising Mrs. Clinton, said this week that she would not attempt to revive Glass-Steagall.)

While some leading Iowa Democrats believe that Mr. Sanders's rise will ultimately help Mrs. Clinton restrain expectations here, where she was defeated by Barack Obama in the 2008 caucuses, Mr. Sanders's growing support in the polls, vast base of small-dollar contributors and sizable crowds have prompted some of Mrs. Clinton's backers to make not-so-subtle comments about the importance of nominating a candidate who can capture the White House.

"We've got to nominate somebody that can win and Hillary is a winner," Michael Fitzgerald, Iowa's state treasurer, said at the Clinton rally.

"I don't have a lot of time to mess around like I used to, I want to win," said Dale Todd, a Democratic activist from Cedar Rapids, who also spoke before Mrs. Clinton took the stage.

Privately, Mrs. Clinton's backers are blunter, dismissing the possibility that Mr. Sanders, a 73-year-old self-declared socialist, would be a viable general election candidate. Yet the sheer size of his crowds, in Iowa and beyond, is creating awkwardness for Mrs. Clinton.

She added the rally to her schedule, her campaign said, to give local supporters who had not purchased a ticket for the dinner a chance to see the former secretary of state. She has been doing more such large-scale events in part because they are crucial to organizing. To that end, every attendee was asked to sign a caucus commitment card upon entering the basement hall, one side of which was lined with a surefire crowd builder: boxes of free pizza.

These gatherings also, though, represent an effort to show that Mrs. Clinton is herself capable of luring big audiences. But the rally served to highlight her inability for now to attract crowds on the same scale as Mr. Sanders, whose Iowa events have drawn more people than any other presidential candidate has in either party. Mrs. Clinton drew a few hundred people to her event here — her campaign pegged it at 500 — while Mr. Sanders was met by about 2,500 at an event in Council Bluffs this month. The Vermont senator did not seek to compete with a head-to-head rally, but he joined a group of veterans Friday afternoon upstairs in the same building where Mrs. Clinton spoke.

Standing beneath a giant, Grant Wood-designed stained glass window honoring three centuries of American soldiers, Mr. Sanders recounted his work as chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, solemnly recounting "the cost of war." But he turned notably more energetic when he took questions about his campaign.

"I think that there is a growing frustration all over this country for establishment politics, for establishment economics," he said before inveighing against what he called "a corrupt system."

Bernie Sanders isn't Barack Obama, and 2016 isn't 2008 // WaPo // Dan Pfeiffer – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton is once again campaigning for president as the prohibitive front-runner, and once again, she faces a challenge from an insurgent progressive outsider with grass-roots support. And once again, while Clinton (re)introduces herself to voters in a low-key listening tour of sorts, her challenger is drawing huge audiences — 10,000 in Madison, Wis., 8,000 in Portland, Maine, 5,000 in Denver and overflow crowds in Iowa's small towns and elsewhere.

Eight years ago, Clinton led in the polls for most of 2007, only to lose the Iowa caucuses — and, eventually, the Democratic nomination — to a favorite of the party's progressive base. It's feeling a bit like deja vu. "If she doesn't change the terms of the race, she's going to lose. Again," former Mitt Romney strategist Stuart Stevens warned in the Daily Beast this month.

It may be tempting to compare the race between Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) to the epic race between Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama: Sanders, like Obama, has consolidated a good portion of the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. Sanders, like Obama, is raising millions from small-dollar donors on the Internet. Sanders, like Obama, is channeling the anger and frustration of some in the party; then, it was about the Iraq war, now, it's about Wall Street.

But that's where the similarities end. From the perspective of someone who worked on his campaign and in his White House, it's clear that Obama's race against Clinton is not a useful example. Understanding the dynamics at play in the 2016 primaries requires looking further back at history. And unfortunately for Sanders, history shows that there are only two types of Democratic insurgent candidates: Barack Obama and everyone else.

The current system for selecting nominees in the Democratic Party is less than 50 years old. After the disastrous 1968 campaign and nominating convention in Chicago, the party abandoned the smoke-filled rooms of yore and shifted to a series of primaries and caucuses. The 1972 nomination went to the grass-roots favorite, Sen. George McGovern (S.D.), who used the new rules to edge out establishment picks Hubert Humphrey and Henry "Scoop" Jackson. (McGovern won only Massachusetts and the District of Columbia in the general election against Richard Nixon.) In nearly every election since then, an anti-establishment figure has sought the nomination.

Sanders is merely the latest such challenger to make some early noise in a Democratic primary race. He's not even the first one from Vermont: In 2004, former governor Howard Dean rode his opposition to the Iraq war to the top of the field before eventually finishing a distant third in Iowa. That, combined with his famous caucus-night scream, was effectively the end of his candidacy. Dean followed in the footsteps of others, such as then-Sen. Gary Hart (Colo.) in 1984 (and briefly in 1988), California Gov. Jerry Brown in 1976 and again in 1992, and former senator Bill Bradley (N.J.) in 2000. Obama played this role in 2008. The most famous and most successful post-McGovern, pre-Obama challenge came from Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.) in 1980, when he almost defeated Jimmy Carter, the incumbent president of his own party.

All of these challengers had their moments, rising in the polls, firing up the grass roots and going from unknown underdogs to legitimate contenders. But every one of them, except Obama, ultimately came up short. Their early successes all had some similar explanations. First, the most liberal voters tend to tune in sooner and engage more actively, giving an initial boost to progressive candidates. Second, the overriding bias in political press coverage is toward a competitive race, which means that challengers often receive media attention that exceeds their chances of winning. Finally and perhaps most important, skepticism of the establishment is woven into the fabric of the Democratic Party — if the party leadership, the donors and the pundits are all for one person, many in the rank and file start to explore other options.

Of course, every election is different, and every historical parallel is imperfect. Each of these candidates did things right and wrong in their races; some made gaffes, and others ran out of money. But ultimately, similar factors played into their defeats.

Presidential campaigns are massively sophisticated, expensive operations. Insurgent challenges all start as underfunded, fly-by-night operations, with just enough resources to gain attention in the early days. But when it comes to actually turning out voters, particularly in the very complex Iowa caucus system — which requires a candidate to have at least 15 percent support to get any delegates and gives no extra points for winning by big margins in liberal precincts — you need a campaign organization worthy of that task.

Even if organizers manage to set up a strong operation, many challengers still falter under the intense klieg lights that are attracted to a viable contender for the United States presidency. Lifelong politicians who are first-time presidential candidates think they are ready for the scrutiny, and they are almost all wrong. Finally, every anti-establishment challenger except Obama failed to expand his base beyond the left wing of the party. Bradley and Dean, for instance, did very well with liberal, white Democrats. That can be enough to win key states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, especially in a multi-candidate field, where you may only need a third of the electorate to come out on top. But getting sufficient delegates to win the nomination requires a very broad base of support. It means building a wide coalition of voters, including moderate Democrats and even independents, as well as African Americans and the growing number of Latinos in the party.

Obama's campaign succeeded where everyone else's failed for two main reasons. His tremendous popularity with African American voters was critical. Although Obama won the black vote by margins as high as 9 to 1 in some states, this was not preordained. Clinton led Obama among African American voters in most polls until after he won Iowa. Obama also found a way to hold his liberal base while simultaneously attracting the enthusiastic support of self-identified independents and moderates. In 2008, we did best in open contests, which allowed anyone to participate regardless of party registration.

Essentially, Obama benefitted from two separate phenomena: liberal frustration with the Democratic Party establishment for supporting the Iraq war and moderate disenchantment with President George W. Bush over Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and a host of other issues. Getting the support of those independents and Republicans was key for us in a number of caucus states, including Iowa.

So far, at least, there's little reason to think Sanders can duplicate what led Obama to victory. Yes, he's surged in the polls to be the clear challenger to Clinton, a remarkably rapid and impressive feat for a senator from a small state who has never run for national office before in order to seek the nomination. If his momentum continues, and if former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley and others can take chunks of the vote, Sanders could win Iowa and even New Hampshire.

But Sanders still looks likely to follow in the tradition of Bradley and Dean. Polls show that he's doing well with liberal voters and struggling everywhere else, and he has negligible support and limited name identification among black and Latino voters. There is no doubt that Sanders has lit the progressive wing of the Democratic Party on fire by speaking out boldly against inequality and excess on Wall Street. But he faces real challenges that Obama did not in expanding his base of support. Sanders is from a small state with very few minority voters, while Obama had deeper relationships to build on, especially with the African American community.

Sanders's campaign is growing rapidly, but even with new field offices opening fast, it is still less than half the size of Obama's organization at a similar juncture in our race: In July 2007, Obama had 80 paid staffers working in 25 offices in Iowa. Obama was able raise more early money for his campaign; that, coupled with his potential to make history as the nation's first black president, attracted a very experienced set of political operatives with deep knowledge of how to run a sophisticated campaign. While Sanders has decided to play the role of the liberal challenger to Clinton, pushing her to the left at every opportunity, Obama ran a much less ideological campaign, which allowed him to build a broader base of support from the outset.

If 2008 is not the best parallel for Sanders vs. Clinton, what is? Probably the 2000 contest between Vice President Al Gore and Bill Bradley. That contest, like this one, was about who would get a chance to succeed a two-term Democratic president. That contest, like this one, was essentially a two-person race (though this could change in the coming months). And in that contest, like this one, the Democratic Party was looking to redefine itself for a new era. Bradley made a surprisingly strong challenge to a sitting vice president, forcing Gore to shake up his campaign, move his headquarters from D.C. to Nashville and retool his entire effort. Ultimately, though, Bradley could not broaden his base of support, and he ended up losing all 50 states to Gore.

History says that Clinton is likely to be our nominee and that Sanders is doomed to repeat the fate of Bradley and the rest. Of course, history said the same thing about Obama, and there's a reason that people say "anything is possible in politics." But the odds are that by this time next year, the 2008 campaign will remain the exception, not the rule.

Bernie Sanders says July 29 is the most important day of his campaign // WaPo // Aaron C. Davis - July 17, 2015

As a crush of millennials crowded into a brewery near Nationals Park on Thursday night, a young man setting up a loudspeaker for Sen. Bernie Sanders took the microphone. "Testing. One. Two. Three. The political revolution is here."
The septuagenarian socialist who is disrupting the Democratic presidential race soon arrived and refined the message. The revolution is still coming, Sanders (I-Vt.) said. Hopefully on July 29.
On that Wednesday night, six months before the Iowa caucus, Sanders will livestream his case for the presidency to more than 1,500 simultaneous gatherings planned in bars, coffee shops and living rooms nationwide. The candidate's address will be followed by an organizational meeting for anyone who wants to stay online and discuss joining his campaign.
In only his third fundraiser since announcing his candidacy in April, Sanders on Thursday night cast his campaign to a room full of 20-somethings in D.C. as a proxy for registering deep dissatisfaction with the state of American politics and the nation's growing income inequality.
"Our job is to ask why," Sanders said. "Why are we living in a society in which for the last 40 years the middle class in this country has been disappearing and almost all of the wealth and income are going to the people on top?"
Win or lose, Sanders said, "that's the question we have to ask, that's what this campaign is about."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whether Sanders can use the Internet to build an effective campaign remains to be seen, and the effort will not come without stiff competition. Hillary Rodham Clinton has hired a Google executive to lead her digital campaign, and in many ways she is building on the extraordinary success of President Obama's online organization.
But there are signs Sanders has a base online to work from. In the first 24 hours of his campaign, 35,000 people donated an average of less than $44 apiece through his campaign Web site. After less than three months, he raised a total of $15 million, mostly from online donors who gave less than $200.
And the bulk of expenses for Sanders campaign so far have been to build up his online presence. He's spent $1.3 million on digital consulting and online advertisements.
Sanders aides say that it's all been building up to an event like the one on July 29 — something the Vermont Independent has long dreamed of.
Sanders has more than once paced his Senate office muttering to staffers that the only way a long-shot candidate like himself could reach enough people to be taken seriously would be to "beam himself into every living room" through the Internet, said Kenneth Pennington, a Senate aide who is now Sanders's digital director.
For a candidate who has called for a $1 trillion public works plan and eliminating college tuition, he cast his campaign's digital ambitions in no smaller terms, either. He said July 29 could be the country's biggest online political event and his message could transcend political parties
"What we are trying, as part of creating a political revolution, is creating a grass-roots movement of millions and millions of people," Sanders said. "On July 29 of this month, we will be holding what we believe will be the largest digital organizing event in the history of this country.
"We hope to have tens of thousands of people coming together to determine how they can develop movements in their local community," he said.
"This campaign is not simply about electing me, I hope we accomplish that, but that ain't the most important thing," Sanders said. "The most important thing is building a political movement in which millions of people who have given up on the political process, including a lot of young people, get involved?"

Warren inspires Netroots Nation — even those wearing Sanders T-shirts // WaPo // John Wagner – July 17, 2015

PHOENIX — There were plenty of reminders here Friday of why progressive Democrats have been pining for Elizabeth Warren to run for president.

In a fiery speech at Netroots Nation, the country's largest gathering of progressive activists, the senator from Massachusetts railed against Wall Street "banksters" who deserve to be in jail. She decried an economic system "rigged for the rich and powerful." And she vowed to fight an "insider Washington" that doesn't realize how progressive the country really is.

Tucson software engineer Dirk Arnold responded with a standing ovation, joined by most of the 3,000 others in attendance.

Arnold, who wore a Warren T-shirt, said he was mindful of what could have been if his hero had acquiesced to those trying to draft her to run for president. But, he added, he's moved on.

"My switch has flipped over to Bernie," Arnold said, referring to Sen. Bernie Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist from Vermont who has emerged as the leading alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination.

That seemed to be the sentiment of many former Warren boosters here for a four-day gathering that Sanders and fellow Democratic candidate Martin O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, are scheduled to address Saturday. (Clinton is skipping the conference).

While Warren won't be on the debate stage, her influence on the race is still being felt, leading progressive activists here argued.

"Progressives are looking for a candidate speaking Elizabeth Warren's rhetoric and embracing her policies," said Stephanie Taylor, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, a Washington-based group whose agenda overlaps with Warren's on issues such as debt-free college, expansion of Social Security benefits and Wall Street reform.

Taylor said that Warren's "role right now is agenda-setting, policy-setting. When she picks a fight, it's a signal it will be a major one, not only for her but for the party."

In recent months, Clinton — the overwhelming Democratic favorite — has borrowed some Warren catchphrases, including her declaration that the economic system is "rigged" against working families.

But Adam Green, the other co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, said it remains to be seen whether Clinton will move beyond slogans to champion bold policies.

Warren made no mention of specific presidential candidates during her speech Friday. But she issued them all a challenge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think anyone running for that job . . . should say loud and clear that they agree: We don’t run this country for Wall Street and mega-corporations,” she said. “We run it for people.”

More specifically, Warren said, the candidates should be asked if they support a bill introduced by Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.) that would prevent Wall Street banks from giving multimillion-dollar bonuses to executives who are departing for government jobs.

Within the hour, O’Malley’s campaign released a statement pointing out that he had already issued a comprehensive plan to crack down on Wall Street that includes his own ideas on “closing the revolving door.”

A spokesman for Sanders said that he “of course” supports Baldwin’s legislation and added that Sanders is co-sponsoring a Warren bill in the Senate that would reinstate the Glass-Steagall Act. The legislation aims to prevent commercial banks from engaging in risky investment schemes.

While many former Warren boosters at the conference said they had found a suitable alternative in Sanders, others were less certain. Several suggested that they’d prefer a female nominee, and some said Warren’s age — she’s 66 — would be less of an issue than Sanders’s age, 73.

But a noticeable number of people wore Sanders T-shirts, and several groups handed out Sanders stickers.

“I think [Warren] would have been an amazing first woman president instead of Hillary,” said Belen Sisa, a 21-year-old activist from Gilbert, Ariz. But Sisa said that she would be happy with either Warren or Sanders as the nominee — and that pairing them on the same ticket would be ideal. “I guess that would be la-la land,” she added with a sigh.

Austen Levihn-Coon, a Washington-based political consultant, said he feels a kinship with Sanders on most issues. But, he said, it remains to be seen whether Sanders can “pull together the machinery to run on a national stage and present himself as a serious candidate.”

As for Warren: “Maybe we’ll see her next time around,” said Levihn-Coon, 30, whose consulting firm specializes in issue-oriented campaigns.

Even as she has passed on a White House bid, Warren has become increasingly influential in the Senate, said Jim Dean, chairman of Democracy for America, a group that was part of the unsuccessful “Run Warren Run” recruitment effort.

“She was, frankly, the go-to person for raising money in the last cycle,” he said. “She’s built power that way.”

Former congressman Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who did not attend the conference, said Warren would have had little to gain by running for president in a field that includes Clinton.

“If Senator Warren had run for president, she would almost certainly not have got the nomination,” Frank said in a phone interview. “Had she got it, it would not have been worth much after all that bloodshed.”

As things stand, Frank continued, Warren “is now in an extraordinary situation. She’s one of the most influential junior members of Congress, and she can make these critiques that get national attention. . . . People listen to her. She’s an enormously influential person.”

Rep. Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), who attended the conference, said both Sanders and Warren stood to benefit from their respective decisions about entering the race.

“Their role is to articulate the frustrations and the hopes of the vast majority of the American people,” Ellison said in an interview. “Their role is to speak to people’s pain and what they’re hoping for.”

In This Money Race, Bernie Sanders Wins // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton won the fundraising competition, but rival Bernie Sanders snagged the award for running the more frugal operation, campaign finance reports filed this week show.

Sen. Sanders of Vermont has been waging a campaign with a fraction of Mrs. Clinton’s overhead.

The Clinton campaign payroll dwarfed that of Mr. Sanders, who is running second in the Democratic field. Mrs. Clinton spent nearly $3.7 million on campaign salaries; Mr. Sanders, $112,000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her campaign spent more than $900,000 on polling in the quarter that ended June 30th; Mr. Sanders, $0.

And on it goes.

The Clinton campaign, headquartered in Brooklyn, N.Y., spent about $464,000 on rent – more than 10 times what the Burlington, Vt.-based Sanders campaign laid out in rent payments.

Mr. Sanders, who has been seen traveling through Iowa in a rented Chevy, spent $47,000 on campaign travel; Mrs. Clinton, nearly 10 times that sum.

The Clinton campaign is managed by Robby Mook, who prides himself on being something of a skinflint. Campaign aides have been taking the bus between New York and Washington, D.C., rather than spring for the pricier Amtrak ticket.

Still, a Clinton campaign was bound to be a more expensive proposition than that of a self-described Democratic socialist from Vermont whose speeches are laced with unsparing attacks on billionaires and wealthy corporations.

She is a former first lady, secretary of state and U.S. senator who travels in motorcades complete with Secret Service protection. Her payroll includes the digital wizards needed to run a sophisticated, data-driven race, along with a phalanx of loyal advisers who've been by her side for years.

"Hillary Clinton's first quarter in the race was defined by early, smart investments aimed at building a strong foundation for our campaign," said a spokesman, Josh Schwerin. "Those investments include essentially rebuilding email lists, hiring organizing staff, and key investments in our digital capabilities."

By contrast, the Sanders campaign is a seat-of-the-pants affair. Mr. Sanders's aides estimate they spent a few thousand dollars on office furniture, compared with about $43,000 laid out by the Clinton campaign.

Michael Briggs, a Sanders spokesman, said when it came time to outfit the Burlington office, a few people drove a U-Haul to a Vermont store that sells government surplus.

The campaign used Craigslist to find office furniture for Mr. Sanders's campaign office in Washington D.C.

"It's a shoestring operation," Mr. Briggs said.

The Sanders campaign has been adding staff, though, as the senator draws large crowds at rallies across the country and tries to capitalize on what supporters call "Bernie-mentum."

National surveys show Mrs. Clinton enjoys a large lead over the best of the Democratic field. Of late Mr. Sanders is gaining ground, notably in New Hampshire where a recent poll showed him trailing Mrs. Clinton by just 8 points.

Mrs. Clinton, a proven fundraiser, has outraised Mr. Sanders in the last quarter by about $47 million to $15 million.

But Mr. Sanders has one advantage: If he can continue to keep costs down, he won't need as much money.

Socialist Sanders on low end of earners among candidates // AP - July 17, 2015

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP) - As you might expect of a candidate who labels himself a Democratic socialist, Bernie Sanders is at the low end of earners among candidates for president in 2016.
But the Vermont independent, a candidate for the Democratic nomination, earns a $174,000 Senate salary that puts him among the top 5 percent of Americans in income.
A new financial disclosure form indicates that Sanders got less than $2,000 total for three speaking appearances since last fall, including $850 for appearing on the HBO talk show "Real Time With Bill Maher." He reported donating his speaking fees to Vermont charities.
Sanders also got a $5,000-a-year pension from the city of Burlington for his time as mayor.
His wife, Jane O'Meara Sanders, holds retirement fund accounts worth between $194,000 and $735,000.

Bernie Sanders backs big bank breakups, in contrast with Hillary Clinton // Politico // Burgess Everett - July 17, 2015

Bernie Sanders is backing a bill to break up big banks after advisers to presidential rival Hillary Clinton made clear earlier this week she will not support reinstating the Glass-Steagall Act.
Noting that he's long supported reimposing a firewall between investment and commercial banks, the Vermont senator said he's officially rejoining an effort led by Sens. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) to break up the big banks, saying, "If we are truly serious about ending too big to fail, we have got to break up the largest financial institutions in this country."
"Allowing commercial banks to merge with investment banks and insurance companies in 1999 was a huge mistake. It precipitated the largest taxpayer bailout in the history of the world. It caused millions of Americans to lose their jobs, homes, life savings and ability to send their kids to college," said Sanders, who said that change in the financial world "substantially increased wealth and income inequality."

Earlier this week, a Clinton campaign adviser told Reuters that "you're not going to see Glass-Steagall." Clinton was also interrupted by a heckler on Monday who challenged her to revive the depression-era policy, though she did not answer the question.
By moving quickly to reassert his support for a proposal from liberal superstar Warren, Sanders is highlighting the differences between his platform and Clinton's more centrist positions on financial regulations, a major issue among progressives. Sanders actually cosponsored a version of the bill in 2013, well before he began challenging Clinton for the Democratic nomination, and in a press release reminded reporters of a speech he gave in 1999 as a House member.
"Sixteen years ago, I predicted that such a massive deregulation of the financial services industry would seriously harm the economy. I would give anything to have been proven wrong about this, but unfortunately, what happened seven years ago was even worse than I predicted," Sanders said.
In 1999, Congress passed legislation rewriting the financial rule book for banks, and it was signed by President Bill Clinton.

14 things Bernie Sanders has said about socialism // Politico // Michael Kruse - July 17, 2015

Socialist has never been a complimentary term in American political discourse, but it has reached a particularly high level of toxicity during the past six years of President Barack Obama's administration.
While the president and his defenders have spent a great deal of time parrying that attack, Bernie Sanders is using the socialist label to his advantage, packing venues around the country and establishing himself as Hillary Rodham Clinton's leading challenger for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.
Sanders, 73, has been preaching socialism for nearly half a century, and he cites Eugene Debs, the five-time presidential candidate of the Socialist Party of America, as his hero. But he hasn't always embraced the label.
"I myself don't use the word socialism," he said in 1976 in the Vermont Cynic, a student publication at the University of Vermont, "because people have been brainwashed into thinking socialism automatically means slave-labor camps, dictatorship and lack of freedom of speech."
Even when Sanders ran for mayor of Burlington in 1981, "Bernie never mentioned the word 'socialist' in his campaign," according to Greg Guma, a longtime Sanders watcher and the author of "The People's Republic: Vermont and the Sanders Revolution."
When he won, though, it wasn't Sanders' choice anymore.
"The media probably made that label stick," said Alan Abbey, who covered Sanders at the time for the *B*urlington Free Press. "It makes for good headlines."
"I've stayed away from calling myself a socialist," Sanders said in the Boston Globe in the aftermath of his win in '81, "because I did not want to spend half my life explaining that I did not believe in the Soviet Union or in concentration camps."
Two months later, in the Boston Phoenix, he said he didn't want to be "a spokesman for socialism."
It's what he's become. And even though less than half of Americans say they would vote for a socialist for president (47 percent, fewer than would vote for an atheist or a Muslim), Sanders is sticking with it.
Here, then, are 14 things Sanders has said about socialism since the '80s:
1. In the summer 1986 issue of a now-defunct magazine called Vermont Affairs: "All that socialism means to me, to be very frank with you, is democracy with a small 'd.' I believe in democracy, and by democracy I mean that, to as great an extent as possible, human beings have the right to control their own lives. And that means that you cannot separate the political structure from the economic structure. One has to be an idiot to believe that the average working person who's making $10,000 or $12,000 a year is equal in political power to somebody who is the head of a large bank or corporation. So if you believe in political democracy, if you believe in equality, you have to believe in economic democracy as well."
2. In Vermont Affairs: "... I certainly did not know what the word socialism meant growing up, because I was brought up in a very nonpolitical family. My brother was somewhat active, but my parents were not. But I think some people tend not to accept what almost everybody has accepted as true. Many people go to school, but most of them don't challenge the basic assumptions of their teachers or of the system. And I always have. You reach a certain age when you start reading reasonably widely, and you find ideas that reflect your gut feeling about something. I think that's usually the process — you find what you're looking for. I had that feeling when I first read Eugene Debs, for example. If you read what Debs said about the goals of socialism, it's no different from what I've been saying — that all socialism is about is democracy."
3. From the 1988 dissertation of Steven Soifer, a professor of social work at the University of Memphis, who wrote about Sanders' time as mayor of Burlington: "What being a socialist means is ... that you hold out ... a vision of society where poverty is absolutely unnecessary, where international relations are not based on greed ... but on cooperation ... where human beings can own the means of production and work together rather than having to work as semi-slaves to other people who can hire and fire."
4. In an interview with Catherine Alison Hill for a master's thesis she wrote at Cornell in 1989: "Socialism has a lot of different messages to different people. I think the issue of socialist ideology and what that meant or means is not terribly important. I think the positive of it is that it indicates to people that I am not a conventional politician. If they are not happy with the status quo, then that is a positive thing. The negative of it obviously is that there are people who equate it with totalitarianism and the Soviet Union."
5. In a speech he gave at the National Committee for Independent Political Action in New York City on June 22,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1989, reprinted in the December 1989 issue of the socialist publication Monthly Review: “In Vermont, everybody knows that I am a socialist and that many people in our movement, not all, are socialists. And as often as not — and this is an interesting point that is the honest-to-God truth — what people will say is, ‘I don’t really know what socialism is, but if you’re not a Democrat or a Republican, you’re OK with me.’ That’s true. And I think there has been too much of a reluctance on the part of progressives and radicals to use the word ‘socialism.’”
6. In his NCIPA speech: “Yes, it is true that a result of the tremendous political ignorance in this country created by the schools and the media, there are many people who do not know the difference between ‘socialism’ and ‘communism.’ Yes, on more than one occasion, I have been told to ‘go back to Russia.’ But, if we maintain a strong position on civil liberties, express our continued opposition to authoritarianism and the concept of the one-party state, I am confident that the vast majority of the people will understand that there is nothing incompatible between socialism and democracy. That has been the case in Vermont and I believe, with proper effort, that it can be the case nationally. Further, given the fact that in Burlington we have almost doubled voter turnout and have significantly increased citizen participation, it is very hard for our opponents to argue that we are not ‘democratic.’”
7. In an interview with The Associated Press in November 1990: “To me, socialism doesn’t mean state ownership of everything, by any means, it means creating a nation, and a world, in which all human beings have a decent standard of living.”
8. In the book he wrote with Huck Gutman, Outsider in the House, published in 1997: “Bill Clinton is a moderate Democrat. I’m a democratic socialist.”
9. In an interview with the Guardian in November 2006: “Twenty years ago, when people here thought about socialism they were thinking about the Soviet Union, about Albania. Now they think about Scandinavia. In Vermont people understand I’m talking about democratic socialism.”
10. In an interview with The Washington Post in November 2006. “I wouldn’t deny it. Not for one second. I’m a democratic socialist. … In Norway, parents get a paid year to care for infants. Finland and Sweden have national health care, free college, affordable housing and a higher standard of living. … . Why shouldn’t that appeal to our disappearing middle class?”
11. In an interview with Democracy Now in November 2006: “In terms of socialism, I think there is a lot to be learned from Scandinavia and from some of the work, very good work that people have done in Europe. In countries like Finland, Norway, Denmark, poverty has almost been eliminated. All people have health care as a right of citizenship. College education is available to all people, regardless of income, virtually free. I have been very aggressive in trying to move to sustainable energy. They have a lot of political participation, high voter turnouts. I think there is a lot to be learned from countries that have created more egalitarian societies than has the United States of America.”
12. To Democracy Now: “I think it means the government has got to play a very important role in making sure that as a right of citizenship, all of our people have health care; that as a right, all of our kids, regardless of income, have quality childcare, are able to go to college without going deeply into debt; that it means we do not allow large corporations and moneyed interests to destroy our environment; that we create a government in which it is not dominated by big money interest. I mean, to me, it means democracy, frankly. That’s all it means. And we are living in an increasingly undemocratic society in which decisions are made by people who have huge sums of money. And that’s the goal that we have to achieve.”
13. In an interview with the Des Moines Register this month: “If you look at the issues — you don’t have to worry about the word ‘socialist’ — just look at what I’m talking about. If you go out and ask the American people: Is it right that the middle class continues to disappear while there has been a massive transfer of wealth from working families to the top one-tenth of 1 percent? Trillions of dollars in the last 30 years have flowed from the middle class to the top one-tenth of 1 percent. And the American people say, ‘No, that’s not right.’ And if you ask the American people: Do you think it’s right that despite an explosion of technology and an increase in worker productivity, the average worker is working longer hours for low wages? They say no. And what the American people are saying pretty loudly and clearly is they want an economy that works for ordinary Americans. For working people. Not an economy where almost all of the income and all of the wealth is going to the top 1 percent. That’s what we have now.”
14. In an interview with The Nation this month: “Do they think I’m afraid of the word? I’m not afraid of the word.”

Bernie Sanders Says Goldman Wants 'Undue Influence' // Bloomberg // Arit John – July 17, 2015

As all five Democratic presidential candidates descended on Cedar Rapids, Iowa to share a stage for the first time, Senator Bernie Sanders cited his rival Hillary Clinton's support from Goldman Sachs as one of the factors that distinguish them.

In the city's Veterans Memorial building where he held a press conference the senator, who is the top-ranking Democrat on the Veterans Affairs committee, talked about care for retired members of the military. But reporters focused on Clinton.

Asked about the $50,000 Clinton received from Goldman Sachs employees. “Obviously I didn’t get any money from Goldman Sachs," said the Vermont socialist, who has been campaigning against the "billionaire class."

"I don’t take corporate PAC money, never have, don’t want it," Sanders added.

Asked what he thought Goldman Sachs expected to gain by donating to Clinton, Sanders said: “Obviously what

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Goldman Sachs wants, what corporate America wants, what the Koch brothers want, is undue influence over the political process."

Question: should she give the money back?

"You ask her."

Shortly afterwards, in an interview with Bloomberg outside the hall where Cedar Rapids Democrats are hosting the presidential candidates for a dinner, where each will get to deliver a 15-minute speech, Sanders faulted presidents of both parties for their "heavy reliance on Wall Street" and said heads of investment firms would be barred from a Sanders Cabinet. Asked whether he'd consider a Treasury Secretary like Robert Rubin, who served in the job for President Bill Clinton, Sanders said, "he would be the last person" he would pick. "He was one of the architects of the deregulation of Wall Street," he added.

At his press conference, Sanders said people are working longer hours for lower wages, and the U.S. has higher levels of childhood poverty and income inequality than in past decades. "One of the reasons has to do with the greed, the recklessness, and the illegal behavior of the people on Wall Street," he said.

The senator noted that he had just co-sponsored support a measure to reinstate the Glass Steagall Act, which kept commercial and investment banks separate and was repealed by a bipartisan vote of Congress and President Bill Clinton.

"Now you'll have to ask Hillary Clinton about her view of whether she thinks we should break up these large financial institutions," he said. "And you'll have to ask for her views about whether we should re-establish Glass Steagall." Earlier this week, Alan Binder, an economist advising her campaign, told reporters that a new Glass Steagall act would not be part of her economic platform.

But at both the press conference and later, Sanders steadfastly refused to attack Clinton personally. "I like her and respect her," he told Bloomberg's Mark Halperin. "We just disagree on a whole lot of issues."

Why Rapper Killer Mike's Endorsement of Bernie Sanders Spells Trouble for Hillary Clinton // HuffPo // H. A. Goodman - July, 17 2015

Polls are ever-changing, but Americans will never long for a king or queen. When Run the Jewels rapper Killer Mike tweeted "I cannot support another Clinton or bush ever," he echoed the sentiments of Americans throughout the country tired of entrenched political factions in Washington. As for why political dynasties are ruinous to any democracy, the Atlanta rapper says , "I am beginning to see American political families like monarchs and I have no affection for monarchs." This sentiment, in addition to the reasons Killer Mike has endorsed Bernie Sanders for president , can't be accurately assessed by opinion polls or political wonks.
In fact, it could spell trouble for the Clinton campaign and Democratic strategists enamored with poll driven forecasts. When a recent analysis says that Bernie Sanders is popular primarily among "white liberals," the aggregate data used to make such a claim ignores the fact that black children face a 38% poverty rate and African-Americans as a group face a 27% poverty rate . This analysis questioning Sanders's appeal to minority voters also ignores a finding from Pew Research that states , "In 2011, the typical white household had a net worth of $91,405, compared with $6,446 for black households."
In terms of wealth inequality, one candidate in 2016 has been referred to by POLITICO as "Wall Street Republicans' dark secret," while the other "Goes Biblical" on income inequality. As for tackling Wall Street and income equality, Hillary Clinton for some reason hasn't endorsed a renewed Glass-Steagall Act, while Bernie Sanders has long supported a reinstatement of Glass-Steagall. Therefore, it's safe to say that voters experiencing the injustice of economic disenfranchisement might side with Killer Mike's choice of candidates in the long run; especially when more people become aware of the differences in economic policy between Clinton and Sanders.
Also, the fact that an artist known not only for his music (he's been on Real Time with Bill Maher , CNN, and has been vocal about politics) but also for his stances on Baltimore, Ferguson and racial injustice in America has endorsed Bernie Sanders illustrates an awakening in American politics that numbers can't accurately assess. The fact that Killer Mike posted a photo on Instagram of Sanders and Clinton (one was a civil rights advocate and the other was a Young Republican and "Goldwater Girl," but eventually a supporter of Eugene McCarthy) in the 1960's highlights a willingness to dig deeper into the true nature of opposing politicians. It also illustrates a growing discontent among many Americans about a political class that shrugs its shoulders regarding Ferguson, yet expects 45 million Americans to still vote Democrat.
First, Killer Mike's statements about dynasties aren't a fringe viewpoint. Martin O'Malley recently declared , "Let's be honest here, the presidency of the United States is not some crown to be passed between two families." In addition, Gary Hart agrees with this assessment and in a Time article titled Dare We Call it Oligarchy?, the former Colorado Senator explains how electing political families could be viewed as detrimental to democracy:
If the presidency were to pass back and forth between two or three families in any Latin American nation we would call it an oligarchy...
Our Founders created a republic and, being keen students of the history of republics beginning with Athens, they knew that placing special and narrow interests ahead of the common good and the commonwealth was the corruption that destroyed republics. They feared this kind of corruption as the greatest danger to America's success and survival...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By this standard, today's American Republic is massively corrupt. Every interest group in our nation has staff lobbyists and hires lobbying firms...
The net affect of the money machine -- lobbyists, fund raisers, and campaign consultants -- is to severely narrow the field of those who can compete for office, especially national office. If the national presidency were to pass back and forth between two or three families in any Latin American nation we would call it an oligarchy.
When political power in America is seen as a monolith that functions under the guise of a two party system, observers like Gary Hart, Killer Mike, and people weary of dynastic control of politics begin to wonder if America could lead one day to oligarchy. Symbolizing a counterforce to the entrenched political establishment in both parties, Bernie Sanders's ascent during this recent election cycle now has cultural voices like Killer Mike singing his praises -- a phenomenon that jaded political strategists could never imagine might influence an election.
So what, you might say?
Well, when Hillary Clinton waits nearly three weeks after the Ferguson protests, long after the flames had subsided, to issue a statement on this polarizing moment in U.S. history (causing a POLITICO reporter to tweet, "Notable that after weeks of rest in the Hamptons, Clinton's come out swinging. The #Ferguson comment was prepared"), many onlookers see such hesitancy as political opportunism. Clinton might very well have been the political equivalent of Iggy Azalea; eager to benefit from the support of African-Americans, but not so eager to risk sacrificing a carefully crafted image in the quest for such support. This lack of loyalty to a group that votes consistently over 90% for Democratic presidential nominees, also comes years after a controversial "3 AM commercial" (Harvard sociologist Orlando Patterson wrote in The New York Times that after watching the commercial, "I couldn't help but think of D. W. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation") and Bill Clinton responding "I am not a racist" after comments on the 2008 campaign trail.
In America, political wonks and number crunchers fuel the soap opera of elections, but rarely provide an accurate forecast for when the first African-American president will be elected, or when millions of voters have grown weary of political dynasties. It's difficult to place too much faith in opinion polls when a 2007 Quinnipiac poll showed Hillary Clinton far ahead of any challenger and Barrack Obama battling Rudy Giuliani in approval rating. Fast forward to 2014 and a poll from NBC News/ Wall Street Journal noted that Hillary Clinton was the early 2016 frontrunner with 50% of Americans willing to vote for the former Secretary of State.
Now in 2015, questions about trust have begun to affect the Clinton campaign and another Quinnipiac poll shows that while 6 in 10 voters felt Clinton had "strong leadership qualities," a majority of those same voters (53%) according to The Washington Post believed "she was not honest and trustworthy." Also, CNN revealed that a Quinnipiac Swing State Poll finds that "voters in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania are skeptical of Clinton's trustworthiness." Recent findings in the erosion of Clinton's image as the clear-cut Democratic nominee also relate to other surveys.
A July 16th AP-GfK Poll states, "Americans View Clinton, Republicans Unfavorably" and a July 15th GOP poll finds that "Clinton trails in battleground states." Within this same time period, a Monmouth University poll explains that Bernie Sanders continues to narrow the gap and Salon noted that, "Bernie Sanders narrows the gap as Hillary Clinton's lead declines by double digits." What was once thought of as an impossibility is taking place, even as naysayers say it might be short-lived, and Bernie Sanders can't possibly continue to stun the experts.
Furthermore, some things can't be forecasted by number crunchers, political strategists, and pundits eager to jump on the bandwagon of political power. When grass roots organizations supporting Bernie Sanders in 2016 have names like Limbaugh's Hometown ("if we can organize in hometown of Rush Limbaugh nothing can stop us"), support for the Vermont Senator is coming from politically astute voters cognizant of the partisan divides in American politics. It says something about the upcoming election that Bernie Sanders has raised 15 million in just two months, without the help of billionaires or a super PAC, and primarily from people who contributed $250 or less.
As a result of a groundswell of enthusiasm that money can't buy, Sanders has surged in both Iowa and New Hampshire, cut into Clinton's lead (something unimaginable even several months ago), and can realistically win both the Iowa Caucus and New Hampshire Primary, as well as the presidency. Killer Mike's endorsement of Sanders might not be part of any aggregate data and number crunching used to forecast election results, but it represents something far more relevant. Many voters are tired of Republicans and Democrats who vote for the same wars, support the same drones that often times kill innocent people, and look the other way when it comes to income inequality. These people will be searching for alternatives to political dynasties and vapid, carefully crafted promises in 2016. They might eventually be searching for the same candidate endorsed by Killer Mike and Americans filling arenas and venues throughout the nation: Senator Bernie Sanders.

Here's Some Real Talk From Bernie Sanders // HuffPo // Dhyana Taylor and Jacob Kerr

Between his large crowds at campaign events and surging poll numbers, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) has so far been the biggest surprise in the race for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination. In the past few months, Sanders has gone from "virtually having no chance" to causing concern for frontrunner Hillary Clinton's campaign.
A self-described democratic socialist who has a lot of ideas and a brash demeanor, Sanders can make some interesting statements. We've collected a few of his most intriguing and most provocative words on a wide range of issues, including marijuana and income inequality.
Here are some of the most notable things Sanders has said since announcing his White House run:
On Youth Unemployment

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We got to put young people to work, we got to give them an education, rather than putting them in jail," Sanders said in an interview on MSNBC's "The Ed Show" .

On The Middle Class

"Ordinary people are profoundly disgusted with the fact that the middle class is being destroyed and income going to the top 1 percent," Sanders tweeted .

On Gun Control

"Folks who do not like guns [are] fine. But we have millions of people who are gun owners in this country -- 99.9 percent of those people obey the law. I want to see real, serious debate and action on guns, but it is not going to take place if we simply have extreme positions on both sides. I think I can bring us to the middle," Sanders said in a CNN interview .

On Free Tuition

"It is insane and counter-productive to the best interests of our country, that hundreds of thousands of bright young people cannot afford to go to college, and that millions of others leave school with a mountain of debt that burdens them for decades. That must end," Sanders said during his campaign announcement .

On Wanting Top Marginal Tax Rate Over 50 Percent

"In the last 30 years there has been a massive -- we're talking about many trillions of dollars being redistributed from the middle class to the top one-tenth of 1 percent. It is time to redistribute money back to the working families of this country from the top one-tenth of 1 percent," Sanders said on PBS's "Charlie Rose ."

On Marijuana

"I coughed a lot, I don't know. I smoked marijuana twice -- didn't quite work for me," Sanders told Yahoo .

On Universal Health Care

"So I do believe that we have to move toward a Medicare-for-all, single-payer system. I think it's not going to happen tomorrow, but that certainly should be the goal," Sanders said on ABC's "This Week. "

On Police Reform

"We've got to demilitarize the police -- we don't need tanks, you don't need heavy military equipment in the communities of the United States. We gotta pay attention to the African-American communities, to poverty so these kids get the education and job training they need," Sanders told Yahoo .

On His American Citizenship

"Well, no, I do not have dual citizenship with Israel. I'm an American. I don't know where that question came from. I am an American citizen, and I have visited Israel on a couple of occasions. No, I'm an American citizen, period," Sanders said in an interview with a D.C. NPR affiliate .

On Health Care And Education

"Please don't tell me that the United States of America, our great country, cannot guarantee health care to all people. Don't tell me that every person in this country should not be able to get all the education that they need regardless of their income," Sanders said in Portland, Maine .

On Campaign Finance Reform

"A major problem of our campaign finance system is that anybody can start a super PAC on behalf of anybody and can say anything. And this is what makes our current campaign finance situation totally absurd," Sanders said to the Burlington Free Press .

On Undocumented Immigrants

"Despite the central role that undocumented workers play in our economy and in our daily lives, these workers are too often reviled by many for political gain and shunted into the shadows," Sanders said at the National Association of Latino Elected Officials conference.

On Bank Bailouts

"If a bank is too big to fail, that bank is too big to exist," Sanders said in Denver, Colorado .

On Raising The Minimum Wage

"Our goal as a nation is that if somebody works 40 hours a week, that person will not be living in poverty," Sanders said in Iowa .

On The War On Drugs

"What I can tell you is this: We have far, far, far too many people in jail for nonviolent crimes, and I think in many ways, the war against drugs has not been successful, and I think we've got to rethink that," Sanders told Yahoo News' Katie Couric.

Sanders makes play for black vote // The Hill // Niall Stanage - July 17, 2015

Bernie Sanders is making a push for support from black and Hispanic voters as he seeks to intensify his challenge to Hillary Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont, has made a number of comments recently aimed at rebutting the suggestion that his backing will be limited to white progressives.

"As a nation, we have got to apologize for slavery," he said during an appearance on a black-oriented Sirius XM radio show hosted by Joe Madison last week. In an interview published this month in The Nation, he described police brutality against African Americans as "a huge issue," adding, "How do you have police departments in this country that are part of their communities, not oppressors in their communities?"

Speaking to the Hispanic organization La Raza on Monday, he noted that "racism has plagued this country for centuries" and drew on his own experiences as the child of an immigrant who "came to this country from Poland at the age of 17 without a nickel in his pocket."

Sanders' embrace of minority concerns and sensibilities can hardly be called opportunistic. His involvement with civil rights stretches back to his youth, when he attended the 1963 March on Washington where Martin Luther

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

King gave his most famous speech, organized financial support for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and was arrested for protesting segregation.

But the Vermonter's recent statements come against a mixed backdrop for his campaign. Even as he performs better than many expected in terms of poll ratings and the size of the crowds he attracts, he lags badly in the battle for non-white support.

A CNN/ORC poll released in June showed Sanders' support among non-whites to be about half the level of his backing among the nation as a whole. The New York Times noted that another survey, from NBC and the Wall Street Journal, found that 95 percent of non-white Democrats said they could see themselves backing Clinton for the nomination whereas only around one-quarter said the same about Sanders.

The lack of significant support from the African-American community, which is so vital in a Democratic primary, complicates the story Sanders would prefer to tell about how he is the candidate of the liberal grassroots seeking to oust the establishment choice, Clinton.

Goldie Taylor, a commentator and former election strategist who is African-American, said that current chatter among progressives included both admiration for the issues that Sanders is raising and concerns "about the homogenous nature of the crowds" at his rallies.

Many, including Taylor, do not doubt Sanders' bona fides. Instead, they suggest that his long history in the politics of Vermont — one of the whitest states in the union — has shaped his priorities in terms of the topics he most frequently raises.

"You have to be intentional about building a diverse coalition of support," she said, "and that is not something Bernie-Sanders-the-candidate has had to do during his political career."

Sanders aides don't entirely dismiss that critique, even as they emphasize his long history of engagement with civil rights issues.

"He doesn't come from a state with a large African-American population, he doesn't come from a party of the country where African-American politics are a daily part of political life," said Tad Devine, a senior adviser to the Sanders campaign. "But he understands it is a very important part of pulling together a campaign for the nomination of the Democratic Party."

Sanders' history also has an interesting footnote in terms of race and the politics of Vermont. In 1988, Sanders, then mayor of Burlington, endorsed Jesse Jackson for president. Jackson went on to win the state's Democratic caucuses, despite the demographic challenges he faced.

Devine noted that Sanders intended to soon tour parts of the United States afflicted by poverty and alienation, including inner cities, and that he was still in the process of being introduced to significant parts of the electorate that knew little, if anything, about him.

"A very important part of that introduction is his commitment to civil rights activism. To Latinos, [an important part is] that he is the son of an immigrant, who grew up in an immigrant-rich community, in Brooklyn. These things allow people to see him in a different light," the aide said.

Even so, however, Clinton has longstanding connections with black elected officials. Despite the tensions that came to the surface during her epic 2008 struggle for the Democratic nomination with President Obama, she is also popular among the African-American community writ large.

In a Pew Research Center poll conducted this spring, a striking 74 percent of Democratic or Democratic-leaning black voters said there was "a good chance" that they would support Clinton for the nomination — a significantly stronger showing for the former secretary of State than the 54 percent of whites who said the same thing.

Strategists who are skeptical that Sanders can even make the nomination battle competitive note just how arduous Obama's path to victory was in 2008, despite his status as the most credible black presidential candidate ever, and the overwhelming African-American support that he received.

"Anyone would have a tough row to hoe to make inroads with African-American voters vis-a-vis Hillary Clinton," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, an activist, broadcaster and the author of several books about the black American experience.

Sanders, he added, "has got a great track record, historically on civil rights, protest, support — we can't take that away. But the problem is he's still coming up against those connections, the ties, that Hillary has, which makes it hard."

Goldie Taylor acknowledged that the 2008 campaign threw up some painful moments between Hillary Clinton and Bill Clinton on one side, and President Obama and his supporters in the black community on the other.

"But I think the Clintons will recover from that," she said, "and I don't think there is a candidate standing in their way."

How Bernie Sanders can hammer Hillary Clinton on the Democrats' top issue // The Week // Ryan Cooper - July 17, 2015

Over the past year or so, the Democratic Party has begun settling on a big new policy goal: beefing up family support programs. Now that ObamaCare has started the work of making health care available for all, support for children and parents is the major remaining hole in the U.S. safety net.

Though she has not yet released a formal proposal, Hillary Clinton has made family policy a centerpiece of her campaign, consistently positioning herself as a pro-family candidate. She focused sharply on the subject during her recent policy address , touting the benefits of sick leave and maternity leave, and the economic benefits of women in the workforce.

Bernie Sanders, her strongest challenger in the Democratic primary, can do her one better, however. In keeping with his blunt, forthright campaign, he can challenge Clinton where her orthodoxy makes her policy weaker — in particular, her mindless valorization of work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As I said, we don't know exactly what Clinton will advocate yet, but it's likely that her campaign will roughly follow the proposals coming out of the Center for American Progress (closely tied to both Clinton and the Democratic Party). In a recent paper , CAP analysts Heather Boushey and Alexandra Mitukiewicz outlined a maternity leave policy taken from Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand's FAMILY Act . It would create a new branch of the Social Security Administration and a small payroll tax increase to provide up to 60 days of paid family leave for parents.

A second plank of the policy is likely to be some kind of sick leave mandate in line with the proposed Healthy Families Act, which would require employers with more than 15 employees to provide one hour of sick leave for every 30 hours worked, up to a maximum requirement of seven full days per year. (Employers can always go higher if they want, of course!)

A third plank is likely to be some sort of quasi-universal pre-K program in line with Sen. Bob Casey's recent proposal.

All this is a good start, particularly in the design of the family leave program. Paid family leave should definitely be a social insurance benefit rather than an employer mandate. As Matt Yglesias explains , opting for the latter design (which resembles what the U.S. did with health insurance before ObamaCare) inevitably leaves out a great many workers, and then becomes nearly impossible to overhaul. It's critical to get the initial policy right, so further expansions are built on a sound foundation.

Sanders can provide three valuable additions (on top of what he's already proposed). First, he can simply aim higher. Sixty days of family leave isn't bad compared to the current zero, but it's pitiful compared to Sweden's 480 days (split between both parents, mostly as they like). America can easily afford 120 days or more, and Sanders ought to be planting his flag in aggressive territory. Instead of seven days of sick leave, 14. Instead of the smallbore pre-K program, a robust and fully universal one .

Second, he can add a universal child allowance. This can be achieved by folding all the various bizarre child tax credits and so forth into a single monthly allowance , distributed on a per-child basis until age 16. By scrapping parts of the welfare state that only benefit reach people, such as the mortgage interest deduction, it can be strengthened further. A $300 per month allowance, for example, would cut child poverty in half at a stroke.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Sanders can challenge Clinton's overall framework. Though she explicitly disavowed Jeb Bush's idea that Americans simply need to work more, she consistently valorized work throughout her recent address . She presented family programs as a way to keep women in the labor force, so as to produce more growth and economic output. She generally presented work, which appeared 57 times in the speech, as a major good in itself.

But while more jobs are surely a good goal in the short term, there are reasons to think that Americans actually work way too much. Matt Bruenig recently came up with a clever way to visualize this . As nations become richer, they generally choose to work less, since they can produce more with the same amount of work. In other words, most nations take some of the fruits of productivity growth in the form of leisure — but the U.S. has not . Since 1970, America's GDP produced per hour has doubled, but we have cut average hours worked by only 6 percent. Compared to peer nations on the economic productivity ladder (like France, which cut its hours by 26 percent over that period), America does more unnecessary work than any other nation on Earth.

Just as Sanders challenged the primacy of economic growth , when all income gains are immediately sucked up by the 1 percent, he could challenge the idea of work as always and everywhere good.

This raises a deep question: What is the economy for? Not, one would hope, simply ratcheting up total GDP to make the number go higher. It turns out America is a very rich nation still flogging itself to work like a middle-income one. We can easily afford a great many more days off — all we need to do is make that choice.

Sanders' "small donor" base: How the fundraising numbers break down // Salon // Zaid Jilani - July 17, 2015

Last night was the deadline for the Federal Election Commission's requirements that presidential candidates report how much they raised in the second quarter of 2015. On the Republican side, this includes sizable hauls that were matched by much larger super PAC fundraising that acts as a sort of loophole to allow billionaires to give whatever they want to the political process.

For the Democrats, the two leading candidates are Bernie Sanders and Hillary Clinton. Sanders raised about $13.7 million. When added to money from his last Senate campaign, this brings him to over $15 million. Clinton raised almost $48 million.

But it is the nature of that fundraising that is perhaps most interesting. The FEC segregates donations into two levels that can be easily deciphered: under $200, typically referred to as "small donors," and over $200. Nearly 81 percent of Sanders' donors fit into this small donor category, making him the candidate who has raised the most from these donors on either side (Ben Carson comes in second at around 80.2 percent).

Bernie Sanders and Donald Trump: Straight Talk on Steroids // U.S. News & World Report // David Catanese - July 17, 2015

The most meaningful moment of Donald Trump's spectacle of a presidential campaign thus far may have come during a solemn evening news conference last Friday in Los Angeles, when he stood silently behind the family members of crime victims.

One after another, a father or mother or aunt spoke emotionally about the death of a son or nephew at the hands of someone who was in the country illegally.

"Nobody wants to hear from us," lamented Don Rosenberg, whose 25-year-old son was struck and then run over three times by a car driven by an unlicensed man from Honduras. "We get ignored constantly."

Lupe Moreno, a Hispanic woman who wore a button with a photograph of her deceased nephew, Ruben Morfin, fought back tears while describing his death: Gunned down at age 13 in Salinas, California, by an immigrant without the proper legal documents.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our children are dying every day. They're being raped. They're being brutalized," Moreno said in raw remarks that echoed Trump's controversial missive about Mexican immigrants last month. Her sister had gone to Capitol Hill 20 years ago to deliver congressional testimony she hoped would spur action to move against those who broke the law to get to the U.S. They're still grieving, and still waiting.

Moreno thanked Trump for speaking hard truths. Then, with a pained look on her face, she scolded the reporters in the room for failing to adequately cover the deaths or describe the perpetrators' legal status: "You're not helping at all; those other candidates aren't helping, either. I wish they had the cojones of our forefathers."

Whatever one thinks of the cannon of vitriol The Donald has spewed at his rivals, the media and his former business partners during the past four weeks, the stories of these families were not only heartbreakingly moving, they helped explain Trump's expeditious rise in the Republican race for president.

His direct, brash and unfiltered rhetoric may seem more suited for a pro wrestling ring than a presidential debate stage, but to party members filled with angst and disillusionment about career politicians and empty promises, he simply sounds real and ready to act.

"In our community, we love Mr. Trump," said Althea Shaw, whose nephew was murdered in 2008 by an immigrant in the country illegally who mistook him for a rival gang member. "We're happy. Because we know he spoke up and said something."

With Trump, there's no convoluted nuance, parsing of words or adhering to politically correct norms. There's definitely no filter. Call it a "Straight Talk Express" on steroids.

And while a gulf separates the two ideologically, the same could be said of Bernie Sanders, the Vermont socialist who's attracting a similar intensity level in the Democratic presidential primary.

Like Trump, Sanders' potential candidacy was once dismissed as negligible, even laughable.

But this summer, the two are drawing the largest, most passionate crowds of anyone in the 2016 fold. Sanders drew nearly 10,000 supporters in Madison, Wisconsin, and 7,500 in Portland, Maine, while Trump pulled in more than 4,000 for a wild rally in Phoenix.

What's more, their poll numbers are swelling: While he still trails Hillary Clinton by double digits nationally, Sanders has come within 8 points of her in New Hampshire and has solidified himself as her chief rival. Trump, meanwhile, has completely consumed the last month of the GOP race, riding his wave over Jeb Bush and to the top of the heap in the latest Suffolk University national survey of support for the Republican candidates.

"They are both mavericks who play to different drummers than the others," says Ed Rollins, a former presidential campaign chief for Republicans Michele Bachmann and Mike Huckabee. "Free media helps their cause along."

Sanders describes the nation as swerving dangerously toward oligarchy. He says college tuition should be free and two weeks of vacation should be mandatory, and offers a straightforward plan to close the deficit: Boost taxes on the wealthy and large corporations.

Compare that with Clinton, who when asked by CNN whether she'd be willing to raise taxes, deflected and then punted down the road to another day.

Sanders doesn't couch his language – and the most fervent liberals love it.

When he told a gathering of about 500 at a recent town hall meeting in Arlington, Virginia, that he would pay for college students' tuition with a "tax on Wall Street speculation," the crowd erupted with 15 seconds of sustained applause.

When he declared that "the Republican Party is literally a fringe party," conservatives blew their tops, but it was music to the ears of the diehard left.

"It's always nice to have an avowed social Democrat out actually talking to people and not hiding under and peeking out," says Madi Green, an attendee who put her hands over her head and tucked it into her shoulder to visually demonstrate the timidity of traditional Democrats.

Pat Mulloy, a local Democratic committeeman in Alexandria, Virginia, says he sensed a pent-up demand among people he knew who were starving for someone to articulate their economic frustration without caveat or equivocation.

"Here's a guy that talks straight with the people. He doesn't have all these people taking polls on what to say. He's telling you what he really thinks is going on. And I think that's very refreshing for the country," Mulloy says of Sanders.

For Marion Stillson of Reston, Virginia, Sanders makes her feel proud to be a liberal again.

"It's nice to attend an event where you know the views aren't mainstream and everybody who's in here agrees with you," she says.

Of course, it's this irrepressible, unguarded approach that will likely disqualify both Sanders and Trump from having a true shot at becoming their respective party's nominee. (Even Sen. John McCain's milder version of the "Straight Talk Express" didn't prove successful in his 2000 White House run.)

What Trump and Sanders do represent, though, is an outlet for the super-engaged, highly ideological party factions who rarely find a way to get inspired by conventional politicians.

And their ascent is validation for a sliver of the populace (Sanders and Trump are capturing between 15 and 17 percent of their party's national electorates) that often feels maligned – or even worse, ignored – by mainstream forces.

At the Sanders event, Jane Touchet had already signed on to organize for the candidate in her county because of the "ridiculous salaries and ridiculous benefits" being accumulated on Wall Street.

She shakes her head unenthusiastically when prompted about Clinton. "I dunno. She's Bernie light," Touchet says.

When Trump said Mexican immigrants are "bringing crime" and are "rapists" in his June 16 announcement, that didn't even go far enough for Jamil Shaw, whose son was slain by the gang member in California.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"To me, he was being nice," Shaw said at last week's news conference. "I would've said they're murderers. My son was murdered. So what he said was really going easy."
Mickey Kaus, an outspoken activist against illegal immigration, says Trump's "willingness to offend comes to be seen as a marker for 'he won't sell out like the others have.'"
That seemed to be Shaw's line of thinking as he watched the pile-on of Trump metastasize.
Other Republicans began to carve out distance from Trump, repudiating his comments and referring to "political optics" as the next general election approaches.
To Shaw, that just meant "they weren't going to do nothing."
"The only person I can see [taking action] is Mr. Trump," he said.

Bernie Sanders Is Turning Crowds Into Volunteers in Iowa // National Journal // Emily Schultheis – July 17, 2015

DES MOINES—The walls in Bernie Sanders's brand-new Des Moines headquarters—nestled between a Hy-Vee supermarket, a liquor store, and a Vietnamese restaurant—are full of the standard field-office fare: district maps of the state, quotes from the candidate, and campaign signs in the window.

But when it comes to Sanders's chances here in Iowa, it's the details that are important: posters on the wall implore supporters to "Sign up to host an organizer," "Sign up to phone bank," and "sign up to canvass."

At an office-opening event Thursday night, the space was humming with activity as about 100 supporters filed into the room, grabbing snacks from a table of hodgepodge items and sitting down in chairs arranged in a circle in the center of the room. Each supporter was asked to fill out a small card with his or her name and contact information and to check boxes about how to "take action" ("Support Bernie," "Recruit 5 Friends to Caucus for Bernie," "Be a Precinct Captain for Bernie ... let's meet!"). Around the walls were the names of neighborhoods or towns—Urbandale ("Bernie-dale," as it was dubbed), Altoona, Waukee—and activists were encouraged to sit near their hometown. Staffers in light blue "Bernie" shirts walked around with clipboards, making sure everyone's information was taken down.

"Bernie's drawing big crowds," Sanders's Iowa director, Robert Becker, told the crowd to applause. "Now it's time to organize ... this is about building an army."

Sanders, the self-described socialist in the Democratic race, may be the last person national political observers expected to emerge as the chief Democratic challenger to Hillary Clinton. But even still, he's drawing massive crowds to rallies across the country and has seen his standing rise rapidly in the polls. To capitalize on the enthusiasm surrounding his campaign, he'll need to do more than just draw crowds—and his team is quickly putting an operation in place in Iowa to take advantage of the people coming out to support him.

In mid-May, shortly after Sanders launched his campaign, Iowa coordinator Pete D'Alessandro was the lone staffer in Iowa, tasked with putting together a team that could give Sanders a shot at winning next February's caucuses. Now, D'Alessandro is just one of 31 staffers—including 24 field organizers—who are on the ground here. That number is expected to rise to 40 by the end of the month, the campaign says.

And as of mid-July, the campaign has 10 field offices across the state, including in all the major cities—the same number as Hillary Clinton's campaign.

"Sanders is impressing everybody with the crowds he's had ... but the next step is actually mobilizing them into real assets for the campaign instead of just chairs," said Grant Woodard, an Iowa-based Democrat who worked for Clinton in 2008 but is unaffiliated in the 2016 race. "Right now, a lot of people are wondering whether this is just a flash in the pan—so I think they need to start demonstrating that this is not a flash in the pan, it's real, lasting power."

Sanders's team has been able to hit the ground running in part because three of the campaign's regional field directors—and half a dozen Iowa staffers overall—came over directly from "Run Warren Run," the effort to draft Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the race that called it quits earlier this summer. These organizers had spent months reaching out to potential caucus-goers on Warren's behalf, and with the Warren draft efforts endorsing Sanders his aides say they're a natural fit for his campaign.

"If you meet a candidate in July or August but don't hear from [their] people with a fair degree of frequency, what are the odds that you're going to have your ardor drive you to a caucus site on a cold evening in February?" said Kurt Meyer, the chairman of the Tri-County Democrats in northern Iowa. "Without an organized effort, a lot of that enthusiasm evaporates."

What Sanders is up against isn't just any well-organized opponent: Iowa Democratic activists say it will be difficult for anyone to catch up to Clinton's team, which has had field organizers in place since the campaign launch in mid-April and now has a total staff of 60 in the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Wednesday evening in Iowa City, a Democratic stronghold in the eastern part of the state, Clinton's team held the 10th and last of its field office "open house" events across the state.

When Clinton came to town last week to attend several organizing events, her campaign touted its outreach metrics in Iowa—including the fact that it has a committed supporter in each of the state's 1,682 precincts, and that it has held more than 3,000 one-on-one meeting with voters—as proof that they are taking the primary seriously. And on Friday morning, it announced endorsements from two top statewide officials: Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and state Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald.

At the Iowa City office, the level of organization—and the extent to which Clinton's team has set up shop across the state—was clear: four Iowa City-based organizers spoke, introducing local elected officials and asking their organizing fellows to raise their hands (there were at least a half-dozen).

"We have the best staff," said state Rep. Mary Mascher. "With our help, we're going to carry her past the finish line."

For former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, the challenge is quite different: to build up name identification by talking to as many potential voters as possible. The campaign's second-quarter filing with the Federal Election Commission shows just four staffers paid in Iowa by the end of June. But since then, the team has grown rapidly; though the O'Malley campaign would not say how many staffers it has in Iowa, operatives close to the campaign have pegged it at at least 30, with staffers in multiple cities across the state.

Also working in O'Malley's favor is the super PAC supporting him, Generation Forward. Unlike other pro-candidate super PACs on the Democratic side, Generation Forward is planning to play an active role in the field side of the O'Malley effort: The group has already opened a Des Moines office, hired a field director and three full-time regional field directors, and has brought on a total of 45 part- or full-time organizers to bolster canvassing efforts, said Communications Director Ron Boehmer. It plans to open additional offices in Cedar Rapids and Iowa City, as well as adding an additional 50-100 organizers.

Osceola County Chairwoman Kathy Winter referred to Clinton, Sanders and O'Malley as the "big three" when it comes to organizing. By comparison, activists around the state say they've heard less from former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia—and virtually nothing from former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee. Webb has two staffers focused on Iowa, but at this point does not have office space in the state.

For Sanders, the test now will be what those organizers do now that they're in place.

Conservative Media Erroneously Attribute Military Base Gun Policy To Clinton Administration // Media Matters // Timothy Johnson and Kate Sullivan – July 17, 2015

Conservative media are claiming that President Bill Clinton enacted a policy that bans guns at military bases in the wake of the mass shooting at a military facility in Chattanooga, Tennessee. In fact, the policy was enacted in 1992 during the administration of George H.W. Bush and does allow guns to be carried on base under some circumstances.

Gunman Opens Fire On Two Military Sites, Killing Four. Fox's Doocy: Gun Free Zones "Started With Bill Clinton." On the July 17 edition of Fox News' Fox & Friends, host Steve Doocy claimed that former President Bill Clinton banned guns on military bases:

Department Of Defense Policy, Which Allows Guns On Bases, Actually Dates To The Administration Of George H.W. Bush

Policy Was Not "Enacted" Under Clinton, Instead It Was "Effective Immediately" In 1992. From the February 25, 1992 directive:

> This Directive is effective immediately. Forward one copy of implementing documents to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Command, Control, Communications and Intelligence) and the Inspector General, Department of Defense within 120 days. [Department of Defense, 2/25/92]

Department Of Defense Policy: Guns May Be Carried On Military Bases "When There Is A Reasonable Expectation That Life Or DoD Assets Will Be Jeopardized If Firearms Are Not Carried." Rather than making military bases "gun-free zones," the 1992 directive issued by the Department of Defense instead describes the circumstances under which guns can be carried on military bases:

> To limit and control the carrying of firearms by DoD military and civilian personnel. The authorization to carry firearms shall be issued only to qualified personnel when there is a reasonable expectation that life or DoD assets will be jeopardized if firearms are not carried. Evaluation of the necessity to carry a firearm shall be made considering this expectation weighed against the possible consequences of accidental or indiscriminate use of firearms. DoD personnel regularly engaged in law enforcement or security duties shall be armed. [Department of Defense, 2/25/92]

The New Republic: Directive "Was By No Means A 'Ban' On Firearms At Military Installations." Following the 2013 mass shooting at Washington D.C.'s Navy Yard facility, The New Republic debunked the claim that the 1992 directive made military bases "gun-free zones":

> What's more, that directive--signed by Donald J. Atwood, George H. W. Bush's deputy secretary of defense -- was by no means a "ban" on firearms at military installations. It explicitly authorizes DOD personnel "to carry firearms while engaged in law enforcement or security duties, protecting personnel, vital Government assets, or guarding prisoners," and simply aims to "limit and control the carrying of firearms by DoD military and civilian personnel. The authorization to carry firearms shall be issued only to qualified personnel when there is a reasonable expectation that life or DoD assets will be jeopardized if firearms are not carried. Evaluation of the necessity to carry a firearm shall be made considering this expectation weighed against the possible consequences of accidental or indiscriminate use of firearms." Support for Sanders Grows in Unions // Labor Notes // Dan DiMaggio - July 17, 2015

Bernie Sanders' campaign for president is drawing impressive crowds to rallies across the country—from 7,500 in

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Burlington, Vermont, to 300 in Birmingham, Alabama.

And it's no wonder that many union members are part of this groundswell of support, or that he's already won endorsements from a number of locals and support resolutions from the Vermont and South Carolina AFL-CIOs.

"It would be hard to find many other elected leaders in state or national office who have supported the issues of working families, working people, the working poor, and workplace justice any more than Senator Sanders," said nurse Mari Cordes, a member of Vermont's Teachers (AFT) local.

Sanders' platform includes a $15-an-hour minimum wage, guaranteed vacations and sick leave, lifting the payroll tax cap on Social Security, and single-payer health care. He's a vocal opponent of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the latest corporate-friendly trade deal. He rails against income inequality and how the "billionaire class" dominates politics.

"It's clear that Bernie, like Elizabeth Warren, has been out there speaking about the issues that are boiling up in union halls across the country," said Larry Hanley, president of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

While he and the ATU have backed Hillary Clinton for years, Hanley said, "Hillary thus far has not offered us the path that Bernie has."

So endorsements pose a strategic dilemma. "We don't want to bruise Hillary so much in the process that she can't win. We don't want to lead our members down a dark alley," he said.

"But at what point do we get our share? At what point do workers get what we had 30 years ago? We don't just get that by saluting the status quo."

An invitation-only event in D.C. on July 13, hosted by leaders of Postal Workers (APWU) and former CWA president Larry Cohen, drew presidents or their designees from 22 international unions to hear the candidate speak.

A similar number showed up for a Clinton event the next night at the home of her campaign manager, John Podesta.

"Bernie Sanders has been a champion of postal workers and consumers, and raising the question of $15 for all as a minimum wage," said APWU President Mark Dimondstein. "On that basis our union will give him serious consideration."

Organizers of Labor for Bernie—a grassroots effort to build labor support for the Sanders campaign—say one goal is to discourage the AFL-CIO from making an early Clinton endorsement.

They argue labor has little to gain from an early endorsement. And they want more time for pro-Sanders activism to raise union members' expectations on the issues being highlighted in his campaign.

They want 5,000 signatures on their Labor for Bernie statement before the AFL-CIO executive council meets July 29-30. As of July 15 they had 3,500.

Sanders, Clinton, Maryland ex-Gov. Martin O'Malley, and Arkansas ex-Gov. Mike Huckabee are all expected to attend the meeting, where the council could endorse a candidate or decide to hold off. Hanley said the ATU opposes an early endorsement.

Presidential endorsements are the national AFL-CIO's prerogative, as President Richard Trumka reminded state and local bodies in a recent memo after the Vermont and South Carolina federations passed resolutions backing Sanders.

AFL-CIO bylaws stipulate that these bodies may not "introduce, consider, debate, or pass resolutions or statements that indicate a preference for one candidate over another." The rule also applies to personal statements by local and state officers.

But Labor for Bernie organizers hope that state and local fed bodies and officers are willing to flout the rules.

So far Sanders has the backing of Electrical Workers (IBEW) Local 2222 in Massachusetts, IBEW Local 159 in Madison, Wisconsin, the Vermont National Education Association (NEA), and Lithographers Local One-L (a Teamsters' affiliate), among others.

"We were really happy he decided to run, because it gave us an alternative," said Myles Calvey, Local 2222's business manager. "Elected Democratic officials have it in their minds that labor has no place to go."

Calvey contrasts Sanders with Democrat John Kerry. Just a few weeks after CWA and IBEW settled a hard-fought contract with Verizon in 2012, he said, Kerry was sharing seats in the press box at a Patriots game with CEO Lowell McAdam.

The Electrical Workers (UE) executive board has also issued a statement supporting Sanders, urging "members and locals to take a serious look at Bernie Sanders's campaign and to consider their active participation in it."

Clinton picked up a big endorsement July 11, when the executive council of the 1.6 million-member Teachers (AFT) became the first major national union to announce it would support her in the primaries.

President Randi Weingarten has close ties to Clinton, and serves on the board of the pro-Clinton super PAC, Priorities USA.

An AFT press release said members had supported Clinton 3 to 1 in a poll. But many members condemned the endorsement on social media, calling the process flawed and shallow.

"I was really flabbergasted. I think it seems so premature," said Candi Peterson, vice president of the Washington Teachers Union, Local 6. She'd never heard about the union's telephone town hall meetings or its "You Decide" website.

"It was the best-kept secret in town," said Peterson, whose local is based in D.C., like the national union. "And that's not typical of the AFT—we get bombarded with information."

"It feels like the leadership did a 'we know what's best,' that their influence with people in power is more important than the members," said Jia Lee, a chapter leader of the United Federation of Teachers in New York City. "The top campaign contributors to Hillary Clinton are the same groups that support privatization of public education."

The other big teachers union, the NEA, opted not to endorse early at its July convention. The Vermont chapter sent a delegation outfitted in Bernie T-shirts, with a box full of placards and stickers.

"People came up to us as soon as they saw our shirts and signs," said President Martha Allen, "and they spread throughout the entire room. We ran out of all our stuff."
The NEA could still issue an early endorsement in October, through its board and PAC council, or in February. Vermont NEA, meanwhile, will encourage members to knock doors for Sanders in New Hampshire's early primary.
Cohen, who stepped down as CWA president in June, is now working as an unpaid Sanders volunteer.
The TPP is among the issues motivating him. Sanders has been a leading opponent of the trade deal, while Clinton refuses to take a position.
"What we learned from the trade fight," Cohen said, "is the gap between what people say when they campaign for the Iowa caucuses and what they then do. I don't think anybody's worried about any gap like that for Bernie Sanders."
For Donna Dewitt, former president of the South Carolina AFL-CIO, the key is for Sanders' message to reach deeper into the Democratic party base and non-voters.
A Sanders event in Columbia, South Carolina, last year drew local leaders from CWA, the Auto Workers, and the Steelworkers. "But the majority [of participants] were young Black workers with the Raise Up campaign, fighting for $15 an hour," Dewitt said.
"[Bernie] was most impressed with them. The Democratic Party is expanding their base in the minority community, but nobody's reaching these young workers. None of these people have ever voted before."
Teacher Susan Sadlowski Garza won a tight race for alderman this year in Chicago's 10th Ward, after Sanders came out to rally with her, mayoral candidate Chuy Garcia, and Chicago Teachers President Karen Lewis.
"His message is basic things: people before money, working-class people are getting the shaft," Garza said. "He speaks exactly what we feel. I know people that are staunch Republicans that are swinging toward Bernie, conservatives. His message resonates and crosses party lines."
Hanley said the ATU is figuring out a process to promote more member involvement in deciding on the presidential endorsement.
"If you don't do that, you're just another logo put on somebody's campaign," he said. "Our real leverage is in, first, organizing our members around a set of beliefs—and then, through our members, organizing the public around those beliefs."

Bernie Sanders is the future of the Democratic Party // The Detroit News // David Harsanyi - July 17, 2015

"The rise of Bernie Sanders is proving awkward for the Democratic Party," contends Politico in a recent piece about the surprisingly popular socialist presidential candidate.
Well, maybe it's not that surprising. And it's probably not that awkward. Politico could have just as easily declared: The rise of Bernie Sanders is a completely predictable outcome of the Democratic Party's trajectory. Or, maybe: The rise of Bernie Sanders portends a socialistic future for the Democratic Party.
After all, while the press had fun detailing every rightward lurch of the conservative movement, not only has the "socialist surge" been a restive force within Democratic Party politics during the Obama Age, but it's been making tremendous policy progress.
Although we rarely frame politics in these terms, as a philosophical matter, we've often been engaged in a debate that pits the theories of 18th-century liberalism — the kind that brought us the Constitution and limited government — against ideas first embraced in 19th-century Marxism. Is there any doubt the left's grassroots is driven by the latter, whether it's intuitively or on purpose?
So Sanders is polling at 35 percent in one recent CNN poll of New Hampshire, even though he is supposedly operating far outside the norms of American political debate. Sanders can draw 10,000 fervent fans at a campaign event in Wisconsin — a number that would be envied by most presidential candidates this cycle. Sanders correctly points out that his positions on higher minimum wage, pay equity and other state interference in markets enjoy high approval ratings with most voters. "It is not a radical agenda," he says. "In virtually every instance, what I'm saying is supported by a significant majority of the American people."
This is almost true.
What is wholly true is that big majorities within the Democratic Party support these policies, and they would probably go a lot further if they could. Hillary Clinton is lucky there isn't a more compelling and charismatic candidate making a more comprehensive socialistic case to Americans, as there was the last time around. The difference between her adopted position and his real one is scope.
That's not to say Democrats are unadulterated socialists sitting around studying communist theorists in their spare time, any more than small-government conservatives are opposed to every state-run program. But today, many prefer policies that would be referred to as socialist anywhere else in the world. And the stigma attached to the word is slowly, and fittingly, disintegrating.
According to a YouGov poll, 52 percent of Americans hold favorable views of capitalism, while only 26 percent have a favorable view of socialism. When broken down further, 43 percent of Democrats hold sympathetic views toward socialism. Democrats are just as likely to have a favorable view of capitalism as they do collectivism. The future does not bode well for free-market fans. According to a Pew poll, 49 percent of those between ages 18 and 29 say they have a positive view of socialism — with only 43 percent having a negative view. Considering the history and connotation of the word, that's quite extraordinary.
Sanders will not win the Democratic Party nomination. I'm skeptical he's even as popular as polls claim. Still, he's moved to the ideological center of the Democratic Party without changing at all. So will his ideas. Democrats will not pull back once they get their $10 minimum wage. They will not be content once universal pre-K is passed. They will not be satiated after the next round of unilateral Environmental Protection Agency intrusions into the energy markets are instituted. And liberals will never concede that health care is now working and so we won't need any more government involvement.

Sanders might be treated as an outlier. But really, it's more likely he's the future.

Liberals Roar As Bernie Sanders Joins Elizabeth Warren On Bill To Reinstate Glass-Steagall // Politicus USA // Jason Easley - July 17, 2015

Two of the most prominent liberals in the Senate have joined forces to take on the big banks as Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) has announced that he is teaming up with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) to co-sponsor her bill that would reinstate the Glass-Steagall Act.

In a statement, Sanders said:

I strongly support Sen. Elizabeth Warren's bill to reinstate the Glass-Steagall Act.

On July 1, 1999, while Congress was voting on the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act to permit commercial banks, investment banks and insurance companies to merge, then-Rep. Sanders said: "I believe this legislation, in its current form, will do more harm than good. It will lead to fewer banks and financial service providers; increased charges and fees for individual consumers and small businesses; diminished credit for rural America; and taxpayer exposure to potential losses should a financial conglomerate fail. It will lead to more mega-mergers; a small number of corporations dominating the financial service industry; and further concentration of economic power in our country."

Allowing commercial banks to merge with investment banks and insurance companies in 1999 was a huge mistake. It precipitated the largest taxpayer bailout in the history of the world. It caused millions of Americans to lose their jobs, homes, life savings and ability to send their kids to college. It substantially increased wealth and income inequality and it led to the enormous concentration of economic power in this country.

I am proud to have led the fight in the House against repealing the Glass-Steagall Act in 1999. Sixteen years ago, I predicted that such a massive deregulation of the financial services industry would seriously harm the economy. I would give anything to have been proven wrong about this but unfortunately what happened seven years ago was even worse than I predicted.

Today, not only must we reinstate this important law, but if we are truly serious about ending too big to fail, we have got to break up the largest financial institutions in this country. If an institution is too big to fail, it is too big to exist.

The legislation to reinstate Glass-Steagall was introduced by Democratic Senators Warren and Cantwell (D-WA) along with Republican John McCain earlier this month. At the time, Warren said , "Despite the progress we've made since 2008, the biggest banks continue to threaten our economy. The biggest banks are collectively much larger than they were before the crisis, and they continue to engage in dangerous practices that could once again crash our economy. The 21st Century Glass-Steagall Act will rebuild the wall between commercial and investment banking and make our financial system more stable and secure."

It is at this point that the obvious must be stated. Despite the support of McCain, Senate Republicans are going to squash this bill. However, the point of this legislation isn't passage. Congressional liberals have quickly become experts as using their minority status to introduce publicly popular legislation that raises the profile of important issues while putting Republicans on the hot seat by forcing them to defend positions that place them in opposition to a majority of the public.

The judging of proposed legislation based on odds of passage promotes a myopic view that ignores long-term goals and the big picture. Liberals are trying to change the public discussion on issues like the big banks and financial reform, but to begin that conversation the public must have the opportunity to become aware and informed. Republicans thrive when voters and constituents are uninformed.

The repeal of Glass-Steagall was signed into law by former President Clinton, who has continued to defend his deregulation. Glass-Steagall could be a thorny issue for Hillary Clinton on the Democratic primary campaign trail.

The post-Great Recession era is not the go-go 90s. Senate liberals are fighting to keep the country from repeating the economic mistakes of the recent past.

Republicans Terrified As Texas Demand For Bernie Sanders Forces Rally To A Bigger Venue // Politicus USA // Jason Easley - July 17, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders has a message that is so popular that he was forced to move a rally in Texas to a larger venue to accommodate the growing crowd.

The Sanders campaign announced the change in venue for the Democratic candidate's Houston, TX rally on July 19, "With turnout projections mounting, U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders' campaign has shifted the location of Sunday's town meeting in Houston, Texas, to the Hofheinz Pavilion."

These events were intended to be town hall meetings, but demand is so high that format has been getting changed to a campaign rally. I anticipate that the Houston event will also be more of a rally than a town hall.

Demand has also forced the campaign to move a Saturday rally in Phoenix to a larger venue, as the big crowds are showing no signs of diminishing for Bernie Sanders.

Republicans should be terrified of Bernie Sanders' popularity because Texas is the heart of the Republican Party. The state is demographically changing, but the reason Republicans should be worried about Sanders is that he is demonstrating the power of a liberal populist economic message in red states.

Bernie Sanders, the candidate, isn't what Republicans should be concerned about. The message that Sanders is bringing is what should strike fear into the GOP. Sanders talks about creating jobs, repealing Citizens United, raising wages for working people, equal pay for women. The Sanders message is that it is time to stand up to the billionaires and corporations and return the government back to the people.

If this message can find support in red states like Arizona and Texas, it can be successful all across the country. Bernie Sanders is demonstrating that there is and huge demand among red state liberals for their candidates. Democrats and liberals in red states are often unfairly forgotten and lumped in with Republicans. Sen. Sanders is making an effort to campaign in front of these voters and ask for their support.
Be afraid Republicans, because Bernie Sanders is showing the country the potential power of liberal populist ideas in red states.

In Iowa, the first face-off between Clinton, Sanders and other rivals // WaPo // Phillip Rucker – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa — The two leading candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination came here Friday for their first face-off of the 2016 presidential race, sounding populist economic themes as they tried to win over the liberal voters likely to sway the Iowa caucuses.

Front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton and insurgent Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) campaigned near each other — although they stopped short of directly attacking one another — ahead of a dinner for hundreds of Democratic activists at which all five candidates for the Democratic nomination are to give keynote speeches.

At an afternoon rally to pump up a few hundred supporters, Clinton sharpened her attack against Republicans. She decried decades of what she called GOP "trickle-down" economics of tax cuts for wealthy people and corporations.

"I love it when the Republicans attack me" over her economic proposals, Clinton said. "I'm just sitting there thinking, 'You have a lot of nerve. We would never had been in that ditch if it had not been for those terrible economic policies and that lack of accountability that you all promoted.' "

Clinton scored one of her biggest bursts of applause when she praised President Obama as turning around the economy after the last recession.

"President Obama deserves more credit than he's given for saving us from the great depression," Clinton said at the rally, held in the basement of the historic Veterans Memorial Building in downtown Cedar Rapids.

Clinton was trying to gin up enthusiasm ahead of the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame celebration dinner, which will be one of the first opportunities for activists here to compare her and Sanders. Her campaign served pizza and opened a bar. One introductory speaker called it "Happy Hour with Hillary." A DJ played pulsating dance music, including "Let's Get Loud," by Jennifer Lopez.

A couple hours earlier, in the grand lobby of the same building, Sanders held a news conference in which he vowed to break up the country's biggest financial institutions and condemned the influence of corporate money, especially contributions from banks such as Goldman Sachs, in politics.

Sanders refused to go after Clinton directly, even when prodded by reporters, but the contrast he was making to her record and campaign was clear nonetheless.

Sanders attributed what he described as the erosion of the middle class, rising poverty and a growing divide between rich and poor to "the greed, the recklessness and the illegal behavior of the people on Wall Street." When one reporter noted that the Clinton campaign had reported receiving at least $50,000 from employees of Goldman Sachs, Sanders was quick to state, "I didn't get any money from Goldman Sachs."

"I don't want Wall Street's money," he added. "You have — and let me underline the word — a corrupt campaign finance system. And obviously what Goldman Sachs wants, what corporate America wants, what the Koch brothers want, is undue influence over the political process."

Sanders also told reporters that earlier in the week he had signed on as a sponsor, along with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), of a bill to reestablish the Glass-Steagall Act, a 1930s-era law restricting banking activities that was repealed in 1999. Progressives have urged Clinton to back such legislation, but despite toughening her rhetoric about taking on big banks, she has not taken a position on Glass-Steagall.

Sanders told reporters that with the six largest banks having assets equal to more than half of U.S. gross domestic product, "We have got to break them up. They are too powerful, they have too much control over the economy, and I fear very much another 'too big to fail' situation, that the middle class will have to bail them out."

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, former Virginia senator Jim Webb and former Rhode Island governor Lincoln Chafee also are expected to speak at the Iowa Democratic dinner.

Democratic presidential hopefuls to share a stage in Iowa // Miami Herald // Anita Kumar - July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON - For the first time this campaign season, the five Democrats vying for president will share the stage.
Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Senator Jim Webb and Lincoln Chafee, a former governor and senator from Rhode Island, will speak at the sold-out Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner Friday night in Cedar Rapids.
Hundreds of Democrats will be listening to hear what the candidates talk about and how they react to each other.
O'Malley was the keynote speaker at last year's dinner, which is an annual fundraiser for the party. Clinton and O'Malley are holding nearby pep rallies before the event.
Ahead of the dinner, two statewide Democrats announced their support for Clinton: Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald. Both were early supporters of Barack Obama in 2007.
"It takes grassroots organizing to be successful in Iowa," Miller said. "I'm proud to lend my support to Hillary Clinton's Iowa organizing efforts. Conversations happening in coffee shops, living rooms and field offices about why Hillary Clinton is the champion working families need are going to make the difference on caucus night and put us on the path to victory in November."
The campaigns of the 15 announced Republican candidates will participate in a United Iowa rally Friday to show that they are united to work together to elect a conservative to the White House.
"For the first time all campaigns are coming together to make it crystal clear that we are ready for 2016 and will all work together to make sure one of our candidates is elected to the White House," said Jeff Kaufmann, chairman of the Iowa Republican party. "There are 481 days until the election, and we're already laying the groundwork for success."
On Saturday, 10 Republican candidates are expected to speak in Ames, Iowa at an event sponsored by The Family Leader, a conservative Christian organization.

Big stakes for 2016 Democrats as they meet together for first time // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 17, 2015

For the first time, the entire 2016 Democratic presidential field will gather together in one place Friday night in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. All five candidates, from prohibitive frontrunner Hillary Clinton to self-funding longshot Lincoln Chafee, will make their pitches at the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner.

It will be first chance for committed activists in the key presidential state to consider their options. And it will also be the first chance for candidates themselves to size each other up, since they're likely to meet backstage and are expected to stick around and watch the other speeches. Candidates will not debate each other, but instead give back-to-back remarks.

Tickets are sold out and the stakes are high, though each candidate will have a different to-do list going in to Friday's dinner.

Clinton, whose strength belies questions about her supporters' enthusiasm, wants to demonstrate that she can captivate the Iowa grassroots and capture widespread support from the party.

Iowa derailed Clinton's presidential ambitions in 2008, and it's the place rivals think she is vulnerable again, though polls show she remains very strong. Ahead of the dinner Friday morning, her campaign took the rare step of announcing two big endorsements, from Iowa's attorney general and treasurer.

Meanwhile, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who has emerged as Clinton's top rival, want to show that he's more than just a passing fad with a low ceiling of support, as rivals have contended. Sanders will need to pull support from beyond his traditional base of educated liberals if he hopes to the win the Democratic nomination.

Friday night, that means appealing winning over stalwart party activists, who have dedicated years of their life to the Democratic Party and may not take kindly to an independent who has criticized the party and done less than most to help its candidates get elected.

But perhaps no one has more on the line than former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is going all-in on Iowa, even though his candidacy remains mired in the single digit in polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley has positioned himself as more progressive than Clinton, more electable than Sanders, and with more executive experience than anyone in the race. So far, voters haven't responded and he remains largely unknown, but he'll try to lay the groundwork for a turnaround Friday night.

Rounding out the field is former Sen. Jim Webb, who is more conservative than the rest of the field and ha broken with President Obama and his party on everything from the Iran nuclear deal to the Confederate flag.

Webb's first Iowa director quit not long ago, and he has to hope his idiosyncratic message resonates with some party activists if he hopes to be seen as a serious contender.

That imperative is even truer for former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee, who announced his long shot presidential bid by calling for a transition to the metric system. Chafee has so far funded his campaign with his personal wealth, raising only $29,000 from contributors since announcing in June.

He's yet to identify a real constituency or rationale for running, so will be looking to find supporters Friday. Like Sanders, Chafee may face questions from the party faithful since he only became a Democrat in 2013.

The event also underscores the dramatic difference between the Republican and Democratic sides of 2016. While the GOP has had numerous so-called cattle calls, where candidates give back-to-back speeches, the Democratic race has been off to a much slower start with a much smaller field.

Democrats showcase all 5 candidates in their field // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – July 17, 2015

CEDAR RAPIDS, Ia. – Friday night's big Democratic party fundraising dinner was considered a bellwether for where the early energy might go in the presidential race in Iowa.

Outside the 2015 Iowa Democratic Party Hall of Fame Celebration, there was a showdown between just two camps — fans of Hillary Clinton and fans of Martin O'Malley. The mostly youthful cheer squads stood on opposite sides of the street, chanting slogans and jumping up and down with campaign signs, trying to out-spirit each other.

The pack of cheerleaders for O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, was slightly outnumbered by those for Clinton, a former U.S. secretary of state.

"But we have more of the vibe," said Kyle Gradford, 16, of Des Moines, who explained that he's a passionate O'Malley supporter "because he supports things I was taught in my household — like nothing's wrong with gay marriage. And he's really personable and everybody can connect with him."

None of the Clinton cheerleaders would speak to reporters, saying that they "weren't allowed."

The five presidential candidates had yet to deliver their speeches by The Des Moines Register's deadline. But all five candidates briefly took the stage to wave at the audience at the start of the event, serenaded by a soundtrack of "We Take Care of Our Own" by Bruce Springsteen.

It was the first time all five — Clinton; O'Malley; former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee; Bernie Sanders, an independent U.S. senator from Vermont; and former Virginia U.S. Sen. Jim Webb — have spoken at a single event. Noticeably absent was Vice President Joe Biden, who is still mulling whether to run for president. He was last in Iowa in October 2014.

It was the hottest ticket in the state for Democratic Party faithful. The seats, many priced at $50 each, sold out in less than three weeks.

The dinner was an opportunity for the four underdogs in the race to try to gain an edge on Clinton, who is running for president for the second time and is the strong front-runner in polling in Iowa.

Despite the cheer squads out front, the real showdown Friday night was expected to be between Clinton and Sanders, who has been climbing in the polls and attracting audiences far bigger than the former first lady's.

Sanders said in an interview with Bloomberg Politics before the dinner that his goal was to win over every guest. "I want all 1,200 people, including Hillary Clinton's supporters, to come out and put on my (campaign) pins," he said.

Sanders has resisted attacking Clinton personally, but said Friday that they part ways on many issues.

"I've known Hillary Clinton for 25 years. I like her and respect her," he said. "We disagree on a whole lot of issues, but we are going to have a civil, intelligent campaign."

Republicans will take their turn in the Iowa spotlight Saturday when they audition 10 presidential candidates — Scott Walker, Donald Trump, Rick Santorum, Marco Rubio, Rick Perry, Bobby Jindal, Mike Huckabee, Lindsey Graham, Ted Cruz and Ben Carson — during Christian conservative activist Bob Vander Plaats' 8½-hour Family Leadership Summit in Ames.

Clinton, Democratic rivals share a stage in Iowa for 1st time // McClatchy DC // Anita Kumar – July 17, 2015

For the first time this campaign season, the five Democrats vying for president shared the same stage.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia and Lincoln Chafee, a former governor and senator from Rhode Island, spoke at the sold-out Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner Friday night in Cedar Rapids.

Instead of attacking one another, they stuck to attacking Republican candidates for president.

"I am never going to let the Republicans rip away the progress we have made," Clinton said. "They may have some fresh faces but they are the party of the past."

Clinton singled out three of the most prominent Republican candidates Jeb Bush, Scott Walker and Donald Trump, for their views on U.S. workers, abortion and immigration. "Finally someone whose hair is getting more attention than mine," she cracked about Trump.

Clinton's speech was one of her most aggressive since she launched her campaign, earning her a standing ovation, sustained applause and chants of "Hill-a-ry."

Sanders, too, was fiery. He started his speech with his voice raised, denouncing the "disastrous" trade agreement pushed by Barack Obama and the billionaire class.

"Enough is enough," he said. "This country belongs to us and not a handful of billionaires!"

His supporters repeatedly interrupt him to agree and bang on the tables. "Yeah!"

"No president can bring about the changes that we need in this country unless there is a political revolution," he said.

Hundreds of Iowa Democrats crowded into the Cedar Rapids Convention Complex to hear the candidates.

The lesser-known candidates were just trying to get noticed. None of them were aggressive in the way Clinton and Sanders were but O'Malley did blast Republicans and big business. "Main Street struggles while Wall Street soars," he said.

The rivals came on the stage together, introduced in alphabetical order, at the start of the program. They sat at separate tables in the ballroom during the dinner and spoke one at a time.

Before the event, large groups of Clinton and O'Malley supporters gathered outside, chanting and holding signs. Some were paid by Clinton's campaign and by Generation Forward, a political action committee supporting O'Malley. Many said they were not allowed to speak to the media.

Mama Lynne, a community activist from Des Moines who said she was being paid by Generation Forward, a Super PAC supporting O'Malley, said she is not worried about his low name recognition at this stage. "Others have been down in the polls," she said.

Clinton remains far ahead in Iowa Democratic polls, but Sanders is gaining.

A Quinnipiac University poll late last month put Clinton ahead, 52 percent to 33 percent. A month earlier, Clinton had a 60-15 lead.

No one else came close last month. Vice President Joe Biden had 7 percent, followed by O'Malley with 3 percent and Webb with 1 percent. Chafee had less than 1 percent.

Clinton, Sanders and O'Malley have all begun organizing staff in Iowa, but Clinton has far surpassed them with offices and staff across the state. Inside, all five candidates except Chafee had tables to set up to sign up volunteers.

Ahead of the dinner, two statewide Democrats announced their support for Clinton: Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller and Treasurer Michael Fitzgerald. Both were early supporters of Barack Obama in 2007.

"It takes grassroots organizing to be successful in Iowa," Miller said. "I'm proud to lend my support to Hillary Clinton's Iowa organizing efforts. Conversations happening in coffee shops, living rooms and field offices about why Hillary Clinton is the champion working families need are going to make the difference on caucus night and put us on the path to victory in November."

Eager to get their say, the campaigns of the 15 announced Republican candidates held a rally Friday to show they are united to work together to elect a conservative to the White House.

"Our message is clear to Democrats in Iowa and across the nation: The Republican Party is unified and ready to put a Republican back in the White House," Jeff Kaufmann, chairman of the Iowa Republican Party, said at the rally. "These campaigns, which are all working to be the next Republican nominee, took the time to be here today in unity. We are the party of innovation and progress, and we will lift up all Americans with a victory in 2016."

On Saturday, 10 of the Republican candidates are expected to speak in Ames, Iowa, at the 2015 Family Leadership Summit, designed to educate conservatives about the most pressing issues facing America's families.

BUSH

Jeb Bush's father and brother have a security detail. Now he does too. // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – July 17, 2015

Out on the campaign trail, Jeb Bush eagerly engages voters looking for a hug, a handshake or a photo. Usually he works a room with just one aide by his side and travels with a team that can fit into one SUV.

At multiple stops in recent days, there's been a new member of Bush's entourage: A bodyguard.

Being the son and brother of former presidents doesn't afford Bush U.S. Secret Service protection -- but given his family ties, the desire for some security perhaps isn't surprising.

According to campaign finance reports released this week, Bush's campaign has paid $9,892.85 to U.S. Safety & Security LLC for security services. Campaign aides confirmed that the money was spent on security, but declined to say if there have been specific threats made against him.

In San Francisco on Thursday, a private security agent dressed in a suit and tie kept his distance, but watched as Bush arrived and spoke at a morning campaign event. Recently in New Hampshire while marching in two Independence Day parades, a different man wearing dark sunglasses and a black, short-sleeved, button-downed shirt kept just a few paces away from Bush and at one point stepped in with other aides to keep a hectoring climate change activist from blocking the candidate's path.

Bush's security firm of choice is based in Severna Park, Md. and provides protection for corporate and political clients, including security at large events, bodyguards for top executives, consulting for large hotels or stadiums and disaster management. Guards employed by the firm provided security for 2012 Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney before he picked up U.S. Secret Service protection as the GOP nominee.

Company president Joseph Funk did not respond to a request for comment.

So far, Bush's security costs are significantly less than several other candidates who travel with security details -- often at taxpayer expense.

Former first lady and secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton remains under the protection of Secret Service agents. She travels in armored vehicles and is always flanked by agents. People attending Clinton campaign events must undergo checks similar to airport security screening. When Clinton marched in an Independence Day parade in New Hampshire, campaign aides kept reporters behind a moving rope line, saying later that the Secret Service had requested the move.

Four Republican governors running for president -- Chris Christie (N.J.), Bobby Jindal (La.), John Kasich (Ohio) and Scott Walker (Wis.) -- also travel with small teams of state police officers, whose services cost taxpayers millions of dollars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Christie has faced the most scrutiny for his security costs. Records released last week show that travel expenses for his security detail cost more than $184,000 in state funds over the first three months of the year. Christie's out-of-state security bill in 2014 cost $492,420, according to state records.

Christie has acknowledged the taxpayer costs, but so far has no plans to reimburse the state. Aides have noted that there is no state law allowing him to do so.

Walker usually travels with a team of two or three burly state troopers. In several instances, the men quickly have formed a muscular wall between the governor and reporters at campaign stops or if an attendee suddenly asked a tough question. Earlier this year, Walker's political entity, Our American Revival, started paying for Walker's political travel, including his security team. But in 2014, Wisconsin taxpayers spent roughly $2.4 million on security for Walker, his family and the lieutenant governor when they traveled out of the state.

Aides to Kasich have refused to say who is paying for the highway patrol officers that travel with him on political trips outside of Ohio.

"For the safety of the governor, his family and those with him, we simply never discuss security procedures or resources," Kasich spokesman Rob Nichols told the Northeast Ohio Media Group last week.

Jindal's security costs appear to be among the largest. In March, the head of the Louisiana State Police said his agency had spent $2.2 million on travel expenses for the security detail during the most recent fiscal year. In January, it cost $73,000 for seven state troopers to protect Jindal and his family during a 10-day trade mission to Europe.

Rick Perry, the former Texas governor, traveled with a state police detail until he left office earlier this year. His campaign expense report showed that four individuals were paid a total of $975. A campaign spokeswoman said that the four guards only provided protection during Perry's campaign launch at an airplane hanger outside Dallas in early June.

Besides Bush, at least one other Republican presidential candidate is also employing private guards: Donald Trump.

The real estate magnate travels with several guards who wear dark suits and radios and earpieces to communicate. On their lapels, the guards wear small white buttons with "TRUMP" written in black letters.

Trump's campaign spending report shows two line items listed as "Security" for $1,000 each. A campaign spokeswoman didn't return requests for comment about the fees.

Jeb Bush: I wouldn't roll back Obama's Iran deal on Day One // Politico // Eli Stokols – July 17, 2015

CARSON CITY, Nev. — Jeb Bush took a tough but nuanced foreign policy stance during an appearance here Friday morning, calling for reversing the ban on concealed weapons at military installations and calling out his Republican rivals for hollow promises to repeal the Iran nuclear agreement on their first day in office.

Bush, looking to position himself as an electable conservative in a sprawling primary field thrown into turmoil by the unexpected rise of Donald Trump, reiterated his opposition to the Iran agreement, which will ease economic sanctions on the country in exchange for a decade of limitations to its nuclear program.

But he stopped well short of promising he'd undo the deal and basically dismissed other Republicans who've done so as panderers, telling reporters that it's unlikely he — any president, really — would take such a drastic step immediately upon taking office.

"At 12:01 on January, whatever it is, 19th [2017], I will not probably have a confirmed secretary of state; I will not have a confirmed national security team in place; I will not have consulted with our allies. I will not have had the intelligence briefings to have made a decision," Bush said. "If you're running for president, I think it's important to be mature and thoughtful about this."

That comment marked a subtle shot across the bow at Scott Walker, who said in his announcement speech Monday, "We need to terminate the bad deal with Iran on the very first day in office."

Bush, who said he'd never have negotiated with Iran in the first place, told the crowd of roughly 100 people at the town hall that he doesn't discredit President Barack Obama for doing so, but for not negotiating harder.

"I'm deeply worried about this agreement because I think it's going to create the possibility of nuclear proliferation in the region and a much more unstable Middle East that will impact us," he said.

Bush opened his town hall Friday with a moment of silence for the Marines killed in a shooting Thursday at a recruiting center in Chattanooga, Tennessee, and then slammed Obama for a foreign policy approach that, he argues, has left the Middle East in tatters, apparently linking the accused 24-year-old, Kuwaiti-born gunman with Islamic terrorism, even though FBI officials have yet to confirm any ties to terrorist organizations.

"We're living in times that are quite perilous," Bush said. "Now we see what happens when we pull back. These threats spread over the Internet all around the world including our own country. I, for one, we believe we need to reengage with the rest of the world, fight barbaric Islamic terrorism in the Middle East and also do what we need to do to protect the homeland, using all the tools available to make it so, protecting civil liberties along the way but make sure, make sure that we keep this country safe."

Bush then pivoted to another issue that'll play well in this western, largely libertarian state, arguing that members of the military should be allowed to carry guns on their bases and at recruiting centers.

"These are symbols of American might — they're targets," Bush told reporters after the town hall event that drew more than 100 people. "This is how you garner attention, you go to places where there's vulnerability; and it's a very powerful symbolic attack on our country and Marines lost their lives. We should be saddened by it but also resolved to create better security apparatus around our own country.

"If Marines were armed, I think other people would have known that and had they known that, they might not have come in."

Bush also took the opportunity to remind his audience of how he greatly expanded gun rights during two terms as Florida governor and argued that allowing more people to carry concealed weapons is connected to a drop in his state's violent crime rate.

"Law-abiding citizens that have the right to self-defense creates a safer place as well," Bush said, drawing loud applause.

A day after taking questions of a decidedly liberal bent from an audience of young tech entrepreneurs in San Francisco, Bush was more at ease in a room full of older, more conservative Nevadans. Before opening himself up for questions on a range of topics, Bush made a direct appeal for their support in next February's caucuses.

"I think you're looking at the next president of the United States," he told the crowd. "And I won't let you down."

He also offered a tongue-in-cheek update on the health of his father, former President George H.W. Bush, who remains hospitalized after a fall earlier this week that resulted in a broken bone in his neck.

"When he starts telling semi-dirty jokes to the nurses, you know he's on the rebound," Bush quipped.

Jeb Bush Says Laws on the Books Already Ensure Equal Pay // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 17, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush indicated Thursday that he thinks existing laws sufficient to ensure men and women are paid equally for the same work, but that he would back legislation in the states to prevent workplace and housing discrimination against LGBT Americans.

Speaking to employees at San Francisco tech startup Thumbtack, Bush faced questions from the audience about a range of issues where Republicans break with the city's largely liberal and libertarian ethos, including equal pay legislation, LGBT issues and gun control.

The first question to Bush came from a former Floridian and gun owner who praised Bush's record on education, but said he disagreed with his position on gun control legislation. "That should be driven by the states," Bush said in reply, adding that he and the questioner would likely have to agree to disagree on the question.

"Wages should be equal, and there are laws to make it so, and they should be enforced," Bush said in response to a subsequent question from one female employee, implying he thought that existing statutes were effective at making it so. The employee cited the oft-used statistic that by some measures women are paid 79 percent of what men make for the same work. Bush interrupted her to ask whether that was the case at the startup.

She replied, "Not in this office," prompting Bush to proclaim, "Thank goodness."

An employee who identified himself to Bush as being gay asked about Bush's position on legislation to ban discrimination of LGBT Americans. "I don't think you should be discriminated because of your sexual orientation. Period. Over and out," he replied.

Bush continued: "The fact that there wasn't a law doesn't necessarily mean you would have been discriminated against." He added that in the wake of the Supreme Court decision to legalize same-sex marriage nationwide, the country must work to carefully balance the rights of those seeking to marry and the religious beliefs of those who oppose those unions.

Citing the frequently-used example by religious freedom advocates, Bush said that in the case of a florist approached by a gay couple, "you should be obligated to sell them flowers, doing otherwise would be discriminatory." But he said that the objecting florist should not be required to participate in the wedding, a fine line that he hopes will appeal to all sides of the debate.

When the employee followed up to ask specifically whether he would support anti-discrimination laws for LGBT Americans for their housing and employment—the next target for gay rights marriage advocates—Bush said he would at the state level.

"I think this should be done state-by-state, I totally agree with that," he said.

Bush 'woefully misinformed' on overtime policy // MSNBC // Steve Benen – July 17, 2015

With Congress unwilling to pass meaningful economic measures, President Obama's recently unveiled overtime policy is one of the year's biggest stories on the domestic economy. Jeb Bush, not surprisingly, doesn't like it, but he may not fully understand it, either.

To briefly recap, under the status quo, there's an annual income threshold for mandatory overtime: $23,660. Those making more than that can be classified by employers as "managers" who are exempt from overtime rules. The Obama administration's Labor Department has spent the last several months working on the new plan, which raises the threshold to $50,440 – more than double the current level.
The policy doesn't just nibble around the edges; its scope includes roughly 5 million American workers. NBC's Kristin Donnelly reported the administration's move constitutes "the most ambitious intervention in the wage economy in at least a decade."
Campaigning in Iowa this week, Jeb Bush said the policy would result in "less overtime pay" and "less wages earned." The Guardian did some fact-checking.

> Numerous economists attacked Bush's statement, calling him woefully misinformed. And several studies on the rule contradict Bush's assertion that the overtime rules would "lessen the number of people working".
> Daniel Hamermesh, a University of Texas labor economist, said: "He's just 100% wrong," adding that "there will be more overtime pay and more total earnings" and "there's a huge amount of evidence employers will use more workers".
> Indeed, a Goldman Sachs study estimated that employers would hire 120,000 more workers in response to Obama's overtime changes. And a similar study commissioned by the National Retail Federation – a fierce opponent of the proposed overtime rules – estimated that as a result of the new salary threshold, employers in the restaurant and retail industries would hire 117,500 new part-time workers.

The Economic Policy Institute's Ross Eisenbrey added that Bush "should be embarrassed about how misinformed he was." Noting that the Republican presidential candidate also said Obama's policy would also prohibit many bonuses, Eisenbrey added, "All of that is exactly wrong – and pretty much nonsense."

On a surface level, it's problematic that Bush would flub the issue so poorly, but it's even more significant in the context of related confusion about economic policy.

Remember, the Florida Republican remains deeply committed to 4% GDP growth – a target no president has reached in the post-WWII era – despite the fact that the number was basically pulled out of thin air.

The former governor still sees himself as some kind of economic expert, thanks to Florida's growth in the 1990s, but as we've discussed before, whether Bush is prepared to admit it or not, Florida's economic growth during his two terms was the result of a housing bubble. In fact, Paul Krugman accurately described it as "the mother of all housing bubbles – and when the bubble burst (luckily for Jeb! just after he left office) it promptly wiped out 900,000" of the 1.3 million jobs created when Bush was in the governor's office.

The economy, in other words, is not Bush's strong suit.

Jeb Bush: Hillary Clinton's good intentions aren't enough to fix the economy // Yahoo News //
Jon Ward – July 17, 2015

SAN FRANCISCO – Jeb Bush walked out of the offices of a tech firm here Thursday surrounded by a crush of TV cameras and reporters, handed his iPhone 6 to the young aide who travels with him, Raul Henriquez, and asked him to call an Uber.

"You wanna turn this on and get our next car before it's illegal?" Bush said to Henriquez, a wry smirk on his face.

It was a crack meant to argue a larger point: that Hillary Clinton — if elected president — would be bad for Silicon Valley and the new tech-based economy.

Clinton doesn't oppose services like Uber, but she did raise questions about the nature of the "gig economy" in her first major policy speech earlier this week. The Uberization of many industries is "raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future," she said.

Clinton sought to position herself as the protector of the financially stressed worker in the new economy, but Bush, in an interview with Yahoo News, said that her approach would stifle innovation.

"Her approach and the approach of the progressive left in this country is all top-down," Bush said. "And if we're going to empower anybody, it ought to be the individuals that are striving for success."

Bush spoke exclusively with Yahoo News after touring Thumbtack, a 5-year-old company that builds software to connect self-employed workers and small businesses with customers who are looking for their services. During a tour of the building with Thumbtack's founders, he told them he had looked at their website and saw that it "works spectacularly." But he joked that he might not sign up for it, "because I've got this unique life I live now where I'm not sure I want a massage therapist coming to my house."

He later spoke to employees and answered questions from them on a range of topics, from protections for LGBT Americans to net neutrality to his record on gun laws while governor of Florida.

He dismissed Clinton's argument that economic growth must be paired with an emphasis on fairness for the greatest number of Americans to benefit. Clinton's speech was based on the idea that economic growth cannot happen without a middle class that feels secure, and that stagnation in wages — as well as the continued lack of family-friendly workplace policies such as paid maternity and sick leave — have left too many Americans feeling like they are one mishap away from falling into poverty.

She also has said she will crack down on companies that don't treat their employees fairly, and spoke in New Hampshire on Thursday about the need for companies to do more to share profits with their employees, though she has yet to give many specifics about how she would address the issues she has flagged.

Bush applauded the emphasis on greater growth and prosperity but argued that Clinton's approach would be counterproductive.

"Look, the best of intentions aren't going to be enough here. It's OK to say we want to fill the gaps, but every time you propose another rule, another requirement, another way to protect people, you make it harder and harder for people to rise up, you make it harder for the first rung of the ladder to be reached," he said.

Bush, like Clinton, has yet to go into great detail on how he would meet his target of 4 percent economic growth as president or what he means when he says that as president he would "start disrupting to create better services and empowering people to make more decisions for themselves." He plans to offer some details in a speech Monday in Tallahassee.

Though it looks like the age-old disagreement between government-centric liberals and free-market conservatives, their disagreement this week played out against the fresh backdrop of the new economic realities. Both Bush and Clinton are battling to seize the mantle of the forward-looking candidate of the future, casting the other as a figure stuck in the past and using the new language of the app-driven moment as they do it.

Clinton, during her speech on Monday, tagged Bush for supporting "trickle-down" economics and a Wild West type of economy in which the rich get richer and regular working-class Americans get left behind.

During his opening remarks to the employees at Thumbtack, Bush countered that expecting government action to fix what ails the economy was going about things backward.

"My personal belief is the interactions of all of us together in a fair and just society with as few rules as possible — not more rules, but fewer rules — will create more prosperity, more innovation, more benefits than the command-and-control, old approach of hierarchical regulations and large government trying to solve problems for us," Bush told the 100 or so Thumbtack employees.

Bush stood on the ground floor of the sleek, many-windowed Thumbtack offices in the hip South of Market neighborhood, next to a large, open kitchen, where a “culinary staff” fixes daily meals for employees. A few feet to his right, a refrigerator housed health drinks and water, but also bottles of craft beer such as Lagunitas IPA and Dogfish Head 90 Minute Imperial IPA.

“The government today in Washington looks more like General Motors in 1975. The government of the future needs to look more like Thumbtack, to be honest with you: lower cost, higher quality, focused on outcomes, really committed to the citizens — in your case the customers,” Bush said.

Democrats countered Thursday by hitting Bush on a series of social and cultural issues. A group created to support Clinton, Correct the Record, called him “stuck in the past” and “anti-Silicon Valley,” based on his positions or past statements on Obamacare (Bush opposes it), equal pay for women (he says he supports it but has shown a lack of familiarity with legislation on the topic), climate change (Bush believes it exists but does not think it is an imminent threat), gay marriage (he opposes it) and immigration (Bush favors a path to legal status for undocumented immigrants but not citizenship).

Asked about the support Uber’s founder, Travis Kalanick, has voiced for President Obama’s health care law, Bush said, “If Mr. Kalanick looked, if he was going to create the system that would be optimal for the people that are taking advantage of his platform, it would be one where there’s nonmandated exchanges, where you have the scale that comes from exchanges, but portability is the driver of it.

“And you have low-premium catastrophic coverage being the norm, and it goes with the person that has it,” Bush said.

Bush spoke forcefully against the deal struck between the U.S. government and the Iranian government to halt its development of a nuclear weapons program in exchange for lifting sanctions. He has already said this week that Obama should have insisted that Iran abandon, not delay, its march toward a bomb. But Obama has said that was not possible. Bush, however, said the painful economic sanctions the Obama administration cobbled together with international partners could have been sustained, despite the argument that many nations in the coalition would not have continued to hold off buying Iranian oil or trading with Tehran for much longer.

“You could have kept the pressure on through meaningful sanctions,” Bush said. “The sanctions that have been in existence now for a pretty long time were enhanced in the last five years, and had they been kept — with the lower energy prices that we were seeing — I think Iran eventually would have negotiated to where the United States wanted them to be,” he said.

“If they wanted to create a civilian nuclear program, fine. If they want to build, if they want to become a nuclear threshold state, no. And now they are, and we’ve legitimized them,” Bush said.

He added that he was outraged by the work of the Iranian government to arm and fund attacks on American troops in Iraq.

“We also have a situation that is deeply troubling to me, which is there’s blood on their hands with American military men and women in Iraq,” Bush said. “And to legitimize a regime that killed hundreds of American soldiers without any consequence, without any recognition that that’s something that should be troubling, is deeply disturbing to me.”

Bush disputed reports that he has been focused on prepping to respond to businessman Donald Trump in the primary debates that begin next month.

“I haven’t been preparing. But clearly he’s going to be in the debates. And I’m going to have to deal with it for sure. My guess is I’ll be a target, but it doesn’t bother me a bit,” Bush said.

Bush said that support for Trump is coming from Americans who are “legitimately angry” about the lack of immigration enforcement in sanctuary cities like San Francisco, where many local authorities do not turn over undocumented immigrants to federal law enforcement. A 32-year-old woman was shot to death last week in San Francisco by an immigrant who had already been deported five times.

“I totally respect and get why people are upset about this, completely. My heart goes out to the family of this precious, beautiful girl that was killed,” Bush said. “But we should solve this problem. This has been lingering now for how long? Immigration reform needs to start with border control and move on beyond that. I have solutions for these things.

“And my campaign will be about leadership, not about trying to prey on people’s fears, which I think is what Donald Trump is doing,” he said.

Bush also said he would support the Pentagon if it decides to allow transgender Americans to serve in the military openly.

“The first priority ought to be the morale of the troops. So if you can accommodate people who are transgendered and deal with making sure the military is comfortable with this, and making sure that the overriding principle ought to be, ‘How do we create the highest morale for the greatest fighting force the world has ever seen?’ — if you can accommodate those two concerns, then fine,” he said.

Jeb Bush Says LGBT Non-Discrimination Should Be A States’ Rights Issue // Think Progress // Josh Israel – July 17, 2015

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) no longer believes that it should be legal to discriminate against LGBT people in employment and housing — but he still does not back federal legislation to remedy the problem.

Bush was asked by a gay employee at a San Francisco tech startup he visited on Thursday about his position on legislation to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity, Time reported. Bush responded by denouncing discrimination in general, but also diminishing the need for legal protections and saying they should be only enacted at the state level.

“The fact that there wasn’t a law doesn’t necessarily mean you would have been discriminated against,” Bush told the worker. Studies have shown that between 15 percent and 43 percent of gay people have experienced some form of discrimination and harassment in the workplace and 90 percent of transgender workers reported experiencing some form of workplace harassment or mistreatment.

Bush then invoked the “religious liberty” argument made by anti-LGBT organizations, suggesting that while a florist should have to sell flowers to everyone, they should not be obligated to do so for a same-sex wedding.

Pressed on whether he would back new legislation to address the fact that 28 states lack laws protecting against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and 31 lack laws protecting against discrimination on the basis of gender identity and expression, Bush suggested that this issue should not be a federal one. “I think this should be done state-by-state, I totally agree with that,” the former governor responded. In January, he made a similar “states rights” argument, suggesting that states should not be obligated to allow same-sex marriages.

Article 1, Section 8 of the U.S. Constitution, of course, gives Congress the power to pass laws that regulate interstate commerce precisely to insure uniformity. The U.S. Senate passed an LGBT employment non-discrimination law in 2013, but House Speaker John Boehner (R-OH) blocked it from getting a vote in the House of Representatives.

Over Bush’s eight years as governor of Florida, he consistently opposed LGBT protections in his own state. In 1994, he wrote that “we have enough special categories, enough victims, without creating even more,” and that “sodomy” should not “be elevated to the same constitutional status as race and religion,” comparing gay people with “polluters, pedophiles, pornographers, drunk drivers, and developers without proper permits.”

Earlier this year, Bush’s spokeswoman told BuzzFeed that his sentiment “from 20 years ago does not reflect Gov. Bush’s views now, nor would he use this terminology today.”

Jeb Bush 'should be embarrassed' by his overtime pay claims, economists say // The Guardian // Steven Greenhouse – July 17, 2015

Jeb Bush has created a flap with another statement about American workers. In an appearance in Council Bluffs, Iowa, on Tuesday, he said Barack Obama’s proposal to expand overtime pay to millions more managers and white-collar workers would result in “less overtime pay” and “less wages earned”.

Numerous economists attacked Bush’s statement, calling him woefully misinformed. And several studies on the rule contradict Bush’s assertion that the overtime rules would “lessen the number of people working”.

Daniel Hamermesh, a University of Texas labor economist, said: “He’s just 100% wrong,” adding that “there will be more overtime pay and more total earnings” and “there’s a huge amount of evidence employers will use more workers”.

Indeed, a Goldman Sachs study estimated that employers would hire 120,000 more workers in response to Obama’s overtime changes. And a similar study commissioned by the National Retail Federation – a fierce opponent of the proposed overtime rules – estimated that as a result of the new salary threshold, employers in the restaurant and retail industries would hire 117,500 new part-time workers. The study also warned that the overtime change could cost the increased US retail and restaurant industries $9.5bn a year, unless those industries made money-saving changes in response.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During his remarks on Tuesday, Bush criticized Obama's proposed overtime rules, which would extend overtime coverage to managers earning below $50,440 a year. Under current rules, employers can deny overtime pay to "exempt" salaried managers earning more than $23,660 a year. This meant that a $25,000-a-year fast-food assistant manager working 60 hours a week might not receive any overtime pay. (US law generally requires time-and-a-half pay for all hours worked above 40 per week.)

"It's this prescribed top-down approach that is the wrong approach," Bush said. "The net effects of the overtime rule will be, if history is any guide, there will be less overtime paid, less wages earned."

Jared Bernstein, former chief economist for vice-president Joe Biden and a senior economist with the liberal Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, said employers might reduce the number of hours many managers work to minimize or avoid any overtime pay.

"If employers want to avoid overtime pay, they hire more workers on straight time and that creates new jobs," Bernstein said. "Even staunch opponents agree with that and disagree with Mr Bush."

In his Iowa remarks, Bush said the new rules would prohibit many bonuses. "If you want to give a bonus to a manager in your store or in your company, instead of requiring higher pay, this law won't allow it," he said.

Ross Eisenbrey, a vice-president of the Economic Policy Institute, a left-of-center research group, said: "Bush should be embarrassed about how misinformed he was." Eisenbrey said the proposed rules do nothing whatsoever to bar employers from paying bonuses. "All of that is exactly wrong – and pretty much nonsense," he said. Eisenbrey and Bernstein wrote a seminal article that helped persuade the Obama administration to change overtime rules.

Bush stumbled into hot water for another comment last week, when he said American workers "need to work longer hours" to earn more. When that statement was widely attacked by those pointing out that low-wage earners already work quite a bit, Bush insisted he was referring to part-time workers only. And many economists have said his statement that he could achieve 4% annual economic growth by increasing hours worked is pie in the sky.

According to the Labor Department, the new rules would expand overtime pay to 5 million additional workers and increase pay nationwide by at least $1.5bn a year.

Some conservative economists have argued, however, that the changes will result in no overall increase in earnings. They say companies would cut the salaries of exempt managers so that with their new overtime pay factored in, their compensation would remain unchanged.

Bernstein acknowledged that employers might reduce the base pay of some managers. But he added: "It's wholly unrealistic to think companies will go to 5 million managers and say 'We're cutting your pay.'

"There will definitely be more wages earned," he continued, "some by incumbent workers and some by new workers who will be working straight time."

Economists agree that many managers will be assigned less overtime because companies dislike paying time-and-a-half. The result: many managers will have more leisure time.

Michael Strain, a labor economist at the right-of-center American Enterprise Institute, sympathized with Bush's sentiments on the overtime rule. "In general what he seems to be saying is that this will place restrictions on firms, how they operate and how they structure their compensation packages," he said. "In some cases the impact will be positive, and in some cases, negative."

Strain acknowledged that the proposed changes could result in more employment – fast-food managers might have their hours cut to 40 a week from 60, and additional workers might be hired for 20 hours a week to handle some of their responsibilities.

Jeb Bush Is Beating Hillary Clinton in the Goldman Sachs Primary // Mother Jones // Russ Choma - July 17, 2015

Over the past three months, Goldman Sachs employees have donated more than $147,000 to Jeb Bush's presidential campaign, helping him to an early lead in what might be called the Goldman Sachs primary. But winning the biggest share of contributions from the controversial, economic-crash-enhancing investment firm isn't going to be a cakewalk for Bush. At least three other major presidential candidates—including Hillary Clinton, who has longstanding ties to the Wall Street giant—have bagged money from Goldman, with two of them using Goldman Sachs lobbyists to raise money for their campaigns.

Bush's biggest rival in the Goldman money chase is his fellow Floridian, Sen. Marco Rubio. Rubio's campaign snagged just over $60,000 from Goldman Sachs. And Rubio has a Goldman insider hitting up his own network of wealthy friends for contributions. One of the three registered lobbyists bundling donations for Rubio is Joe Wall, a vice-president for government affairs at Goldman Sachs. Wall has so far reported bundling more than $90,000 for Rubio.

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, places third in in the Goldman sweepstakes. Her campaign reported raising at least $49,000 from Goldman Sachs donors. Like Rubio, she has a registered Goldman Sachs lobbyist drumming up donations on her behalf. According to the campaign's filings, Steve Elmendorf, a major name on K Street, has bundled more than $141,000 for Clinton. Elmendorf's many clients include Churchill Downs, the NFL, and the Human Rights Campaign—and Goldman Sachs. Clinton also has a history of raising big bucks from Goldman-ites. In 2008, her presidential campaign brought in more than $407,000 from the firm.

At the back of this pack is Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), who has raised a mere $10,100 from Goldman Sachs employee. That's something of a surprise, given that Cruz has a personal connection to the bank. His wife, Heidi Nelson Cruz, is a managing director at Goldman Sachs, though she has taken unpaid leave from the bank for the duration of her husband's campaign. Even so, Cruz's senatorial campaign previously raised $69,000 from Goldman Sachs employees, making the investment bank the fourth largest source of cash for the campaign that brought him to Washington and the national stage.

Among the other top-tier candidates, neither Rand Paul nor Bernie Sanders had any identifiable donations from a Goldman Sachs. (Scott Walker hasn't filed any campaign disclosure forms yet.)

Pro-Rubio PAC Reserves South Carolina Airtim e in Primary Lead-Up // Bloom berg // Ben Brody – July 17, 2015

A political action committee supporting Florida Senator Marco Rubio's campaign for the Republican presidential nomination have bought nearly a quarter-million dollars in ad time in South Carolina in the weeks preceding its key 2016 primary, filings with the Federal Communications Commission show.

Conservative Solutions PAC executed its buys between Tuesday and Thursday, revealing part of the PAC's far-reaching media strategy even as the Rubio campaign announced lackluster fundraising results.

That strategy, detailed in FCC filings aggregated by the transparency project Political Ad Sleuth, show an aggressive push in South Carolina, which traditionally hosts the nation's third nominating event, after the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. The primary, which is likely to take place February 20, 2016, is considered a Republican bellwether. The state's voters often have picked the party's eventual nominee.

The PAC executed the "significant pre-buy" to make sure it could get airtime at the end of 2015 and "ensure efficient use of resources," said Jeff Sadosky, an adviser to the PAC, in an email.

The group's ad buyer, Target Enterprises of California, reveals in communications attached to the filings that it plans to target viewers over age 55 in "all markets" in the three primary states, as well as some in adjacent states, at the end of 2015 and the beginning of 2016.

Although Conservative Solutions is a super PAC that legally can't coordinate with the Rubio campaign, shorthand used in some of the ad paperwork refers to the group as as "Rubio PAC." Conservative Solutions PAC has said it raised more than $16 million through June 30.

PACs and campaigns are generally not allowed to coordinate strategy or spending, meaning a PAC, which can accept unlimited donations, can give a bump to a candidate whose campaign is otherwise fundraising less successfully. In 2012, a single mega-donor, casino magnate Sheldon Adelson, largely propelled former House Speaker Newt Gingrich to a win in the South Carolina primary through huge donations despite issues in the campaign.

The specific pro-Rubio ads that will appear don't appear to have been determined, but the time has been paid for, with 286 spots for January and February, mostly during news shows, costing $244,000.

Conservative Solutions is making reservations so far out that some stations aren't ready to accept them yet. An worksheet for a 27-spot, $36,000 buy at station WYFF an NBC affiliate in Greenville, South Carolina carries a station employee's note that the "order has not been accepted at this time" and will be reevaluated "at a date closer to the election."

Rubio: Iran deal without release of Americans 'unacceptable' // The Hill // Jordain Carney – July

17, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) slammed the administration on Friday for agreeing to an Iran nuclear deal that didn't include the release of three Americans currently held in the country, calling the agreement "unacceptable."

The Florida Republican and 2016 presidential contender sent a letter to Secretary of State John Kerry that said he was "disturbed" their release wasn't part of the agreement. He pressed Kerry to "use every tool at your disposal to secure their freedom."

"It is unacceptable that the United States has reached a final agreement with Iran while innocent Americans languish in the most brutal conditions of Iranian jail cells," wrote Rubio, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. "I am disturbed by how the administration has missed an opportunity to make the freedom of these Americans a priority in your negotiations with Iran."
The administration has repeatedly argued that the release of Washington Post reporter Jason Rezaian, Saeed Abedini and Amir Hekmati, as well as getting the Iranian government to help locate former FBI agent Robert Levinson, is an important but separate matter from the talks on Iran's nuclear program.

But Rubio pointed to non-nuclear parts of the deal, which include the ability to lift the arms embargo for conventional weapons after five years, saying that Iran got "non-nuclear concessions... that will aid its efforts to sow terror and instability throughout the Middle East."
Friday's letter is hardly the first time the Florida Republican has pressed the administration about guaranteeing the release of the Americans currently held in Iran.

In a letter to Kerry in March, Rubio and 18 other Senate Republicans pushed Kerry to "demand their unconditional release as you engage in discussion with Iranian officials."

Rubio, and other Republicans, tried to tie the release of the Americans to the review legislation passed overwhelmingly earlier this year, but were ultimately unsuccessful.

Democrats warned that if that or other "poison pill" amendments had been successful, it could have either killed the legislation, or derailed the nuclear talks.

Cuba celebrating reopening of D.C. embassy; Marco Rubio shouldn't wait for invite // Fox News Latino – July 17, 2015

Havana – Cuba announced details of the ceremony that will mark the reopening of its embassy in Washington, D.C. after more than 50 years of Cold War enmity.

The current Cuban Interests Section on 16th Street in the Adams Morgan neighborhood will become the Cuban Embassy on July 20, an occasion for which a delegation of some 30 people – headed by the island's foreign minister, Bruno Rodríguez – are traveling from Havana.

"The reopening of the embassy," Gustavo Machin, assistant director for North America at the Cuban Foreign Ministry, told a group of reporters in Havana on Thursday, "will be a significant event. After 54 years of broken relations, the Cuban flag will be raised again."

The date of any similar celebration at the American Embassy in Havana is still to be announced. Secretary of State John Kerry, who will meet with Rodríguez during his trip, is expected to be on hand for the Havana event.

Machin said that Rodríguez and about 30 Cuban officials – which will include former diplomats and representatives of sectors such as culture, education, health care and science, along with other organizations and the Cuban Council of Churches.

Also attending the ceremony will be around 500 people in the United States – members of Congress, NGOs, businessmen, representatives of activist groups with an interest in the island and members of various U.S. churches.

Asked whether Cuban-American lawmakers like Sen. Marco Rubio and Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen who fervently oppose normalizing relations with Cuba, were expected at Monday's ceremony, he said, "No, they aren't invited."

"You don't invite into your home people who want to harm you," he added.

Machin said that the ceremony will begin at 10:30 a.m. and Rodríguez – the first Cuban foreign minister to visit the United States in more than half a century – will deliver the main speech.

With the re-establishment of diplomatic ties, the current heads of the Cuban and U.S. Interests Sections, José Ramón Cabañas and Jeffrey DeLaurentis, respectively, will become charges d'affaires until the two countries

Marco Rubio to John Kerry: 'Unacceptable' that Iran deal reached with Americans still in jail // Washington Times // David Sherfinski - July 17, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida has written a letter to Secretary of State John Kerry saying it is "unacceptable" the United States has reached an agreement on Iran's nuclear program "while innocent Americans languish in the most brutal conditions of Iranian jail cells."

"I am profoundly disappointed that the agreement with Iran did not ensure the unconditional release of American citizens: Jason Rezaian, Pastor Saeed Abedini and Amir Hekmati, as well as any progress in obtaining information about the fate of my constituent former FBI agent Robert Levinson," wrote Mr. Rubio, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, in a letter dated July 17.

Mr. Kerry said Friday morning on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that "there was not a meeting that took place, not one meeting that took place — believe me, that's not an exaggeration — where we did not raise the issue of our American citizens being held."

"And in fact, it was the last conversation that I had with the foreign minister at the Vienna center right before we went out publicly," Mr. Kerry said. "We remain very, very hopeful that Iran will make a decision to do the right thing and to return those citizens to the United States, and we are consistently, constantly even now continuing to work on that."

Rubio calls for more intelligence efforts // Des Moines Register // Mackenzie Ryan – July 17, 2015

SIOUX CITY, Ia. – A day after four Marines were gunned down in Tennessee, Marco Rubio warned of the threats of radical jihadists — and called for more intelligence measures to root out and stop domestic terrorism plots.

"This country has lost access to valuable intelligence at a time when we can least afford it, and yesterday is an example of it," the Florida senator said Friday in Sioux City.

"There are people living inside the United States, some whom have never even left this country, who are being radicalized online. Radicalized not to crash a plane into a building. Radicalized to take a gun and kill four Marines at a recruitment station," Rubio said. "And that's the one we know about."

Rubio warned that there are hundreds of such plots, and that probably not all will be disrupted.

"This is a real risk," he said. "Radical jihadists have reached our own country, and they are reaching it online and they are radicalizing people here. And we need to know as much about them as possible to prevent future attacks, or we're going to have more of them."

Rubio said that concerns about domestic intelligence gathering — sometimes criticized as an overreach and an invasion of privacy — are unfounded.

"When you hear of people out there telling you that the government is spying and listening to your phone calls, No. 1, I promise you, that isn't true," Rubio said. "I'm a member of the U.S. Senate Intelligence Committee. For the last four years I've had access to the most sensitive information available to the government. I promise you, if someone is doing that, they should be prosecuted."

Rubio also said terrorists have been allowed to organize in Libya, Syria, Iraq and Afghanistan.

"The more territory they control, the more money they will have. And the more money they will have, the more they'll be able to attack and the more they'll be able to crucify children and sell women into slavery and behead Christians," he said. "These are real risks, and that's just one of the risks we face."

Rubio also cited threats posed by Russia, China and Iran — going so far as saying that the United States is on the "verge of Cold War II."

"The next president of the United States has to be someone that's committed to continuing to have the strongest military in the world, not one that's undertaking dramatic cuts," Rubio said. "The next president of the United States has to be committed to intelligence programs, to cyber defense capabilities, someone that's committed to a strong foreign policy in which our allies trust us."

Thursday's attack "reminded us of how dangerous the world has become," Rubio said. But he also said the United States — with the right leaders and right policies — can rise to the challenge.

"These are our challenges, and they are a lot," Rubio said. "But here's the good news: There's isn't a country in the world that I would trade places with."

AT THE EVENT

SETTING: Lunch at Uncle Buck's Grill in the Bass Pro Shops in Council Bluffs, a town hall at McCarthy & Bailey's in Sioux City and a visit to the Decker Truck Line in Fort Dodge.

CROWD: About 60 people in Council Bluffs drew a mix of Iowa and Nebraska residents, and more than 100 people attended in Sioux City, where it was standing-room only.

REACTION: The audience was friendly in Sioux City, and applauded multiple times, but asked pointed questioned about immigration, abortion and cyber security.

WHAT'S NEXT: Rubio will speak at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames at 10:20 a.m. Saturday.

PAUL

Signs of Stress Build for Rand Paul Campaign // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul had counted on building from the grass-roots base of his father, former Rep. Ron Paul, and winning enough support from the Republican mainstream to compete for the party's 2016 presidential nomination.

Instead, the Kentucky lawmaker is slipping in the polls, lagging in fundraising and losing some of his father's loyalists over foreign-policy disagreements. Campaign metrics suggest he's no longer a first-tier candidate after falling behind the front-runners on all those measures.

The crowded Republican field—Ohio Gov. John Kasich will be the 16th major candidate when he announces his campaign next week—and Donald Trump's surge in recent polls have made it tougher for Mr. Paul to win media attention. No billionaire donor has emerged to singularly fund his super PAC, leaving Mr. Paul more dependent than any other GOP candidate on small donors.

Paul campaign officials said they are meeting their fundraising goals and are satisfied with their current standing in the polls because he is still among the top candidates in Iowa and New Hampshire, home to the nation's first two nominating contests. Though Mr. Paul has lost ground in national polling, he remains likely to qualify for the first two presidential debates. Those platforms will give a broad audience of voters an unfiltered look at their candidate. Mr. Paul's aides declined to make him available for an interview.

Like his father, Mr. Paul finds the sort of schmoozing required to court big donors unpleasant. While his top rivals spent the past year making inroads with wealthy Republicans who are now helping their campaigns, Mr. Paul didn't. "He finds the fundraising distasteful and hasn't put in the investment," said a source familiar with Mr. Paul's political operation.

The result was a second-quarter fundraising number that has Mr. Paul looking more like his father's idealistic-but-doomed-to-lose campaign than a serious contender for the nomination.

He raised $2.1 million in this year's second quarter from donors who gave $200 or more, less than the $2.3 million his father received in same period in 2012. Mr. Paul also transferred $1.6 million from his Senate campaign accounts to boost his total fundraising to $6.9 million.

"Rand Paul should be doing much better," conservative pundit Erick Erickson wrote Thursday. "He actually has positions that set him apart from the GOP field. He has a built in base of support from his father. But remarkably it appears Rand Paul will be less a factor on 2016 than his dad was in 2012."

Mr. Paul's campaign maintains it is less critical for him to match the fundraising pace set by others because of his small-donor base. That was the bright spot in his financial disclosure report that showed he received $3.2 million from donors who gave less than $200. That is about $1 million more than his father raised during the same period four years ago from an army of small donors who ultimately generated $41 million for his 2012 race.

"Rand's fundraising surged with grass-roots supporters because average Americans know he's the candidate who will stand up to the Washington machine. His median donation was $25 because he's funded by Main Street, not the special interests," said Chip Englander, Mr. Paul's campaign manager.

Still, with such a crowded field, competition for even the smallest checks is fierce. Rand Paul's take was $2.5 million less than that of retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, who began his campaign a month after Mr. Paul did.

Drew Ivers, who was the Iowa chairman for Ron Paul's 2008 and 2012 presidential campaigns, is uncommitted so far in the 2016 race. He said Rand Paul has lost a substantial portion of his father's following because he has deviated from his father's isolationist foreign-policy view.

While Ron Paul backs the nuclear agreement with Iran, Rand Paul is opposed. Ron Paul called for decreasing military spending; Rand Paul is for increasing the military's budget. Ron Paul blames the U.S. and European powers for the troubles in Ukraine; Rand Paul last year wrote an op-ed in Time magazine saying "Putin must be punished."

"Rand needs to be articulating the negatives of our foreign policy. But he has chosen not to articulate that," Mr. Ivers said. "These kinds of things would energize his base but he has moved away from them."

While other candidates saw their standings jump after formally entering the campaign, Mr. Paul didn't after his April announcement. The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll last month found 45% of Republican primary voters couldn't see themselves backing Mr. Paul, the third-most negative reading in the survey behind Mr. Trump and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie .

He's also seen a steep drop in other polls. Mr. Paul was drawing support in double figures throughout 2014. His support now is consistently below 10%, and a USA Today poll released this week showed him at just 4% among likely 2016 Republican primary voters
Mr. Paul is tied for second in Iowa with Mr. Bush in the Real Clear Politics polling average. The same measure of New Hampshire polls shows Mr. Paul in fourth place.
"He is going to have to change something in order to turn his campaign around," Mr. Ivers said. "Right now there doesn't appear to be a recognition by his national staff of the need to correct course."
Paul campaign officials declined to respond to those comments.

Rand Paul may hold up highway bill over Planned Parenthood // Politico // Heather Caygle - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul is the latest lawmaker to throw a wrench into delicate transportation bill negotiations, suggesting he might hold up the legislation over the controversial Planned Parenthood video that surfaced this week.
The Kentucky Republican and presidential candidate released multiple statements Friday promising to use "all legislative vehicles" to "defeat and defund Planned Parenthood" next week. The statements on his Senate and campaign websites don't directly mention the pending highway and transit legislation, but it is the next big-ticket item on the Senate's to-do list, with a procedural vote set for Tuesday.
"The recent revelation that this taxpayer-funded organization is selling body parts of the unborn further proves that this agency deserves our scorn not our tax dollars," he said in a statement. "I plan to do whatever I can to stop them and will introduce an amendment to pending Senate legislation to immediately strip every dollar of Planned Parenthood funding."
Paul is just the latest Republican to weigh in on the controversy, which has riled up the GOP base after abortion-rights opponents released an undercover video that allegedly shows an executive of the health care nonprofit talking about the sale of fetal tissue from terminated pregnancies.
Planned Parenthood has denounced the video as "heavily edited" and says the executive was talking about donations of fetal tissue for medical research, and adds that the organization does not profit from the donations.
But the group has also apologized for the lack of "compassion" the executive showed in the video, in which she's shown eating salad and drinking wine while discussing dollar figures.
Other GOP lawmakers have threatened to hold up the infrastructure bill over concerns that Democrats will use it as a vehicle to bring back the Export-Import Bank.

Rand Paul Campaign: Christie's Chattanooga Shooting Comments "False," "Shameful" // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – July 17, 2015

The chief strategist for Rand Paul's presidential campaign told BuzzFeed News on Friday that Chris Christie's comments linking Paul's position on government surveillance to the shootings in Chattanooga, Tennessee were "disgusting," "shameful", and patently false."

The New Jersey governor and Republican presidential candidate said Thursday's shooting in Tennessee that left four Marines dead was an example of "why I've been arguing against the rollbacks in our intelligence capability that Senator Paul has advocated for."

Asked for comment, Doug Stafford of Paul's campaign said it was "disgusting" for Christie "to seek to use a tragedy like this."

"From transportation to national security, Gov. Christie has a long record of political stunts and cheap shots," Stafford wrote in an e-mail. "It is disgusting for him to seek to use a tragedy like this to launch a shameful and patently false attack."

Paul vows push to defund Planned Parenthood next week // The Hill // Peter Sullivan - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said Friday that he will demand a vote next week on defunding Planned Parenthood after a viral video, setting up a possible fight on the issue.
A statement from Paul's office says that he will "use all legislative vehicles at his disposal" and the timeframe is the "coming week."
That declaration raises the prospect that Paul, a presidential candidate, could seek to attach the measure to must-pass legislation like an extension of the federal highway program ahead of the July 31 deadline.
Democrats are sure to seek to block attempts to cut off federal funding for Planned Parenthood.
However, Republicans think they have momentum after the release of the video this week, which shows a Planned Parenthood executive candidly discussing the donation of fetal organs.
The group's president, Cecile Richards, apologized for the official's tone on Thursday, but defended the group's actions. She said the group helps with the donation of fetal tissue for medical research, does not profit from it, and follows the law.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans, though, have strongly denounced the video and are planning to move up the timeline for a 20-week abortion ban in the Senate after the August recess.
"The continued disregard and disrespect for human life at Planned Parenthood, a partially taxpayer-funded organization, is shocking and appalling," Paul said. "Recent video revelations, involving potentially criminal activity, make it more obvious than ever that this organization has absolutely zero respect for the sanctity of human life and is an affront to the most basic human dignity enshrined in our founding documents."
He vowed to cut off federal funding.
"Not one more taxpayer dollar should go to Planned Parenthood and I intend to make that goal a reality," he said.
'What the hell happened to Rand Paul?' // MSNBC // Anthony Terrell and Mark Murray - July 17, 2015

Just a year ago, if he wasn't considered a leading prospective presidential candidate, he certainly was an interesting one — given his libertarianism and less-hawkish views on foreign policy. But now that the presidential contest is well under way, Rand Paul has gone missing — both figuratively and literally — from a big part of the 2016 conversation.
"What the hell happened to Rand Paul?" asked prominent conservative writer Erick Erickson.
But Paul's campaign team argues that this absence from the campaign conversation is by design — to play the long delegate game, and to avoid sharing the crowded space with other Republican presidential candidates.
For Paul, there have been two kinds of absences. The first has been away from the candidate "cattle calls" other presidential hopefuls have attended.
For instance, back in June, seven GOP hopefuls (Scott Walker, Marco Rubio, Rick Perry, Mike Huckabee, Ben Carson, Carly Fiorina, Lindsey Graham) were in Iowa attending Senator Joni Ernst's Roast and Ride, but Paul ditched the event to be in New Hampshire to host four "Stand with Rand" meet and greets across the Granite State.
Later in the month, Walker, Perry, Huckabee, Carson, Santorum, Pataki were in Colorado at the Western Conservative Summit, but Paul was fundraising and meeting with winners of his campaign's "Hackathon" in Monterey, California.
And this Saturday, Paul will be a no-show — again — at the Family Leader summit in Iowa, where Walker, Rubio, Carson, Ted Cruz, Huckabee and Donald Trump will speak. Instead, Paul will be attending a fundraiser in Houston.
Why the different campaign scheduling? According to multiple conversations with the Paul campaign, the candidate is playing the long delegate game — thus campaigning in states beyond the early contests of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.
Indeed, advisers point to his non-traditional campaign stops in Michigan, Colorado, Illinois and California.
The second absence for Paul has been away from the political conversation of the day, especially on subjects tricky for the libertarian-leaning candidate who wants to reach out to minorities, and who holds less hawkish foreign-policy views in an increasingly hawkish Republican Party.
He was late to weigh in on removing the Confederate flag from South Carolina's statehouse grounds (he eventually said it should be removed); on the Supreme Court's opinion legalizing gay marriage (he eventually said government shouldn't be in the marriage business at all); and on President Obama's Iran nuclear deal (he eventually said he opposed it).
Yet Paul's team says its strategy is standing apart from the pack. While the responses to various events from rival Republican candidates get lumped together in articles and television segments, the campaign believes that Paul's responses (despite being delayed) get their own coverage — without having to share the page or screen time with rivals.
It also stresses that there's an advantage to taking time to respond to complicated issues.
"No one takes bolder stands than Senator Rand Paul," said Doug Stafford, the Paul campaign's chief strategist. "Whether it's scrapping the entire tax code, taking on the Washington machine, filibustering for his principles, Sen. Rand Paul has led on issue after issue during his time in DC."
Stafford added, "He also believes in being thoughtful, reading bills or decisions, and generally not reducing complicated policy matters to knee-jerk reactions or bumper-sticker solutions. There's something to be said for making sure he has both the right diagnosis and prescription on an issue, instead of racing to see who can tweet about it first."
Still, maybe Paul's biggest challenge in the GOP presidential field is being considered a more dovish foreign-policy candidate in an increasingly hawkish Republican Party.
In fact, an April NBC News/Wall Street Journal found that the top priority for national GOP primary voters was national security and terrorism — ahead of job creation and the deficit.
"The issue set for him hasn't been good," said a GOP operative from a rival campaign. "More than health care, the president's record on foreign policy is one thing that really unifies Republicans."
In other words, a Rand Paul in the Age of ISIS might not have the same punch inside his party that Paul in the Age of Edward Snowden did back in 2013 and 2014.

Rand Paul: "We Have Had No Shortage Of Money" // Buzzfeed // Rosie Gray – July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOUSTON — Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul downplayed his lackluster fundraising on Friday, arguing that he is polling well and that his campaign has "plenty of money."

"We're raising plenty of money and I think there'll be a crescendo as we get into debates and can separate ourselves from the others," Paul said in an interview with BuzzFeed News after a campaign rally in downtown Houston. "We have had no shortage of money."

Paul's campaign reported $6.9 million raised in the latest fundraising totals released after the FEC's second quarter deadline. The main super PAC supporting his bid has not yet released its numbers. By contrast, rival candidate Ted Cruz has raised $14 million and Marco Rubio $12 million. While Jeb Bush raised just $11 million for his campaign itself, his super PAC raised a staggering $100 million.

The disappointing haul has been taken as a sign that Paul's iconoclastic bid has stopped creating as much buzz as it once did. "What the hell happened to Rand Paul?" conservative writer Erick Erickson wrote this week. "Rand Paul should be doing much better. He actually has a good story. He actually has positions that set him apart from the GOP field. He has a built in base of support from his father. But remarkably it appears Rand Paul will be less a factor on 2016 than his dad was in 2012."

NBC News led with the following on a story about Paul on Friday: "Remember Rand Paul?"

There are hopeful signs for Paul in the money race, particularly when it comes to grassroots support. Nearly half of his total — $3.2 million — came from small-dollar donors giving $200 or less.

"There's something to be said for having hundreds of thousands of donors that are small donors who can give again," Paul told BuzzFeed News. "When I ran for Senate I had someone who gave me thirteen dollars and 66 cents every two weeks for two years. So I've had people who are working class, making thirty, forty thousand dollars a year, become a maximum donor by giving a little bit out of each check.

"We have a really committed crowd," Paul said. "On a workday here, we have 800 people, which is pretty impressive."

However, Paul hasn't been able to bag a benevolent moneyman like the other top tier candidates. His network has looked to Silicon Valley as a potential fount of big money, but so far, key potential donors like Peter Thiel and Sean Parker haven't come through. And his positions on national security alienate the pro-Israel donor class from considering him.

Paul believes he's doing well regardless.

"We actually think we're in a great place," he said. "In poll after poll after poll we've been in the top tier. We've led some national polls, they go up and down, there's a new leader each week."

Paul is in Texas, his home state, this weekend for the rally in Houston and fundraisers and private meetings.

In wake of video, Paul renews call to cut off Planned Parenthood funding // USA Today // Tom Loftus - July 17, 2015

Responding to a controversial video released by an anti-abortion group this week, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul on Friday renewed his call to end federal funding of Planned Parenthood.
"The recent revelation that this taxpayer-funded organization is selling body parts of the unborn further proves that this agency deserves our scorn, not our tax dollars," Paul said in a news release from his presidential campaign. His Senate office released a similar statement.
Paul's statements refer to a video released by the California-based Center for Medical Progress that show a Planned Parenthood official talking about parts of aborted fetuses. The Center for Medical Progress says the video documents that Planned Parenthood sells fetal tissue for profit.
But Planned Parenthood says the charge is false. "The allegation that Planned Parenthood profits in any way from tissue donation is not true. Our donation programs, like any other high quality health care provider's, follow all laws and ethical guidelines," said Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, says in statement posted on the Planned Parenthood website.
Richards apologized for the tone of comments made in the video by a Planned Parenthood official – a tone she said that does not reflect "the compassionate care that we provide."
Paul joins a chorus of conservative elected officials who have denounced Planned Parenthood because of the controversial video. Paul said that next week he will introduce an amendment to pending legislation "to immediately strip every dollar of Planned Parenthood funding." He said Planned Parenthood received about $528 million in taxpayer funding in 2013-14.

After sagging in fundraising, Rand Paul 2.0 reboots campaign // Los Angeles Times // Lisa Mascaro - July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Rand Paul began charting his presidential run, the Ray-Ban-wearing senator and heir apparent to a libertarian legacy rebranded himself to suit more mainstream Republican tastes.

He rejected his famous father's isolationist foreign policy, voted for more military spending and even campaigned in front of an aircraft carrier. He invited a Christian broadcasting network into his home and spoke against gay marriage, famously pronouncing himself "libertarian-ish."

But it turned out that Rand Paul 2.0 had a glitch: Appeal was limited.

After flatlining in the polls and lagging rivals in fundraising, Paul's campaign heeded a market lesson repeatedly applied in American politics. They brought back the original.

The Kentucky senator has pivoted back to his familiar stomping grounds among the outliers of Republican politics.

In May he infuriated some fellow Republicans by delivering a 10½-hour speech to protest Patriot Act provisions on NSA domestic spying. Last month he became the first presidential candidate to openly court money from the legalized marijuana industry and shared a moment with Nevada rancher Cliven Bundy, known for his standoff with federal agents in 2014 and for his divisive comments about minorities.

"Out of necessity he's moving back to his base, which is a sign the strategy he adopted was the wrong strategy," said Aaron Day, chairman of the New Hampshire chapter of the Republican Liberty Caucus, a nationwide libertarian-leaning organization within the GOP. "He needs the grass-roots — and they know this now."

Rand's campaign denied any rebooting of his message or positions, and insisted that he never intended to replicate the campaigns of his father, the former Texas GOP congressman and presidential candidate Ron Paul. "There has been no change, no pivot," said campaign manager Chip Englander. "He has the same view he's always had."

But as Paul tried to navigate a more crowd-pleasing course, he ended up in no-man's land, disappointing core activists while failing to generate enthusiasm from the party's mainstream.

The result left him "on an island," said one strategist from a rival Republican campaign who did not want to be identified speaking about Paul. "He's played this footsie game with … the establishment for so long and you can see him make this pivot back."

The challenge now facing Paul in the crowded GOP field is whether he can reignite the spark among libertarians who feel betrayed by his shifts, without alienating those Republicans potentially receptive to his call for limited government.

"That's the line he has to walk here," said Tom Rath, a Republican strategist in New Hampshire. "He strays too far and you get people saying, 'Who are you?'"

The stakes are even higher as other candidates pile into the race, eager to portray Paul's libertarian-leaning views as extreme. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, in particular, is targeting Paul on the campaign trail, saying the senator's filibuster-like maneuver, which temporarily prevented the National Security Agency from accessing Americans' telephone records, resulted in a dangerous surveillance lapse that put the country at risk.

Fundraising for Paul has been lackluster, especially because his team has not lassoed a big-dollar donor like the billionaires bankrolling other candidates.

The campaign reported $7 million for the quarter ended June 30, compared with about $14 million for Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), $12 million for Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and $11 million for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. A "super PAC" backing Paul had hoped that his marathon Patriot Act speech would produce a high-value Silicon Valley donor, but one has failed to materialize.

So, while outside groups for Bush pushed his overall second-quarter haul to more than $114 million, followed by Cruz at $52 million and Rubio at $44 million, the main super PAC supporting Paul has not yet released its fundraising totals.

Paul's campaign acknowledges that his libertarian base is his top priority even as he tries to build a new coalition, much the way President Obama turned out first-time younger voters and minorities. That means that even as Paul popped into a West Michigan happy hour with tea party Congressman Justin Amash, he also spent time in Detroit with African American civic leaders, "taking our message to places where the GOP usually doesn't go," said campaign spokesman Sergio Gor.

With 15 GOP candidates already in the race, Paul's campaign is betting it's better to be loved by a few than liked by many, particularly in a fractured field.

But recapturing the imagination of libertarian-leaning voters who have grown skeptical of Paul is proving more difficult. In New Hampshire, a state that Paul's campaign hopes will catapult his bid, the liberty caucus leaders are openly fretting that celebrity candidate Donald Trump has emerged as a top of choice for many in their wing, a concern also raised by some in Nevada, once prime Paul territory.

Paul's May talk-a-thon against the government's surveillance program went a long way toward restoring his appeal and reenergize fans, and his new flat-tax proposal could please both mainstream and tea party camps in the GOP.

But his June marijuana industry fundraiser in Denver, where pot entrepreneurs paid a minimum of $2,700 to hear him speak, may not go over well with Republicans in Iowa, who tend to be more socially conservative. His friendly rapport with rancher Bundy — who once speculated that "the Negro" was better off under slavery — could give voters pause in other states.

"There's going to be some trickiness in satisfying everyone who was your father's supporter," said Craig Robinson, a former Iowa Republican Party political director who now runs a popular blog. "When you start going down those libertarian rabbit trails too far, it's going to be trouble."

Polling shows that Paul still ranks in the top 10 among the Republican presidential hopefuls; he tied for second behind Trump earlier this month in an Economist/YouGov poll. His campaign points to other surveys showing him competitive with Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton, beating her in Iowa in a Quinnipiac University poll shortly after he announced his candidacy in April.

Nick Gillespie, editor of the libertarian Reason.com, said Paul does best when he stakes out classic libertarian positions to distinguish himself from the other candidates.
"All of the moments where he stands out — where he captures not just the political imagination, but the public American imagination — are the most libertarian," Gillespie said.
Paul to host Houston rally, book signing today // Chron // Rebecca Elliott - July 17, 2015

U.S. Sen. Rand Paul is bringing his presidential campaign to Houston Friday, where he's set to host a "Stand with Rand" rally and book signing.
According to his campaign, Paul will address "the importance of protecting the entire Bill of Rights, and being boldly for conservative ideals that limit the power of the Washington Machine."
The first-term senator from Kentucky, a Texas native , will also be fundraising while in Houston.
Paul's rally begins at 2:45 p.m. at the Hyatt Regency, downtown.
Rand Paul Bringing Abortion Politics to Highway Bill Debate // Roll Call // Niels Lesniewski - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul appears to be plotting to bring the debate over abortion to the highway bill.
The Kentucky Republican's presidential campaign said Friday he would be seeking an amendment vote on blocking federal funding for Planned Parenthood next week.
"The recent revelation that this taxpayer-funded organization is selling body parts of the unborn further proves that this agency deserves our scorn not our tax dollars. I plan to do whatever I can to stop them and will introduce an amendment to pending Senate legislation to immediately strip every dollar of Planned Parenthood funding," Paul said in a campaign statement.
The pending business before the Senate next week is a bipartisan surface transportation bill, a measure expected to be open for amendment. And unlike the House, the Senate has no general germaneness requirement, so Paul should have the opportunity to at least make a stand to get his vote.
"The continued disregard and disrespect for human life at Planned Parenthood, a partially taxpayer-funded organization, is shocking and appalling," Paul said through his Senate office. "Recent video revelations, involving potentially criminal activity, make it more obvious than ever that this organization has absolutely zero respect for the sanctity of human life and is an affront to the most basic human dignity enshrined in our founding documents. Not one more taxpayer dollar should go to Planned Parenthood and I intend to make that goal a reality."
Paul's Senate office said the Kentuckian was prepared to use any available procedural tools to ensure his measure gets a vote on the floor.
While Paul's views are often described as libertarian, he has consistently opposed abortion rights. The new push comes in response to a video from the anti-abortion advocacy group Center for Medical Progress about what Planned Parenthood has done with organs and tissue from aborted fetuses — something that's received a flurry of attention on Capitol Hill.
Another Republican presidential candidate, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, is the lead sponsor of the Senate's legislation to bar abortions after 20 weeks into a pregnancy. Majority Leader Mitch McConnell , R-Ky., pledged in June that the measure would get a vote before the Senate, but no action has been scheduled.
Rand Paul to mount fight to defund Planned Parenthood // Washington Times // David Sherfinski - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky is planning a push next week to fully ban federal funding for Planned Parenthood, with his office saying the 2016 GOP presidential contender will use "all legislative vehicles at his disposal" to ensure immediate action.
"I am more appalled than ever by Planned Parenthood's complete disregard for the sanctity of human life," Mr. Paul said. "The recent revelation that this taxpayer-funded organization is selling body parts of the unborn further proves that this agency deserves our scorn, not our tax dollars.
"I plan to do whatever I can to stop them and will introduce an amendment to pending Senate legislation to immediately strip every dollar of Planned Parenthood funding," he said.
Cecile Richards, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, has apologized after an undercover video was released earlier this week showing Dr. Deborah Nucatola, senior director of medical services at Planned Parenthood, describe how she performs abortions to preserve fetal organs.
Ms. Richards also defended the practice of fetal tissue donation and said the Center for Medical Progress, which released the video, made "outrageous claims" about such practices.
Congressional Republicans have called for an investigation, and other Republican presidential contenders have spoken out against Planned Parenthood in the wake of the video.
Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, for example, said Congress should investigate and renew its efforts to fully defund the group. And Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal directed the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals to investigate the group's activities.
Rand Paul: Cut funding for Planned Parenthood // The Courier Journal // Tom Loftus - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul on Friday joined the chorus of conservative elected officials blasting Planned Parenthood based on the comments of one of its officials in a controversial video released this week by an anti-abortion group.
"The recent revelation that this taxpayer-funded organization is selling body parts of the unborn further proves that this agency deserves our scorn, not our tax dollars," Paul said in a statement released by his campaign for the Republican nomination for president.

Paul was referring to a video released by the California-based Center for Medical Progress that shows a Planned Parenthood official talking about parts of aborted fetuses. The Center for Medical Progress says the video documents that Planned Parenthood sells fetal tissue for profit.
But Planned Parenthood says the charge is false. "The allegation that Planned Parenthood profits in any way from tissue donation is not true. Our donation programs, like any other high quality health care provider's, follow all laws and ethical guidelines," Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, says in statement posted on the Planned Parenthood website.
Richards does apologize in her statement for the tone of comments in the video by a Planned Parenthood official — a tone that Richards said does not reflect "the compassionate care that we provide."
Paul said that next week he will use "all legislative vehicles at his disposal" to force a Senate vote "to immediately strip every dollar of Planned Parenthood funding." He said Planned Parenthood received about $528 million in taxpayer funding in 2013-14.
On Thursday the controversial video prompted Indiana Republican Gov. Mike Pence to direct Indiana's Department of Health to investigate Planned Parenthood in cooperation with the state attorney general. But Planned Parenthood's affiliate for Kentucky and Indiana does not participate in any tissue donation program, said Betty Cockrum, chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Indiana and Kentucky.
Rand Paul: Defund Planned Parenthood // Washington Examiner // Paige Winfield Cunningham - July 17, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul has threatened to seek "legislative action" next week to defund Planned Parenthood.
The Kentucky Republican and GOP presidential candidate didn't clarify his exact plans, but the legislative action he referred to could involve an attempt to attach a defunding bill to highway-funding legislation the Senate is trying to pass before a July 31 deadline.
Paul said Planned Parenthood has "absolutely zero respect for the sanctity of human life," referring to an undercover video released by an anti-abortion group this week showing one of Planned Parenthood's top directors discussing fetal organ donations.
He also called the group's participation in organ donations "potentially criminal."
"Not one more taxpayer dollar should go to Planned Parenthood, and I intend to make that goal a reality," Paul said in a statement released Friday by his congressional office.
The footage, which shows Planned Parenthood Director of Medical Services Deborah Nucatola describing how doctors obtain fetal organs during abortions to donate them for medical research, has prompted House Republicans to start an investigation into the group.
It's not illegal to donate the tissue of aborted fetuses for medical research. But the video's makers say Planned Parenthood is performing illegal partial-birth abortions to obtain the organs and is profiting from their sale.
Planned Parenthood has denied any wrongdoing and has apologized for the seemingly crude way Nucatola discussed the sensitive topic.

Ted Cruz's second quarter donors had some loyalty issues // WaPo // Philip Bump - July 17, 2015

One of the more interesting aspects of campaign fundraising is how frequently donors give to multiple candidates. Sometimes, it's because they change their minds about who they're backing. Often, it's because they want to establish a relationship with one or more of the candidates -- and a large subset of those people are just hedging their bets. (A large subset of those people are also quite wealthy, making the process of cutting multiple $2,700 checks not such a big deal.)
With second quarter numbers in hand, we thought we'd take a look at how often double giving happened among 2016 contenders. Given that comparing all 216 million candidates against one another seemed unfeasible, we focused on the same candidates who we'd mapped on Thursday: Jeb Bush, Ben Carson, Ted Cruz, Bobby Jindal, Rand Paul, Marco Rubio for Republicans and Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders for Democrats. (A note: Jindal's figures don't include small donors -- under $200 -- who don't legally have to be reported.)
It can be tricky to do this comparison. We're talking about a lot of people, comparable on name, address and occupation. If names are spelled differently or if the address is slightly different, it adds uncertainty. So we looked at all the instances that the first name, last name and ZIP+4 matched for a person who gave to more than one of the aforementioned candidates.
In our analysis, it was Ted Cruz whose donors were most likely to give to other people; we tallied 370 who did so. Next was Ben Carson, who had 301 people give to other candidates, including 148 who gave to Cruz. In total, nearly 700 people gave to more than one candidate. There were 51 who gave to three, six who gave to four, and one enthusiastic South Carolina woman who gave to five.
But that's not the weirdest one.
The weirdest is someone in St. Louis who gave $2,700 to Hillary Clinton -- and another $2,700 to Bobby Jindal. Now that is hedging your bets.
Super PACs to Cruz: Focus on 'wedge issues' // WaPo // Patrick Svitek - July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The super PACs supporting Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) believe he should focus on so-called wedge issues as he carves an unflinchingly conservative path to the White House, according to a presentation that surfaced late Thursday.
The strategy would not be a surprising approach for Cruz, who has made clear he believes the way to win the presidency is by standing firm on a host of issues that excite the GOP base. But the presentation, found on the Web site of the Keep the Promise super PACs, offers the most revealing look yet at how — and why — Cruz's supporters believe he can achieve that goal.
The 51-slide pitch — titled "Can He Win?" — is particularly harsh on 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney, whom it calls a "terrible candidate with a terrible campaign." Part of Romney's problem, according to the presentation, is that he had "NO WEDGE OR MAGNET ISSUE" to drive up Republican turnout against President Obama.
Cruz, on the other hand, ranks as the Republican Party's best shot at exploiting wedge issues against presumed Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton, according to the super PACs. The presentation lists five issues on which it suggests Cruz would be the most competitive GOP nominee in a general-election matchup with Clinton: "Common Core," "Immigration," "Future Not Past," "National Security" and "Foreign Money."
In unambiguous terms, the presentation identifies former Florida governor Jeb Bush as Clinton's weakest potential opponent on wedge issues. "The Establishment Never Learns," reads the title of one slide, followed by text that says, "For 2016 they have chosen, Jeb Bush."
A spokesman for the super PACs, treasurer Dathan Voelter, did not immediately respond to a request for comment late Thursday. The presentation, which was first reported by CNN then obtained by The Texas Tribune, was last modified Sunday, according to information on the PowerPoint file, which identified a "Chris Sipes" as the author.
One plausible explanation for the presentation is to telegraph strategy to Cruz's official campaign, which cannot coordinate with the super PACs under federal law. In recent election cycles, campaigns and super PACs have gained notoriety for stretching the boundaries of that rule.
The presentation itself reads like an appeal to pro-Cruz donors, who have already given just under $38 million to the four super PACs supporting him. To that end, the presentation confirms what has long been rumored: Cruz is receiving support from the three of the top 10 donors to conservative super PACs in 2012. They are New York hedge-fund manager Robert Mercer, Boston investor John Childs and Houston Texans owner Robert McNair.
While the presentation echoes many Cruz talking points -- evangelicals are not turning out, for example — it does seem to prod Cruz to focus more on Hispanic voters, something he and his campaign have not signaled is a top priority. Under a slide titled "Republican Must Do's for 2016," the presentation says the party must "perform better with Latino voters in Florida, Colorado, New Mexico and Nevada."
The presentation also directs attention to the results of a May survey that portray Cruz as a well-known candidate who ranks toward the top of the field in "potential growth." The only two candidates ahead of him in that category of the poll are Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida.
The primary calendar, which is "really different," is also helping Cruz, according to the presentation. The super PACs argue the calendar favors Southern states and conservative voters more than usual, a perfect mix for Cruz to capitalize on wedge issues.
His campaign's assets, meanwhile, are listed as "Small Dollar Donors," "Large Super PAC," "Social Media Followers," "Grassroots Support" and "Sophisticated Data Analysis." Unsurprisingly, the presentation indicates Cruz's campaign beats five other campaigns listed on one slide: those of Bush, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky, Rubio and Walker.
Despite the harsh words for Bush, the super PACs say they plan to roll out a "positive campaign" around the first GOP presidential debate, which is scheduled for Aug. 6 in Ohio. In the meantime, the presentation suggests donors should do anything but retreat, saying "fundraising success breeds fundraising success."

Insiders: Ted Cruz hurt most by Trump candidacy // Politico // Katie Glueck - July 17, 2015

Donald Trump's turn in the national spotlight is mainly taking a toll on Ted Cruz, the Texas firebrand running as an uncompromising, anti-establishment conservative.
That's the assessment of this week's POLITICO Caucus, our weekly survey of the leading strategists, activists and political operatives in Iowa and New Hampshire.
Roughly a third of Iowa and New Hampshire Republican insiders pointed to Cruz as the candidate who is damaged the most in their states by Trump's rise in the polls and emergence as a media-grabbing protest candidate.
"The Trump Circus is no doubt having the biggest impact on Ted Cruz. Cruz, the incumbent proxy for the disaffected GOP "Hell No!" Caucus, has been virtually starved of oxygen since Trump entered the race," said an Iowa Republican, who, like all POLITICO Caucus participants, was granted anonymity in order to speak freely.
"Cruz needs to consolidate the rage-against-the-machine, anti-establishment block of Caucus votes (both the harder-edged evangelicals and tea party types) as his Iowa Caucus foundation upon which to build," said another Iowa Republican. "Trump is sucking all the oxygen out of the room. While I seriously doubt most of those folks will ultimately caucus for Trump, his message is scratching their anti-establishment itch at a time when Cruz needs to start showing some momentum."
In New Hampshire, where Chris Christie's hopes are riding on a strong finish, roughly a quarter of Republicans believe the brash and straight-talking New Jersey governor is also put at risk by Trump's emergence in the field.
"Christie is the "tell it like it is" candidate, but he certainly can't hang with Trump in that regard," a Granite State Republican said. "Without the oxygen of a niche, Christie is rudderless and grasping at straws."
"Christie has placed all his eggs in New Hampshire's basket, but Trump is right now occupying the "tell it like it is" lane with gusto," added another New Hampshire Republican. "Same thing with Ted Cruz. If you're a voter looking for the most conservative alternative, it's hard to see you landing anywhere but Trump."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans in both states are also fretting that the controversial real estate mogul is tainting their party — and Democrats agree: more than one-third of Democrats viewed Trump as a problem for the entire GOP field, as opposed to a single candidate.
"He is damaging our brand," said an Iowa Republican, who said Trump is hurting all of the GOP candidates.
Yet it's Cruz, the Texas senator, who is seen by insiders as particularly damaged by Trump's ascendancy because the real estate mogul has emerged as a candidate who is equally steadfast on hot-button issues like immigration — and he can deliver the message with more heated rhetoric. That gives him an advantage with the hardest-right pockets of the GOP base, insiders said, who might otherwise naturally align with Cruz.
Several Caucus participants expected that Trump will push the immigration debate further to the right for those candidates who rely on the support of the staunchest conservative activists. "Watch for other candidates to step up their rhetoric or continue to be crushed by Trump in the polls," predicted one Iowa Republican.
So far, the Texas senator is the only candidate in the GOP field to make overtures to Trump: the two had a meeting on Wednesday at Trump Tower, where they dished about other Republican contenders. Cruz has also been by far Trump's biggest defender among the Republicans running for president, refusing to condemn several of Trump's more incendiary statements on immigration, and instead praising him more broadly for raising the issue. That relationship could also come in handy for Cruz in the event support for Trump's bid collapses and his backers look for another lightning rod conservative candidate to get behind.
A handful of participants noted that Trump distracted from Scott Walker, the Wisconsin governor who announced his presidential bid this week and leads in Iowa polls.
Walker is "barely registering in voters' minds because The Donald is such a compelling blend of hair, media catnip, and voter rage" even during his announcement week, said one Iowa Republican.

Ted Cruz Is Vowing To Block A Bunch Of Obama's Nominees ... Again // HuffPo // Jennifer Bendery – July 17, 2015

U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham has raised $3.7 million to kickoff his underdog bid for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, including $1.5 million he moved from his U.S. Senate campaign account.

But Graham, who proved an effective fundraiser in his 2014 U.S. Senate re-election bid, lags far behind the fund-raising leaders in the presidential nominating race.

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton has raised more than $47 million since entering the race for her party's nomination. Republican U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas leads the GOP, having raised $14.3 million for his campaign.

However, Graham of Seneca led the pack in his home state, which holds a key early primary next February.

Graham raised $858,080 – roughly $1 of every $4 that he brought in – from S.C. donors, out-raising all other presidential hopefuls, Democrats and Republicans combined, in the Palmetto State.

The campaign fund-raising totals are not the only measure of a candidate's potential for success, Citadel political scientist Scott Buchanan cautioned.

The "big money" goes to super political-action committees that can receive unlimited cash from donors as long as the PAC does not coordinate its activities with a candidate or a campaign.

Candidates are restricted to accepting $2,700 from a single donor during the primary cycle, making it more difficult to raise cash quickly for their campaigns.

Still, a candidate's fund-raising successes are valuable, especially early on in a race, Buchanan added.

Candidates use the amount that their campaigns raise as "a barometer for the excitement for their campaign and their candidate."

For example, a candidate who receives lots of small donations can tout winning buy-in from regular people, he said.

Is U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham South Carolina's 'favorite son?' A look at the top 10 Republican and Democratic candidates ranked by the amount that they have raised from S.C. donors through June:

U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) – $858,080

Former U.S. Sec. of State Hillary Clinton (D-NY) – $237,800

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) – $109,809

Ben Carson (R-Md.) – $78,265

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) – $62,660

U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz (R_Texas) – $50,076

Former U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) – $20,300

Ted Cruz Has Money to Burn the GOP // Bloomberg // Francis Wilkinson - July 17, 2015

Texas Senator Ted Cruz sure has a lot of money. Cruz's presidential campaign raised $14.3 million in its first quarter. In addition, a network of super-PACs allied with Cruz raised $38 million. That makes $52 million in a matter of months. To put that in context, former Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum dogged Mitt Romney in the 2012 Republican primaries, lasting all the way until April , on about $20 million less than Team Cruz has already collected.

CNN yesterday reported on a leaked PowerPoint presentation on Cruz's path to the White House titled "Can He Win?" Given the origin of the presentation, which was birthed by a pro-Cruz super-PAC, the answer wasn't in doubt. Nor, really, was the strategic path it envisions.

Cruz's advantage, according to the presentation, is his ability to exploit "wedge" issues much more effectively than a wimpy GOP establishment candidate such as Mitt Romney. The Texas Tribune, which also wrote about the presentation, said :

The presentation lists five issues on which it suggests Cruz would be the most competitive GOP nominee in a general-election matchup with Clinton: "Common Core," "Immigration," "Future Not Past," "National Security" and "Foreign Money."

The first two -- Common Core and immigration, just happen to be issues on which Jeb Bush (did we mention that establishment candidates are wimpy?) is crosswise with many Republican base voters. "Future Not Past" is already a theme of Young Marco Rubio's regular digs at Bush. On national security, Cruz is busy working to secure the far right of the Republican argument, more or less promising to bomb Iran at his earliest convenience. And while "Foreign Money" presages attacks on contributions to Hillary Clinton's family foundation, it might also give pause to a certain GOP candidate who began his international business career in the anti-American environs of Caracas. With his Mexican wife.

While Republican worthies fret about Donald Trump's tics, Cruz, who stands to inherit many Trump supporters when Trump teeters, may be the more dire threat. Since joining the Senate in 2013, Cruz has exhibited a steady disregard for the broader interests of his party. Indeed, he seems not only willing but even eager to damage his party in pursuit of personal advantage.

What does a man like that do with an opening bid of $52 million and the support of both small donors and some fabulously rich men?

Bush probably won't be Cruz's first target. The most pressing business for Cruz is to consolidate support on the party's right, which will require reducing Scott Walker from Destroyer of Unions to just a guy who talks out of both sides of his mouth. Walker's inconsistency on key issues -- darned if we don't encounter immigration and Common Core again! -- is the sort of story that can be easily explained in 29.5 seconds. And Cruz's money will buy a lot of 29.5-second blocks to tell it.

If Cruz succeeds in dispatching the unreliable Walker, he can inherit some of Walker's support and turn either to Marco Rubio, if Rubio has gained traction, or to the main event: Bush.

The beauty of Cruz's positioning is that it insulates him from lesser claims on his virtue -- such as calls for partisan loyalty or Senate collegiality. If he annihilates Walker, Rubio and/or Bush -- any of whom is likely to be more electable than Cruz -- they will only be incidental casualties, the kind of sacrifices required of a true patriot. Some Republicans might wish that Cruz loved his country, or himself, just a little bit less.

Cruz: Chattanooga shooting 'an act of war' // The Hill // Mark Hensch - July 17, 2015

The mass shooting at military facilities in Chattanooga, Tenn. constitutes an act of war by radical Islamists, Sen. Ted Cruz said Friday.

The Texas senator and Republican presidential candidate linked the massacre to a broader extremist campaign against the United States

“Muhammad Youssef Abdulazeez was there to carry out jihad, an act of radical Islamic terrorism,” he said in a statement.

“An act of war, in which those four brave Marines lost their lives, while at least two others were wounded.”

Four Marines died when Abdulazeez opened fire on Thursday morning at two military facilities in Chattanooga. Abdulazeez, who was a naturalized citizen from Kuwait, died in the second attack.

Cruz said the gunman was not a “lone wolf” attacking American troops at random, and said the nations needs to rid itself of “two dangerous delusions” about terrorist threats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"First and foremost that a 'lone gunman' — as President Obama described the shooter — is somehow isolated from the larger threat of radical Islamic terrorism," Cruz said.
"In the modern world, no one acts in isolation," he added.
"Through social media ISIS, al Qaeda and other groups are infiltrating our nation with impunity while our government will not even admit that radical Islamic terrorism is a problem."
Cruz also charged on Friday that the Chattanooga slayings are not independent of earlier attacks on U.S. military installations.
"The second delusion is that this attack is somehow isolated from previous episodes, notably those in Little Rock, Arkansas and Fort Hood, Texas, in 2009 – both of which were attacks on American military facilities," he said.
"We need to see with clarity right now what has happened."
Reports emerged on Thursday evening that Abdulazeez had blogged about Islam before striking Chattanooga, though little is known about his motive for the shooting.
He first opened fire at a recruitment center before driving to a U.S. Naval and Marine Reserve Center.
Investigators believe that Abdulazeez and all four of his victims died during shooting at the Reserve Center.

Ted Cruz: Chattanooga Shooting Shows Need for Immigration Overhaul, Arming Military on Bases // National Review // Alexis Levinson - July 17, 2015

Ted Cruz on Friday called for congressional hearings toward allowing members of the armed services to carry guns in military facilities, in the wake of the shooting at a military recruitment center in Chattanooga, Tenn., and said the shooting illustrated the need to fix the immigration laws.
On Thursday, four Marines were killed and three other people were injured when Mohammad Youssuf Abdulazeez opened fire on two military facilities in Chattanooga.
In a statement, Cruz called Abdulazeez's actions "an act of war," and said he "was there to carry out jihad, an act of radical Islamic terrorism."
"While we might wish it otherwise, the forces of radical Islam are at war with us — here and now," Cruz said, faulting President Barack Obama for describing the shooter as a "lone gunman."
"In the modern world," Cruz said, "no one acts in isolation. Through social media ISIS, al Qaida and other groups are infiltrating our nation with impunity while our government will not even admit that radical Islamic terrorism is a problem."
Cruz said the shooting needs to be acknowledged as a terrorist attack immediately, and called for actions to be taken to allow members of the armed forces to protect themselves against such situations.
"We need to see with clarity what has happened," Cruz said. "We can immediately call for Congressional hearings on the need for our enlisted men and women to have the right to be armed in military facilities."
What's more, Cruz said, the shooting illustrated the need to tighten immigration laws. According to CNN, Abdulazeez was born in Kuwait and had citizenship in Jordan, but had become a naturalized U.S. citizen.
In response, Cruz said, Congress should "pass the Expatriate Terrorist Act that would allow our government to stop Americans who travel overseas to train with terrorist groups from coming back to attack us at home. We can thoroughly overhaul our broken immigration system that is allowing this type of individual to gain citizenship."
Read Cruz's full statement below:
Yesterday, members of our armed services in Chattanooga, Tennessee, went to work in the service of our nation. Some went to a recruiting center to assist the young people who, like so many before them, would walk through the door on any given Thursday morning and volunteer to defend the United States of America. Four brave Marines went to a Naval Reserve Center to perform their duties to the Tennessee National Guard.
But one of the young people who visited two of those facilities was not like the others. He was there not to volunteer to serve America, but to attack America. Mohammod Youssuf Abdulazeez was there to carry out jihad, an act of radical Islamic terrorism. An act of war, in which those four brave Marines lost their lives, while at least two others were wounded.
In the wake of this vicious attack on our nation we need to rid ourselves of two dangerous delusions, first and foremost that a "lone gunman"–as President Obama described the shooter–is somehow isolated from the larger threat of radical Islamic terrorism. In the modern world, no one acts in isolation. Through social media ISIS, al Qaida and other groups are infiltrating our nation with impunity while our government will not even admit that radical Islamic terrorism is a problem.
The second delusion is that this attack is somehow isolated from previous episodes, notably those in Little Rock, Arkansas and Fort Hood, Texas, in 2009—both of which were attacks on American military facilities. The Obama administration was woefully reluctant to call either an act of radical Islamic terrorism, instead suggesting "workplace violence" as a justification for the killings. Finally, after years of effort, the victims of Fort Hood were properly recognized as victims of attacks by foreign terrorists when they received Purple Hearts on April 15, 2015. Likewise, the victim of the Little Rock attack received a Purple Heart on July 1, 2015.
We cannot afford wait six years to recognize what happened yesterday in Chattanooga for what it was. We need to see with clarity right now what has happened. We can immediately hold hearings in the Senate Armed Services Committee on the need for our enlisted men and women to have the right to be armed in military facilities. Congress can pass the Expatriate Terrorist Act that would allow our government to stop Americans who travel overseas to train with terrorist groups from coming back to attack us at home. We can thoroughly overhaul our broken immigration system that is allowing this type of individual to gain citizenship. And we can accept the reality that while we might wish it otherwise, the forces of radical Islam are at war with us.

Cruz-backing super PAC reveals victory plan; the dangers of Donald Trump // The Dallas Morning News // Sylvan Lane - July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WASHINGTON–The super PAC backing Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential run released a 51-slide victory plan that closely aligns with the way he's been pitching himself and his vision for the country.
First reported by CNN , Keep the Promise's "Can he win?" presentation touts Cruz's consistent and rightward political stances and "the most complete portfolio of campaign assets" of any 2016 Republican candidate.
Through charts, graphs and talking points, the victory plan underpins Cruz go-to answer when he's asked if he can win: Republicans fail when they nominate moderates from the "mushy middle," and only a true conservative like himself can rally enough support to take back the White House.
Cruz has been critical of 2012 Republican candidate Mitt Romney–mainly of his poor performance with Hispanics and "47 percent" comments–but still called him an honorable and decent man. Keep the Promise, which cannot coordinate with Cruz, isn't as kind, calling Romney a "terrible candidate" with a "terrible campaign" and no wedge issues to separate him from President Barack Obama.
The report also highlights Cruz's impressive fundraising haul and digital team, arguing that the two put him in good position to win the primary and general elections.
The trouble with Trump
Cruz and Donald Trump are close personally and politically–maybe too close.
About one-third of political insiders surveyed by Politico this week said that Trump's candidacy poses the biggest threat to Cruz of all 2016 Republican nominees. Both are running as blunt, unapologetic conservatives committed to dismantling big government–even if only one has a record of actually trying to do that.
"Trump is sucking all the oxygen out of the room," one Iowa Republican told Politico. "While I seriously doubt most of those folks will ultimately caucus for Trump, his message is scratching their anti-establishment itch at a time when Cruz needs to start showing some momentum."
Trump has led most polls since he's official campaign entrance, sucking support from Cruz in some cases. Even so, Cruz is one of the best positioned candidates to court Trumpites if the mogul's campaign falls apart.

Ted Cruz Sets Hearing on 'Supreme Court Activism' // National Law Journal // Mike Sacks - July 17, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, will preside over a Judiciary Committee hearing next week to address what he has called the "judicial activism, plain and simple," of the U.S. Supreme Court after its decisions this term in favor of the Affordable Care Act and same-sex marriage .
Cruz started the conversation late last month in the National Review, where he proposed a constitutional amendment to force retention elections for Supreme Court justices.
"Every justice, beginning with the second national election after his or her appointment, will answer to the American people and the states in a retention election every eight years. Those justices deemed unfit for retention by both a majority of the American people as a whole and by majorities of the electorates in at least half of the 50 states will be removed from office and disqualified from future service on the court," Cruz wrote.
Next week's hearing , titled "With Prejudice: Supreme Court Activism and Possible Solutions," will feature three panelists. The Republican invitees are Ed Whelan , president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, and John Eastman, the Henry Salvatori Professor of Law and Community Service at Chapman University Dale E. Fowler School of Law. Neil Siegel , the David W. Ichel Professor of Law at Duke Law School, accepted the Democrats' invitation.
Whether any one of them agrees with the solution offered by Cruz, chairman of the Judiciary Committee's 15-member subcommittee on oversight, agency action, federal rights and federal courts, remains unclear.
"I support his call for doing something to restrain the judiciary," Eastman said Friday. "I have not come down on the particular proposal he's got out there for now."
Whelan and Siegel declined to comment before their testimony.
Cruz's call to action has gained little traction within the legal community. Erwin Chemerinsky, the dean of University of California-Irvine School of Law and liberal commentator, wrote in The New Republic that Cruz "has the right intention." But elections are not the right call, Chemerinsky said. Chemerinsky supports 18-year, nonrenewable term limits that former Texas Gov. Rick Perry—Cruz's old boss during his tenure as the Texas solicitor general— suggested during Perry's presidential campaign in 2011's Republican primaries.
Elections would "endanger the independence of the court, rather than bolster it," Chemerinsky wrote.
Ted Olson , a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and former U.S. solicitor general under George W. Bush, was less charitable in his disagreement with Cruz's suggestion.
"A constitutional amendment to change Article III of the Constitution in this fashion has virtually no chance of succeeding," Olson told The Washington Post in an e-mail . "I would think that most graduates of the Harvard Law School know that."

Upset with #IranDeal, Ted Cruz Vows for the Fourth Time to Block Obama Nominees // Politicus USA // Hrafnkell Haraldsson - July 17, 2015

Chad Pegram, who covers Capitol Hill for Fox News, tweeted yesterday afternoon,
White House Principal Deputy Press Secretary Eric Schultz immediately pointed out that this is not the first time Cruz has stomped his little feet and held his breath to get what he wants:
Oops. Done this before, huh Ted? Maybe you should threaten to light yourself on fire next time.
Schultz tweeted newspaper editorial after newspaper editorial yesterday, all showing support of the president's Iran deal, including a Haaretz op-ed asking that the nuclear agreement be given a chance. He pointed also to an article by Dafna Linzer on MSNBC: On Iran, no need to speculate about the alternative. We've already lived it .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though Jeb Bush condemns the Iran deal , calling it "appeasement," it was his own brother, as Alan Rappeport points out in The New York Times, who brought the United States to the negotiating table nine years ago. Since Jeb says Dubya is his key advisor, there must be a memory lapse going on there somewhere. Given the intellects involved, that's hardly a leap, however convenient for Jeb.

You would think this would all be self-evident. It's all part of the record. Furthermore, you would think it would be obvious to even ideological hidebound Republicans in Congress that editorials aside, polling shows the American people do not want to go to war over Iran. We don't even want to go back into Iraq to clean up the mess Bush left there, a mess called the Islamic State.

To listen to Republicans, war is the only option:

Given widespread support for diplomacy, something that will neither kill a lot of Americans or destroy our economy – AGAIN – it is difficult to see what Republicans think they can get out of opposition to the nuclear deal, but that is presuming that Republicans are thinking at all. After all, what could be more amusing than listenig to the right wing media claim Obama's actions will lead to war, when war is what the Republicans are demanding? Can the GOP get more absurd?

We have to remember that it is not only the nuclear deal they are opposing and Israel they are supporting: If Obama is for it, they are against it. In fact, given the history of the past six-and-a-half years, it is difficult to imagine they would support the Iran deal even if Israel did.

The Republican Party, when the results of Election night 2008 came in, swore to do all in their power to nullify our first black president, to oppose him at every turn, and they have done that. They have shut down the government, they have refused to create a single job or to participate in any meaningful way in the business of government. If anything, identical election results in 2012 just made their reaction worse.

This is the party, after all, which, having lost the presidential election, acted like the president now had to do exactly what the House of Representatives said, as though the Executive Branch – the abode of the "decider" when a Republican occupies it – was suddenly an adjunct to the Legislative Branch. How much less significant a president when both houses of Congress are Republican?

And no, they haven't read the United States Constitution, or they would see that is not how this works. It is not how any of this works. The Republicans have all history back to the ratification of the Constitution in 1789 to look for examples of how the government works – three independent branches, executive, legislative, and judicial – balancing each other out to prevent tyranny. But they are too busy listening to David Barton and Fox News invent facts to actually figure out what their job is.

And it is not to nullify the presidency as a branch of government. While Cruz claims the president is trying to circumvent Congress, Obama has the authority , and what is actually happening is that Cruz is trying to circumvent the executive branch.

Ted Cruz's stunts are all part of their sworn opposition to all things Obama, just another excuse to refuse to do his job as an elected official and to put himself in the spotlight. The grandstanding Ted Cruz is a disgrace to the United States Senate, and to the United States of America.

Ted Cruz: Tennessee shootings 'an act of war' // Washington Times // David Sherfinski - July 17, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas on Friday called the killings of four Marines in Tennessee "an act of war."

Mr. Cruz said in a statement that members of the armed services went to work Thursday, including "four brave Marines" who went to a naval reserve center to perform their duties.

"But one of the young people who visited two of those facilities was not like the others," said Mr. Cruz , a 2016 GOP presidential candidate. "He was there not to volunteer to serve America, but to attack America. Mohammod Youssuf Abdulazeez was there to carry out jihad, an act of radical Islamic terrorism. An act of war, in which those four brave Marines lost their lives, while at least two others were wounded."

Authorities are looking into possible ties to terrorist groups that Abdulazeez, reportedly born in Kuwait, might have had before he attacked two Navy facilities Thursday, killing four Marines and injuring several other people.

Mr. Cruz said the Obama administration was "woefully reluctant" to label 2009 attacks on military facilities in Little Rock, Arkansas, and Fort Hood, Texas, acts of radical Islamic terrorism and noted that Purple Hearts were awarded to the victims of the attacks this year.

"We cannot afford to wait six years to recognize what happened yesterday in Chattanooga for what it was," Mr. Cruz said. "We need to see with clarity right now what has happened."

Mr. Cruz said hearings can be held on the need for enlisted men and women to have the right be armed in military facilities — an idea top lawmakers said Friday they will address in this year's defense policy bill — and said Congress can pass legislation he's pushed to strip U.S. citizenship from Americans who travel overseas to train with terrorists.

"We can thoroughly overhaul our broken immigration system that is allowing this type of individual to gain citizenship," he said. "And we can accept the reality that while we might wish it otherwise, the forces of radical Islam are at war with us."

Ted Cruz's book cracks New York Times' bestseller list // PPP Focus // River Gaines - July 17, 2015

Over the last week presidential candidate Ted Cruz has gleefully duked it out with the New York Times, waging a very public battle against the paper arguing that it purposely excluded his new memoir from its bestseller list. Cruz's campaign said that was "a blatant falsehood", noting Cruz's book had sold more copies than 18 of the 20 books on the list at that time. "In order to avoid compromising that process, we do not disclose who reports sales to us", she said.

Cruz's publisher, HarperCollins, denied that there were bulk sales.
Barnes & Noble: Nope, no evidence of bulk sales. The decision led to speculation about whether Cruz had tried to cheat the system and shed some light on the Times' still-secretive criteria for their bestseller list.
The Times, though, defended the omission, claiming they saw evidence of "bulk purchases" and suggesting the system was being manipulated.
Amazon: Nope, no bulk sales.
"As of yesterday, "A Time for Truth" was the number 13 best-selling book, and there is no evidence of unusual bulk purchase activity in our sales data", Sarah Gelman, Amazon's director of press relations, said in an email.
Forbes published an article two years ago called "How You Buy Your Way Onto The New York Times Bestsellers List", about a San Diego marketing firm that guaranteed clients a place for a hefty fee.
"That process involves a careful analysis of data, and is not influenced in any way by the content of a book, or by pressure from publishers or book sellers", alleged spokeswoman Eileen Murphy.
"We call on the Times, release your so-called 'evidence, '" declared Cruz campaign spokesperson Rick Tyler in a statement Friday.
The Times has resolutely stood by its claim, and has refused to reveal its methodology on the grounds that doing so might threaten the integrity of the process.
While Wilson must see some advantage for Cruz in polls that fit all his categories, the fact that he's protesting now about Fox's standards would also bolster a later argument that the whole process was illegitimate in the event Cruz doesn't make the cutoff. Talk about a fundraising and bookselling boon!
"I'm sure you are aware, the standards set by Fox News for the first GOP Presidential debate are unclear and, it would appear, undefined", Wilson writes in the memo.
I look forward to the answer.

Ted Cruz emerges as hero as Gawker is blasted for article that outs Condé Nast executive // Chron // John-Henry Perera - July 17, 2015

It's a bit of a doozy, but Gawker is catching enormous amounts of digital flak for running a story that essentially outs the sexuality of a Condé Nast executive who happens to be related to Tim Geithner, President Barack Obama's former treasury secretary.
Writer Jordan Sargent received a series of text messages and emails from a male escort named "Ryan." Those documents detail a sexual rendezvous with Ryan and that business executive and the following extortion attempt.
While initially a simple tryst, things escalated when Ryan figured out his customer's identity and attempted to coerce him into helping out with a housing dispute. Apparently Ryan is a war veteran who suffers from PTSD and was allegedly kicked out of his Texas luxury apartment home due to owning a service dog, according to legal documents, although Ryan claims it was because his landlord learned he was a gay porn star.
Sen. Ted Cruz, R-Texas, was also involved in Ryan's housing dispute. Ryan had sought the freshman senator's help earlier, and on April 7, 2015, Cruz's told him they had begun discussions with the landlord on his behalf.
Unfortunately, nothing could be done but Cruz has maintained contact with Ryan.
"He says that an employee of Cruz's called him this afternoon to say that the senator had personally called the HUD director on his behalf," Sargent writes. "It seems as if Cruz, in the midst of his Presidential campaign, sees an opportunity to help a veteran with PTSD who has been crushed by Washington bureaucracy."
Ryan's customer backed out of their arrangement when Ryan emailed him the details of his situation. Feeling slighted, Ryan reached out to Gawker who went ahead and published the story. For his part, Ryan claims he simply wants to publicize his dispute with his landlord. The former customer says he does not know who Ryan is, despite evidence to the contrary, and says this is nothing more than a shakedown.
After publishing, Twitter outrage peaked all around because, in their thinking, Gawker aided a person's blackmail attempt and they outed someone who wouldn't otherwise be considered a public official or celebrity. Gawker's editor-in-chief Max Read defended their story on Twitter.
"[sic] given the chance gawker will always report on married c-suite executives of major media companies  around on their wives."
There's no word yet if Cruz's office has severed ties with Ryan because of last night's article. Still, it is funny to think Cruz has emerged a hero in Gawker, which is typically left-leaning. Perhaps that should have been Sargent's first warning that his article would bomb with everyone.

New York Times Finally Adds Ted Cruz Book to Bestsellers List // iFree Press - July 17, 2015

Times spokesperson Eileen Murphy said the memoir, "A Time for Truth", will be listed as number seven on its non-fiction list.
Murphy said the Times made no changes to its selection process, Politico reports, and its seventh-place spot most likely resulted from strong sales since Cruz slammed the paper.
After a lengthy battle with the Ted Cruz campaign over whether or not his book sales were boosted by bulk purchases, The New York Times will include his newest book on their bestsellers list.
"That process involves a careful analysis of data, and is not influenced in any way by the content of a book, or by pressure from publishers or book sellers", she continued.
Cruz acknowledged public attention had helped propel his book onto the list. This despite the fact that A Time for Truth was among the top ten best sellers on Amazon among all books, not just hardcover nonfiction.
The Texas senator, who is seeking the Republican presidential nomination, mounted a fierce campaign against the Times, which excluded his book because of bulk sales that did not meet its standards.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz's campaign blasted the newspaper last week for the book not being initially included on the list, describing the Times' explanations for its omission as "cryptic" and "false". Last week's list did feature conservative authors like Ann Coulter, for "Adios America!" "If the Times said that it didn't list Cruz's book because its 'sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases, ' while knowing that this statement was untrue or having no grounds to believe it true, HarperCollins could very well have a cause of action against the Times, should the publisher choose to pursue it".
"What's transpired at The New York Times in the last two weeks raises troubling questions that should concern any author", he said.
Cruz's campaign said that was "a blatant falsehood", noting Cruz's book had sold more copies than 18 of the 20 books on the list at that time.
Essentially, that's when a publisher or organization buys up copies of the book in strategic locations in an attempt to artificially inflate sales numbers. "If they want to be credible journalists, the public editor needs to investigate their methodology and see if they are discriminating against authors they have different political views from them".

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie stands by path to citizenship for immigrants // CNN // Tom LoBianco – July 17, 2015

Washington (CNN)New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who is searching for some footing in a wide-open field of Republican contenders, said he stands by comments he made in 2010 that immigrants should have a path to citizenship.

"We have to have Congress come together and deal with this. They haven't done that yet. The President has done it by executive order, he hasn't brought people together on it yet," Christie told CNN's Alisyn Camerota in an interview that aired Friday.

Christie said that illegal immigration should be curbed by hitting employers who hire undocumented workers with fines.

"We've got to penalize employers who hire people who are here illegally," Christie said in the interview. "Because the fact is that that shouldn't happen and it's exploiting American workers. But in addition to that, it's exploiting many of those people who are here illegally because they're being paid less money. So we need to make bigger fines to make sure that those employers who violate the law are being held accountable."

Immigration has become a flashpoint in the race ever since Donald Trump burst onto the field last month with his proclamation that Mexican "rapists" were flooding the border.

Trump has won widespread attention for that and other wild remarks, but he has also taken a major hit financially, as NBC, Univision, Macy's and many other businesses have cut their ties with him.

The other Republican candidates, meanwhile, have walked carefully on the issue, which has long become a wedge for the party as it looks to hold onto conservative white voters angry over immigration while attracting Hispanic voters, a growing demographic who helped carry President Barack Obama into office twice.

Congressman To Chris Christie: Stop Using My Intern's Murder For Political Gain // HuffPo // Amanda Terkel – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) went after the failure of "liberal policies" Thursday during a speech on criminal justice, saying they failed to prevent the death of Kevin Sutherland, a 24-year-old who was murdered on the Washington, D.C. metro on July 4.

The reference to Sutherland's death left Rep. Jim Himes (D-Conn.) disgusted. Sutherland was an intern for Himes in late 2013, and the congressman said in a statement Friday that he deserved better than to be used for partisan shots.

"Kevin Sutherland was a friend of mine," said Himes. "He was an intern on my campaign and in my Congressional office. I am friends with his parents. By speaking about Kevin Sutherland and his family in this way, Christie has once again shown himself nothing more than a pure opportunist with no sense of decency and a severely distorted idea of right and wrong."

"To use Kevin's death to score political points is vile. Kevin was empathetic, kind, and wanted to create a better America and world by lifting up those around him," he added.

Christie, a 2016 presidential candidate, said in his remarks that it was important to "focus on keeping dangerous and violent offenders behind bars" in order to keep the streets of America safe, citing his time as a U.S. attorney.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"And lately we've seen what happens instead when you don't have that focus," said Christie.

"On July 4, Kevin Sutherland got on to a subway train in Washington, D.C. Kevin was a bright young man with a promising future, a former congressional intern," he said. "And now all his parents can do is mourn. Because Kevin was stabbed to death on that train -- right in front of people -- by a man who had been arrested just two days earlier for violent robbery."

Jasper Spires, the suspected murderer, was freed after that arrest while awaiting trial. He has now been charged with first-degree murder for killing Sutherland.

"Well here's a question I want to ask all those mayors and defenders of a broken system," said Christie. "How much compassion did liberal policies show for the families of Kevin Sutherland and Kathryn Steinle?"

Steinle, 32, was fatally shot on July 1 in San Francisco, allegedly by an undocumented immigrant with seven felony convictions who had been deported five times. Her murder prompted both Republican and Democratic politicians to question the policies of sanctuary cities, which limit their cooperation with federal immigration officials.

"The fearmongering and thinly veiled racism evident in Christie's speech reveal that he knew nothing about Kevin and his family or what they believed in, and he should be ashamed. Although, at this point, I find myself doubting if shame is something he's capable of," said Himes in his Friday statement.

The congressman also said Christie was being hypocritical in his criticism of San Francisco and Washington, D.C., saying the governor has "slashed state aid to cities, cut funding for neighborhood revitalization, called for the elimination of Urban Enterprise Zones, and led a budget that has caused police layoffs."

"If Christie wants to spout his particular brand of hate-filled nonsense to whomever is unfortunate enough to be in earshot, that's his right," added Himes. "But when he uses the memory of a beloved friend and son in such a grossly disrespectful way, it's our duty to stop listening, move on to more serious topics and people, and continue the work that Kevin believed in."

Christie's campaign did not return a request for additional comment.

On July 8, Himes paid his respects to Sutherland on the House floor.

UPDATE: 4:39p.m. -- Sutherland's parents also criticized Christie Friday.

"The fact that Gov. Chris Christie would invoke my son's name in a politically motivated speech just three days after our family laid him to rest shows that he cares little about the grief my family is feeling," said Douglas and Terry Sutherland in a statement to Hearst Connecticut Media.

Devon Puglia, spokesman for Connecticut Gov. Dan Malloy (D), said the governor was "disappointed" with Christie's remarks as well.

"We're very disappointed that Governor Christie would choose to politicize the death of this young man -- to make an intellectually backwards point, no less -- at a time when important conversations nationwide about criminal justice reform are taking place," said Puglia.

Chris Christie: Bill Cosby situation 'is just sickening' // Washington Times // Jessica Chasmar – July 17, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Chris Christie said Friday that the wave of sexual assault allegations against Bill Cosby "is just sickening" and that the disgraced comedian should be prosecuted if he's guilty.

"Let's focus on what's really important here, which is the conduct. And the conduct is reprehensible," the New Jersey governor said on CNN. "As the father of two daughters, it makes me sick."

"You don't want to always change laws just to deal with one circumstance," he continued. "But the fact is, if the law permits prosecution and the evidence is there, he should be prosecuted. And if it doesn't, then we need to examine those laws on a going forward basis and see what we may need to do.

"The thing that I focus on the most as a father is just how incomprehensible it is to me that someone, if what he did and what's alleged is actually what he did, that someone in a position of authority and influence and esteem in this country — I watched 'The Cosby Show.'

"The fact that he would engage in that kind of conduct, if that's what he did, is just sickening," Mr. Christie added.

Chris Christie: Donald Trump would be 'frustrated' as president // Market Watch // Robert Schroeder – July 17, 2015

The president doesn't get to say "You're fired!"

That, writes Bloomberg, is Chris Christie's message for Donald Trump as the billionaire sees his standing grow in the 2016 Republican presidential field. The New Jersey governor, himself a GOP White House aspirant, invoked the line used by Trump on the show "The Apprentice" when speaking to a town hall in New Hampshire on Thursday. "I know he says he tells it like it is, too. I tell it like it is from the standpoint of having actually done these jobs," Christie said. "I think quite frankly Donald would be a little frustrated if he became president of the United States."

Trump leads another poll: There's a reason Christie and other Republican hopefuls are talking about Trump. Another poll, released Thursday night, showed him leading the Republican field. This time, it was a Fox News survey showing the billionaire with 18% support from GOP primary voters. Earlier this week, a USA Today/ Suffolk poll had Trump in the lead — though he was the weakest against Democrat Hillary Clinton among the top seven GOP candidates.

PERRY

Why the Rick Perry Super PAC Is Spending $1 Million to Get Their Candidate Into a Debate // ABC // Louise Simpson – July 17, 2015

Backers of Rick Perry are strategizing to try to secure him a spot in the first Republican presidential primary debate next month, and they are spending some major cash to do it.

Only 10 GOP candidates will be allowed to participate in the Aug. 6 debate, which will be hosted by Fox News. Right now there are 15 candidates crowding the GOP field with two more on the way, and Perry may not make cut based on the network's polling criteria.

So, Perry's sanctioned super PAC, Opportunity and Freedom, is stepping in, unveiling a sweeping advertising campaign to target audiences across the country, running ads on Fox News, conservative talk radio and the Web. "Our goal is to make sure he's standing on the debate stage," said Austin Barbour, senior adviser to the Opportunity and Freedom super PAC.

A spot in the August debate would give Perry a second chance of sorts after suffering a famous memory lapse at a 2011 Republican primary debate, which has become known as the former Texas governor's "oops" moment.

Barbour said his group plans to spend just under $1 million on the advertising campaign.

One of the television ads the group has produced shows photos of a determined-looking Perry on a Texas Highway patrol boat as he talks about deploying the Texas National Guard to secure the border. A radio ad makes a similar point.

"When there was a crisis on our southern border, Rick Perry did more than talk," a narrator in the spot says. "He took action."

Both use the sound bite of Perry saying, "Mr. President, if you do not secure this border, Texas will."

Barbour noted the radio advertisements will run on the conservative Salem radio network, which boasts an estimated 10 million listeners a week and includes talk shows hosted by Bill Bennett, Hugh Hewitt and Mike Gallagher.

He said the ads were aimed at reaching a "really dedicated, loyal group of conservative activists, and it's really important we reintroduce Perry to them."

Rick Perry is the only GOP candidate brave enough to call out Donald Trump (and that's terrifying) // Salon // Heather Digby Parton – July 17, 2015

It was inevitable that among the huge field of Republican presidential candidates, a second-tier contender would take advantage of the opening provided by the Donald Trump phenomenon and position him- or herself as the anti-Trump. It's not easy to stand out in that huge crowd, and this might just offer someone a chance to get some positive press and separate themselves from the pack.

It's obvious why the first tier sees no upside in angering the Donald. As this article in the New York Times made clear, they need his fans to vote for them:

> Since the start of Mr. Trump's presidential campaign, a vexing question has hovered over his candidacy: Why have so many party leaders — privately appalled by Mr. Trump's remarks about immigrants from Mexico — not renounced him?
>
> It turns out, interviews show, that the mathematical delicacy of a Republican victory in 2016 — and its dependence on aging, anxious white voters — make it exceedingly perilous for the Republican Party to treat Mr. Trump as the pariah many of its leaders now wish he would become.
>
> [W]hat remains so appealing to many of the white voters who like Mr. Trump is his perceived willingness to tell hard truths about delicate issues — racial and otherwise — that, to their mind, the party establishment is too timid to discuss.
>
> "There are a lot of people who are very angry at the grass-roots level and who are convinced the Republican leaders in Congress are not doing everything for the conservative cause," said Charlie Black, a former adviser to John McCain in 2008 and Mr. Romney in 2012. Mr. Trump, he said, holds undeniable appeal to such voters.
> A poll released by the Pew Research Center in May found that 63 percent of Republican voters view immigrants as a "burden" who compete for jobs, housing, and health care compared with 32 percent of Democrats.

These top candidates — Bush, Walker, Rubio, Paul, Huckabee, etc. — are undoubtedly being advised by their campaign strategists to tread very softly, lest they alienate the xenophobic majority. But one of the current also-rans, who just want a chance to get into the debates, might be able to coax enough of the GOP minority who aren't Trump followers to make the cut. It looked for a while as if Lindsey Graham would be the one to seize the day, with his strident declaration that Trump is a "wrecking ball" who is going to "kill the party." But his point wasn't that Trump was wrong in what he said, but that him saying it was making the GOP look bad, which isn't the same thing at all. One might have thought that Rick Santorum, winner of the Iowa caucus in 2012 and the last man standing in the primaries after Mitt Romney, would step up with a strong moral condemnation of Trump's degrading comments about Mexicans. But all Santorum could muster was this tepid criticism:

> "While I don't like the verbiage he's used, I like the fact that he is focused on a very important issue for American workers and particularly, legal immigrants in this country."

Actually, Trump isn't focused on American workers; he's focused on undocumented "rapists," who he says the Mexican government is somehow "sending" here as an act of aggression against the United States. And most of the other second-tier candidates have good things to say about Trump, which one can only assume means that they genuinely agree with him.

But this week one of the candidates did decide to take a courageous step of wooing some of those non-bigoted Iowans by taking on Trump directly. It was former Texas Governor Rick Perry who threw caution to the wind, saying:

> "I have a message for my fellow Republicans and the independents who will be voting in the primary process: what Mr. Trump is offering is not conservatism, it is Trump-ism – a toxic mix of demagoguery and nonsense."

Now it must be noted that he was actually punching back after being slammed earlier by one of Trump's roundhouse punches:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> "When he was governor of Texas he could have done a lot better in terms of securing the border. The job he did in terms of border security was absolutely terrible."

Them's fighting words, for sure. But it doesn't take away from the fact that Perry addressed his comments explicitly to voters, which indicates that he saw a strategic advantage. Needless to say, the billionaire blowhard didn't take Perry's words lying down:

> .@GovernorPerry failed on the border. He should be forced to take an IQ test before being allowed to enter the GOP debate.

— Donald J. Trump (@realDonaldTrump) July 16, 2015
He later tweeted that Perry doesn't know what the word "demagoguery" means, which is funny coming from Trump.

Now one might assume that Perry was just defending his honor, rather than deciding there was something to be gained by sparring with Trump. After all, the party as a whole is petrified to say anything too aggressive, lest he decide to take his billions and run as a third party candidate — something he refused to rule out. Perry is a Party Man. But there is more to his strategy than just getting free press from the Trump show.

This has also been reported:

> Unless candidates can raise their name identification and popularity in national polls, they won't make the cut for the first Republican debate, scheduled for Aug. 6.

> "We've made the decision to spend some serious money to reach a more national audience to introduce the governor, because we want to see him on that debate stage," said Austin Barbour, adviser to a group of "super PACs" backing former Gov. Rick Perry of Texas.

> The super PACs, known as Opportunity and Freedom, are investing hundreds of thousands of dollars in advertising on the Fox News Channel and other cable channels to raise Mr. Perry's profile.

This ad-buy gambit was predicted some time back when people realized that there was a ton of money floating around along with a necessity to gain a national profile in order to be allowed into the debate. Perry is simply doing what Fox News demands — which is give lots of money to Fox News. Funny how that worked out.

Whether this will work for him remains to be seen. He's a much more controlled and professional candidate than he was last time. Meanwhile, his foreign policy agenda is downright bloodthirsty and he has a compelling domestic record as Governor of Texas, both of which should be reasons for Republican voters to find him very attractive if they have a chance to hear about them.

It's quite a comment on our time that a successful Texas Governor (by GOP standards, at least) with plenty of money and establishment support has to get into a public exchange of insults and give millions of dollars to Fox News in order to even have a chance at standing on the debate stage — with Donald Trump. It's as if the Republican primaries have become a form of crude hazing and rank blackmail rather than a democratic process.

In a sense, it's actually more like "The Apprentice" isn't it?

Donald Trump tweeted at Rick Perry again and hilarity ensued // Houston Press // Dianna Wray– July 17, 2015

Donald Trump is running for the GOP nod for president. Somehow the rich guy with the worst toupee/combover/what-the-hell-is-that-on-his-head has become a "frontrunner" in the already crowded race. Meanwhile, former-Gov. Rick Perry is also out in the field trying to finagle the Republican nomination for himself. The two began clashing earlier this month as they traded digs from TV, Twitter and online video.

That's all par for the course in this crowded field of Republican presidential contenders, but somehow Perry has managed to get the best of Trump in these exchanges as we've previously noted. The man who made that infamous "Oops" in 2012 even managed to come off as presidential in a video issued last week refuting all things Trump. But Trump — possibly emboldened by his new best buddy-ship with fellow wanna-be Sen. Ted Cruz — wasn't willing to let well enough alone. On Thursday he waded back into the snarky fray of social media with this little gift horse of a Tweet:

Donald J. Trump ✓@realDonaldTrump
.@GovernorPerry failed on the border. He should be forced to take an IQ test before being allowed to enter the GOP debate.

The Twitter response to his social media bon mot was exactly what the rest of us would expect from Twitter, i.e. the responding Tweets were soon gloriously packed with snark. That's when things got good. There were those who simply defended our longest serving governor, because he's from Texas, and Trump is so not:

Michael Hagood @mlhagood
@realDonaldTrump @GovernorPerry I don't know about others from TX, but I don't care much 4 some NYC jackass blowhard criticizing my state.

Meanwhile, some with the classic smarty pants response:

Pedro Angel @pangel1960
@realDonaldTrump @GovernorPerry whats your IQ, Donald? I bet both Obama and Bill Clinton beat you.

This one just made us clap our hands with glee:

Simon Maloy @SimonMaloy
.@realDonaldTrump okay now do Rand Paul

And then there were people really making a point about how frightening the prospect of President Trump actually is:

Kay Reindl @KayReindl
.@realDonaldTrump I don't know about anyone else, but I think it's time for a President who spends his day fighting on Twitter.

End of the day, we get why Perry is replying and using this stuff to his best advantage — Trump is truly the gift that keeps on giving as far as Perry is concerned — but we're utterly stumped as to why Trump keeps trying a tactic that only makes him look like an idiot, while simultaneously bringing up lots of questions about whether the Trumpmeister himself has ever had an IQ test. We're really curious about that one now.

Rep. Joe Barton endorses Rick Perry for president, spearheads Congressional outreach // The Dallas Morning News // Sylvan Lane – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON–Sometimes college buddies come in handy.

Rep. Joe Barton, R-Arlington, will spearhead Congressional outreach for former Gov. Rick Perry, according to a Friday morning statement from the campaign

“I have known Rick Perry since we were classmates at Texas A&M University, and he has always been a man of character,” said Barton in the release, citing Perry’s economic record as governor. “Americans deserve the kind of principled leadership he would bring to Washington.”

Barton, the longest-tenured current Texas congressman, is the former House Energy and Commerce Committee chairman with ties to the tea party movement. He has consistently supported oil and gas industry-friendly policies throughout his Congressional career and apologized to BP after the 2010 Deepwater Horizon oil spill, accusing the White House of a “shakedown.”

Barton later walked back the apology.

“I think BP is responsible for this accident, should be held responsible and should, in every way, do everything possible to make good on the consequences that have resulted from this accident,” he said.

Perry called Barton a leading energy policy expert in Congress and a faithful proponent of conservative principles.

“I am grateful to have Joe’s support and look forward to working with him to help solve our country’s greatest challenges,” said Perry.

Barton is the first member of Congress to endorse Perry’s presidential campaign.

Five other Texas congressmen have endorsed Sen. Ted Cruz: Reps. Louie Gohmert of Tyler, John Culberson of Houston, John Ratcliffe of Heath, Michael Burgess of Lewisville and Brian Babin of Woodville.

HUCKABEE

Huckabee's $8M pile only goes so far, observers say // Arkansas Online // Sarah D. Wire – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- The $8 million raised for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee's 2016 campaign is more than he raised in the early stages of his 2008 bid, but it's dwarfed by his competitor's hauls.

His presidential campaign has raised $2 million, according to reports filed this week with the Federal Election Commission. Coupled with $6 million raised by pro-Huckabee political action committees and nonprofit groups, Huckabee's initial funding notably exceeds that of his previous attempt, but it may not be good enough, several Arkansas political experts said Thursday.

Many candidates have announced the amounts raised by supportive groups such as super political action committees, nonprofits and other groups that can raise unlimited money but cannot coordinate with the campaigns.

With the inclusion of money raised by such groups, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush topped Republicans' fundraising with more than $114 million. Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and her allied groups eclipsed the other Democratic candidates, with more than $62 million.

"Certainly Mike Huckabee has raised a decent amount of money compared to where he was in 2007, but when you compare him to Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton, they are just blowing him out of the water," said University of Arkansas political science assistant professor Karen Sebold.

A half-dozen Republican candidates have more money when their allied organizations are included in the fundraising totals. U.S. Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas has more than $51 million, U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida has more than $40 million, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal has $9 million.

Huckabee's spokesman Alice Stewart pointed to how Huckabee did in in regard to the 2008 campaign, when he raised less money.

"The nearly $8 million raised to date is well over three times as much as Gov. Huckabee raised in the first three quarters combined of our 2008 campaign, when we were outspent 10-to-1. I'll remind you that Gov. Huckabee won the Iowa caucuses and seven other states," she said.

Sebold also cautioned against writing Huckabee off, citing his 2008 wins.

"Huckabee is one of those candidates I wouldn't count out early in the game. He is not at the front-runner status, but he does have enough to get a ground game going in Iowa," she said. "A couple million dollars of hard donations, $6 million in [unregulated] donations can float a candidacy in Iowa, can help you get that very imperative ground game going where you get people knocking on doors, you get signs out."

Hal Bass, a political science professor at Ouachita Baptist University in Arkadelphia, said less money could mean a hard slog through the primaries, with fewer television, radio and Internet ads than his competitors. The Iowa caucuses are six months away.

"Huckabee has yet to demonstrate that he can raise the kind of money that's necessary to compete on the national level," he said. "It's going to turn on his own personal campaign skills, which are formidable, but it's difficult to run a national campaign without sufficient financial resources."

Bass said that how much money a candidate has doesn't determine success but that it helps a candidate build credibility.

"It matters in the sense that it legitimates a candidacy. It shows that serious financial resources are available for the campaign going forward," he said. "Those who can demonstrate their capacity to generate that financial foundation are able to demonstrate their campaign credibility."

Gary Wekkin, a political science professor at the University of Central Arkansas, said that with so many candidates in the race, donors have a lot of Republicans to choose from.

"There are so many Republicans that the people who are bringing up the rear are going to be getting in each other's way, especially when it comes to fundraising and polling," he said.

Arkansas was the greatest source of Huckabee's contributions for the period between April 1 and June 30, with $383,051 coming in.

He brought in $148,938 over three days in early June when he held fundraisers in El Dorado, Jonesboro, Little Rock and Texarkana.

Among his notable early donations from Arkansans are:

• $2,700 from Craig Campbell, vice chairman of The Stephens Group LLC in Little Rock.

• $2,000 from Southern Arkansas University President David Rankin. His daughter, Beth Ann Rankin, who worked as a policy adviser when Huckabee was governor, also gave $1,000.

• $1,000 from U.S. Rep. French Hill, a Republican from Little Rock. He is the only donor from the state's congressional delegation. Hill was Huckabee's 2008 national finance chairman.

• $1,000 from Assistant Director of the Arkansas Heritage Commission Marynell Branch, who played keyboard in Huckabee's band Capitol Offense.
